Julia Claussen Delights Denver Audience.

Julia Claussen is shown in the accompanying snapshot standing alongside the poster outside of the Auditorium in Denver, Col., where she opened the Philharmonic series on October 15. The following culled from the Rocky Mountain News of October 16 will give an idea of her success:

Mme. Claussen has every attribute that is required in making a great singer—superb presence, perfect poise and sympathy with her audience—and possesses the greatest quality of the true artist, which is reserve. One marvels at the flexibility of her voice, its absolutely correct placement.

While the program last night did not call for any wonderful exhibition of brilliancy from the standpoint of vocal pyrotechnics, it was one which certainly displayed the best qualities of Mme. Claussen's wonderful voice and was by no means lacking in contrast.

The opening number, Saint-Saëns' "Amour Vien Aider," was given with superb dignity and charm and phrased with an authority which left no doubt as to the capabilities of the artist.

Mme. Claussen responded to an insistent demand for an encore with Isolde's "Liebestod." In this she reached her greatest height, filling the auditorium with her rich, wonderful voice. Quite unwilling to let her go, the audience clamored for another selection, and she closed the program with Wagner's exquisite "Traume."—Rocky Mountain News, Denver, October 16, 1914.

Francis Rogers' Program.

Francis Rogers' annual song recital will be given in the Little Theatre, New York, Thursday afternoon, November 12. The baritone, who will be assisted by Isidore Luckstone at the piano, will sing a varied program of songs in Italian, French, German and English, as follows:

Vittoria	Carissimi
Nina	Pergolesi
Bois Epais	Lulli
Vive Henri IV!	Old French
L'Amour de Moi	Old French
If Though Thy Heart Wilt Give Me	J. S. Bach
Si, tra i Ceppi (Berenice)	Handel
Das Veilchen (Goethe)	Mozart
Ein Ton	Cornelius
Aufenthalt	Schubert
An die Nachtigall	Brahms
O liebliche Wangen	Brahms
Cradle Song of the Peasant	Moussorgsky
Love Song of the Idiot	Moussorgsky
Field Marshal's Death	Moussorgsky
Folksong	Greek
The Sally Gardens	Irish
The Banks of the Daisies	Irish
Turn Ye to Me	Scotch
Skye Boat Song	Scotch
The Hundred Pipers	Lady Nairne

Zimbalist's New York Program.

Efrem Zimbalist's program for his violin recital in Carnegie Hall, New York, Saturday afternoon, November 14, is announced as follows:

Sonata, E major	Handel
Adagio	Grazioli-Liebersohn
Les papillons	Couperin-Liebersohn
Musette	Rameau-Liebersohn
Vivace	Haydn-Auer
Chaconne (for violin alone)	Bach
Aria	Goldmark
Le petit Berger	Debussy
Valse	Glazounoff
Berceuse	Arensky
Tambourin Chinois	Kreisler
Faust Fantasie	Gounod-Wieniawsky

Surely it should please Kreisler to realize how many people were glad to hear he had been wounded, so long as it took him out of the danger zone without injuring his capacity to play the violin.—Boston Budget.

CINCINNATI SYMPHONY SEASON IN OPERATION.

Orchestra's Plans Show Decided Activity—Conservatory Orchestra Concert—Matinee Musicale—College of Music Concert

Cincinnati, November 5, 1914.

The symphony season, which opened so auspiciously October 30, now is in full swing with three series of concerts coming, just one week apart. This plan was found necessary owing to the extra concerts to be given this year. The third week of the orchestral season will see Dr. Kunwald and his men on tour, playing in Springfield, Columbus, Zanesville, Cleveland and Toledo, Ohio. On Sunday, November 22, there will be inaugurated the first of the popular concerts in Music Hall, and the advance sale has been extremely good, orders for season seats pouring into the orchestra office by every mail, some enthusiasts even bringing their orders in person with requests for their usual seats.

Carl Friedberg, the German pianist who is making his first American tour, will be the soloist this week playing the Brahms concerto in B flat. The other numbers selected by Dr. Kunwald for this concert are the "Akademische Fest" overture of Brahms and the Schumann symphony, No. 2, in C.

Conservatory of Music Orchestra.

An ambitious program and an audience that any visiting artist might have been glad to attract, were salient features of the first concert by the Conservatory of Music Orchestra last Thursday night. Under the leadership of Pier Adolfo Tirindelli the orchestra scored a triumph. Reenforced by a number of horns, woodwinds and double bass from the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, the fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky was given, a notable achievement for any student body. The concert opened with the prelude "Dalibo" (Smetana). Marguerite Stegemiller sang the aria, "Vissi d'Arte, Vissi d'Amore," from "Tosca," with good effect. In the "Siegfried" idyl the volume and brilliancy of the violin choir showed the professional standards set for these young musicians. One of the most enjoyable features of the concert was the playing of Bristow Hardin, a student under F. Shailer Evans, who was heard in the concertstuck in F minor, op. 79, by Weber, for orchestra and piano.

The Matinee Musicale.

The Matinee Musicale, which opens its season December 15, will present two artists at each concert this year, instead of the customary one artist. This is due to the plethora of funds in the treasury, the club having had a very successful season last year. Cornelius van Vleet, principal cellist of the Minneapolis Orchestra, and Julia Culp, who has a large following in Cincinnati, are the artists engaged for the first concert. Later on Katharine Goodson and Christine Miller will be heard.

College of Music Concerts.

The College of Music Chorus and Orchestra gave the first of their annual series of concerts last Tuesday night at the Odeon, the event bringing out so many musicians and music lovers that the supply of tickets were exhausted days before the concert. The chorus was under the direction of Louis Victor Saar, and the orchestra under Johannes Miersch. All the solo numbers were presented under Albino Gorno with the exception of the violin concerto played by a pupil of Mr. Miersch under his direction. The violinist, Nell Gallagher, is a young and talented student who has made remarkable progress during her short time at the college. The pianist, Frances Berg, from the class of Albino Gorno, showed herself to be a brilliant and conscientious young musician. The vocalists included Walter Vaughn, tenor; Paul F. Sebring, baritone; Florence Hawkins, soprano, and Adele Goldkamp, contralto. In the tenor solo with orchestra the flute obligato was beautifully played by Ellis McDiarmid. Jessie Partlon Tyree.

New Haven Notes.

New Haven, Conn., November 4, 1914.

The first of the series of New Haven Symphony Orchestra concerts was given at Woolsey Hall yesterday afternoon. The orchestra was under the direction of Horatio W. Parker and Ethel Leginska, pianist, was the soloist. The Schumann, No. 4, D minor symphony headed the program. In Ethel Leginska, we heard a young, emotional artist who displayed an abundance of temperament and a delicacy of finish quite surprising. The orchestra accompanied admiringly. The MacDowell "Indian Suite" was the other orchestral number.

Sousa and his Band will appear here November 10, both afternoon and evening, under the auspices of Yale University. E. A. Leopold.

STEINWAY

IN the effort to satisfy the popular demand for a Steinway Grand Piano suitable for the modern drawing or living room, Style M has been produced. ¶It has the unexcelled tone and the perfect workmanship of every Steinway, and differs from the others only in size, design and price. It is the smallest Steinway Grand made, with 7⅓ octaves and all the tested Steinway improvements and patents. ¶To the music lover it means the world's ideal Grand piano at an exceedingly moderate price $750

We invite you to see this Steinway, and test its exquisite qualities.

THE MUSICAL COURIER EXTRA
Published every Saturday by Musical Courier Co.
Devoted to the interests of the Piano Trade.

Ysaye and his family have landed in London from Brussels, being forced to leave the latter city owing to lack of food supplies.

George Hamlin has come out with an offer of a prize of $200 for the best aria for tenor solo and orchestra written by an American composer.

Concert Direction M. H. Hanson is in receipt of a cable from Ferruccio Busoni in which the pianist-composer-conductor states that he will surely come to America this season to fill his engagements.

Leopold Godowsky arrived here from Europe last week. The distinguished pianist temporarily has given up his position as head of the Meisterschule at Vienna on account of the war. Godowsky will fill a number of concert engagements during his stay in the United States.

Some feverish person has started the rumor that Fritz Kreisler was not in a battle, but received his injury through the kick of a horse near which the violinist happened to be standing at mess time. As Kreisler published his battle experiences in a Vienna newspaper, it is very unlikely that he would undertake to hoax his fellow countrymen and to risk exposure on the part of his regimental comrades.

It is reported that there will be no dispute regarding the contract of Cleofonte Campanini with the Chicago Opera and that settlement in full will be paid the conductor for the season 1914-15. If this is true, the directors will face serious trouble with the other members of the company. Many of them already have informed the MUSICAL COURIER'S Chicago office that they intend to leave Europe shortly for Chicago.

Violin recital programs are built ordinarily upon such uniform lines and show so little initiative or originality of thought that it is a pleasure to record a departure from the orthodox whenever such a courageous move is made. Nikolai Sokoloff, at Aeolian Hall, New York, on November 20, will play a program consisting of Handel's D major sonata, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," Chausson's "Poëme" and Saint-Saëns' "Havanaise."

Unique, artistic and exquisitely refined is the entertainment provided by Yvonne de Treville, who gave her New York recital last week, details of which will be found in another column. This cultivated soprano is a rare combination of vocal art and musicianship, and each one of her renderings was touched with imagination, interpretative finish and appeal of sentiment. No vocal event of recent years has pleased our metropolitan music lovers more than Yvonne de Treville's delightful ministrations last week. It is to be hoped that New York soon will have more of her recitals.

An all-Tschaikowsky program, to be played here tomorrow and Friday by the Philharmonic Society, brings to mind the fact that while many musical epicures claim to have passed the stage where the Russian's music gives them thrills, the general public remains faithful to the fervent Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky and continues to prefer his "Pathétique" to the "Eroica" and his "1812" to Brahms' "Tragic" overture. Tschaikowsky has been unduly criticized by oversensitive purist souls. As a matter of fact, he is a melodist of remarkable charm and an orchestrator of graphic skill and wide resource. Those are qualities which cannot be obliterated by shallow criticism directed toward his hasty workmanship and large output in his smaller compositions. As a matter of fact, Tschaikowsky did not hurry in his symphonic creation and took as much time to file and polish as did some of the greatest of the classical masters. Schubert is the shining example of how fine a man's music may be in spite of speedy and fertile production. Tschaikowsky will crown the Philharmonic concerts and the reactionaries will rave in vain.

Sousa and his band filled the Hippodrome last Sunday evening and the riotous enthusiasm of the audience when the ever popular conductor led his marches proved that when once the popularity of an American composer is established in his own country it is as permanent as it is genuine. Sousa represents in his music the tonal expression of America's optimism, pride, and power, and that is why it has reached so close to the hearts of his fellow countrymen. He is the most typically American composer of today.

There will be only two weeks more of Century Opera performances in New York, and then the organization will move on to Chicago, thanks to the indifference of our own city in the matter of good ensemble opera given at popular prices. Next week the Metropolitan is to begin its season here, and as the winter goes on we shall repeat the annual experiences of the sold out houses, the streets blockaded by ticket purchasers and the $2,000,000 of total receipts. This is a merry old metropolis and merry are those who help push along its musical well being.

The International Music Society of Leipsic has been dissolved because the war made it impossible to maintain the relationships necessary for its existence. Its most prominent members were Germans, French, English, Belgians, Russians. This year's annual meeting of the society was held in Paris, where Hermann Kretzschmar, the director of the Berlin Royal High School, was elected president. Kretzschmar recently resigned, and as all of the prominent German members followed his example the only thing to do was to dissolve the society—at least as far as Germany is concerned.

Distressingly out of tune was the playing of the violins in the accompaniment to Frank Gittleson's performance of the Bach concerto last Sunday afternoon by the New York Symphony Orchestra under Walter Damrosch. It was so confusing that the soloist seemed in doubt as to his own intonation and after each movement endeavored to find the pitch. It was not his violin that was out of tune nor his playing. Walter Damrosch should rehearse his first violins so that when a theme is presented unisono the players put their fingers on the exact fingerboard spot required. The cacophony at the concert last Sunday set one's teeth on edge.

Some heated professional commentators on New York musical affairs saw fit to chide Dr. Muck in the daily newspapers because the composers whose works he played at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last Thursday are German—Beethoven, Weber, Strauss and Brahms. Dr. Muck was accused of being pro-German. What that sort of discussion has to do with music in general and with New York's symphony concerts in particular, is not quite clear to the cool and impartial observer of tonal doings in our city. Music in itself is neutral and as the war is not being fought out in the concert halls of our country (or of any other) we do not see how a conductor makes himself politically responsible by playing an all-German, all-Russian, all-English, all-French, or all-Austrian program in America. The audience attended the Boston Symphony concert in order to hear good music and apparently the only persons present who were at all exercised as to the nationality of the composers played, were those critics who had tried foolishly to meddle with politics. Aside from the absurdity of the proceeding, it showed exceedingly bad taste. Furthermore, Dr. Muck is a German citizen, and there seems to be no logical reason why he should not be pro-German in his opinions and sympathies if he so chooses.

SIDELIGHTS ON ART.

Carl Friedberg, at his first New York recital, played in a hall bathed in dim religious gloom, and the Tribune of this city said on November 3:

A poet is not proclaimed either by low lights or long hair, whether he speaks in words or in tones, but by his utterances; and it is a deserved, perhaps even a high, tribute to Herr Friedberg when it is said that he won recognition for his art in spite of the barriers which he placed against its recognition. It is an everlasting pity that the story ever became known that once in a salon in Paris when Chopin and Liszt were pitted against each other one or the other of them asked that the lights be extinguished. Since then every silly sentimentalist, at the piano or in the audience, has imagined that poetical pianists talk best in a twilight, and all intellectually and emotionally sane people have had to be half ashamed of their love of the art.

We agree with the general principle which the Tribune advances, that it is unpleasant to be compelled to sit in a semidarkness which obliges one to get out his strongest spectacles in order to read the program and which almost prevents an audience from being able to distinguish whether the artist has seated himself at the piano or not yet appeared upon the stage. There would be some reason in the proceeding if the lights were put out entirely, so that the hearers could not know how well acquainted the player might be with his keyboard by negotiating it successfully in the darkness, but this half light, this "Iolanthe" effect, this "Stimmungsdämmerung"—no, it is not for us. On this point we are in thorough agreement with the Tribune.

But we were firmly under the impression that, so far as the Tribune is concerned, there is only one pianist, a gentleman named Paderewski, and that this same Tribune is his prophet. Are we mistaken in our recollection that it was this artist who first introduced the custom—at least, to this country—of "candling" his programs? We do not recollect exactly what the Tribune said about Mr. Paderewski sparing the gas bill, but we are fairly confident that he was not referred to by that paper as a "silly sentimentalist," the delicate designation applied to Mr. Friedberg in the article quoted above.

Presumably it makes a vast difference over whose head the lights burn dimly. The better the pianist, the lower the light may be turned down, according to Tribune logic. We would suggest that an automatic attachment for the piano be invented, perhaps on lines similar to the apparatus which now is used in making the rolls for some of the reproducing pianos. This invention would be connected on one end with the keyboard and at the other with the gas meter or the electric dimmer, as the case might be, and by a delicate electrical adjustment, as the poesy, grandeur and magnificence of the performance varied with the temperamental emotional ebb and flood of the performer, the lights would increase correspondingly or diminish, thus giving to the audience an infallible index of the value of an artist's work, and one which, at the same time, would greatly simplify the labors of the Tribune critic and his fellows, including ourselves. This apparatus when perfected will be known as the "Critics' Friend." We already have applied for a copyright on this name and shortly shall send in our application for a patent on the completed invention.

It is the Tribune, too, which last week printed this cry of distress:

It will be the pious duty of the critical reviewer of musical incidents in the metropolis this season to permit a multitude of them to pass unnoticed out of consideration for the public, as well as the performers. The flood of singers, violinists and pianists, of which apprehension was expressed here some weeks ago, is upon us. Cheek by jowl with real artists, foreign and native, are the small fry, also foreign and native. For the former the European war has created a need, largely personal; for the latter (the small fry, both foreign and native), an opportunity, as they think. Paper is patient (that is a German saying), printers' ink indifferent, and reviewers are long suffering and indulgent; but no amount of patience and indulgence will be able to hold out against half a dozen "recitalists" a week during a campaign of six months if nine-tenths of them are mediocrities who have no better proclamation to make than half a hundred local men and women occupied with the same artistic handicraft could make if they were so disposed.

It will be better that many concert givers should content themselves with the applause of friends than that they should be measured by standards set up by duty toward real art and real artists. High merit is not likely to be overlooked by those capable of recognizing it.

Remarkable indeed is the proclamation just quoted, and one regards it with amazement, whether considered from the business or the artistic side. It is a tactless and insulting announcement.

To start with, the New York Tribune solicits advertising from musicians, and the musicians who advertise in that paper do so in the hope and trust that their public efforts will at least be noticed by the Tribune. There is nothing wrong in such an understanding. It is as honest for the advertising musician, no matter how "small" he is, to expect his concert to be noticed in the Tribune with a line or two, as for that paper to accept the musician's advertising. The questions that present themselves, as a consequence, are these: How will the Tribune critic be able to determine who is "small fry" and who is not, unless he goes to all the concerts? How does he recognize "large fry" before he goes to their concerts? Is an artist who makes modest newspaper announcements necessarily smaller fry than the one who plasters the town with three sheet posters and fills the journals with large type reproductions of his name? What is the Tribune critic's standard of measurement? Are not all artists "small fry" at some stage of their career, or did those whom the Tribune critic goes to hear, acquire fame at their birth? On occasions that gentleman has told an indifferent world that he considers it the critic's duty to seek for talent and to point out to public performers wherein they violate the tenets of musical art and of tonal aesthetics. Are not the "small fry" in more urgent need of that great critic's advice and suggestions than those artists who already have reputation and standing and whom praise cannot help but censure might harm? Is the Tribune critic constructive or destructive? If he is constructive, does it not become his first duty to listen particularly to the efforts of the struggling artists who are trying to obtain a hearing?

It would have been far more honest for the Tribune critic to write: "I am a comfortable sort of person. I do not care particularly to go out in all kinds of weather to attend whole battalions of concerts, good, bad and indifferent. When I do go, I prefer to be in one of the fashionable halls, with a number of well known persons, and to listen to a performance by well known musical forces. I like to write about those persons who have had the most publicity, as that will give added importance to my writings. It irritates me to have to report concerts by musicians with whose names the public is unfamiliar. As soon as the public has accepted an artist I dearly love to express my opinion about him."

FLESCH WILL BE HERE.

To set at rest all rumors concerning Carl Flesch, the violinist, Messrs. Haensel & Jones, his managers, beg to announce that they have positive assurance from Mr. Flesch that he will sail for America December 5, and that he will remain in America until May, filling all his engagements as booked, both with symphony orchestras and in recitals. Among the New York engagements of the violinist may be mentioned four appearances with the New York Symphony Society, two recitals in Carnegie Hall and at the Metropolitan Opera [illegible] day night concert, January 31.

MARTIAL MUSICAL CRITICISM.

Here are excerpts from a letter which appeared in the Liverpool (England) Echo of October 23, 1914. It is from Theodore S. Hill, who is, we are informed, a member of the famous London firm of dealers in violins:

We had an English school of music centuries before Germany existed, and our cathedral music, madrigals, etc., although sadly neglected, through foreign jealousy and long ruling of the roost here, are still without a rival. In the days of good Queen Bess no one was considered a gentleman unless he could take his part in a madrigal—a feat which would prove a "floorer" for many a musician today.

Our composers, from Purcell to Bishop, Smart, Bennett, Sullivan, Pearson, Elgar, etc. (when not under the shackles of Wagnerism, etc.), are unsurpassed with works of rich melody and fine harmonies, standing out in contrast to the ear-splitting noises of Strauss & Co. I attended an orchestral concert at the Philharmonic Hall some months ago when a composition of Strauss was given, and the row and discord were so horrible that I was obliged to stop my ears.

One of the performers informed me that at the rehearsal of this piece a second violinist played "The Sailors' Hornpipe" all the way through, and the conductor did not observe it—such was the din! Meantime the works of our composers, giving real pleasure to listeners, are allowed to collect dust on the shelves.

Surely now that our people are, at last, awake to what German-Assyrian "culture" really means, our concert programs will no longer be solely arranged for the benefit of foreigners. The works of the great English composer, H. H. Pearson, are still unheard. Could we not, at least, hear some of his great concert overtures? As to the so-called "German" masters, it is well known to many that these are mostly of Jewish origin.

"The stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, etc.," is a command which we have improved upon by favoring foreigners to the deep injury of our own people. Take our scientific and logical system of fingering X for thumb, and 1 2 3 4 for fingers, in contrast to the confusing German 1 2 3 4 5; they using 1 2 3 4 for the violin! Our dealers, in my opinion, for the sake of extra profit, push bad German instruments in place of good, sound English-made goods. "Least said, soonest mended!" Then take the case of our first-class artists and teachers; it is the same tale, namely—foreigners preferred!

What a delightful specimen of the fine art of letter writing. How true it is, indeed, that few "gentlemen" of today are capable of taking part in a madrigal, unless, perhaps, it be that famous old one which has come down to us from our forefathers and is entitled "We Won't Go Home Until Morning."

In the next paragraph how delightful to note the list of English composers—"Purcell to Bishop, Smart, Bennett, Sullivan, Pearson, Elgar, etc." How that name Pearson, unobtrusively intruded among the oft heard line of English composers, sticks out with the conspicuity of an absent tooth in an old comb. Then again farther on Mr. Hill calls upon the gods to produce, for him at least, some of the "great concert overtures" of that "great English composer," H. H. Pearson. We are not rich in these troublous times, but, at the same time, we should be inclined to reward with one dime in currency any reader who can sing, whistle, hum, or play for us offhand without the music any composition or any part of the "great concert overtures" of H. H. Pearson.

Almost pathetic is the reference to the dear old English fingering, when it is considered that Bach, the German, discovered the existence of the thumb as a finger.

Comment is unnecessary on the foolish and incorrect passage regarding the religion of the German masters. Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Brahms, Weber, Schubert, Schumann, Beethoven were not of Jewish origin, and if they had been, we do not see how that would affect the degree of their inspiration, the beauty of their melodies, or the resourcefulness of their counterpoint.

POPULARITY OF THE LOVE SONG

What is the subject matter of the most famous songs? Schubert's "Erlking" is a romantic ballad of the supernatural. The "Wanderer" is full of longing for home and native land. "Impatience" ("Ungeduld") and the "Serenade" are love songs. Schubert, in fact, wrote to all kinds of words, good, bad and indifferent. He seemed not to require the suggestions of the lyric to start his inexhaustible flow of melody. Schumann, however, was a more broadly cultured man with fine literary tastes. His songs, on the whole, have a more uniformly high class lyric than the songs of Schubert have. He may not have had Schubert's extraordinary facility, but he had a more impassioned utterance in his love songs.

"Du meine Seele, du mein Herz," is probably the most expressive and rapturous love song ever written, though it has not been praised so much by journalists and amateur writers on music as Beethoven's famous love song, "Adelaide."

There are so many great love songs to Schumann's credit that it is hardly necessary to do more than call the attention of our readers to the well known "Two Grenadiers," which has the distinction of not being a love song, and, also, of not being one of Schumann's best songs.

Wagner's erotic nature was admirably suited to the composition of love songs. In fact, the entire opera of "Tristan and Isolde" is one long uninterrupted song of love and passion.

Brahms, on the other hand, was of a distinctly colder type of man, though his best music glows with a genial warmth and a kindly sympathy. What are his most popular songs in the English speaking world? Are they not "Die Mainacht" and "Wiegenlied"?—both of which are devoid of that passion so essential to love songs? Compared with the emotional fervor and unreserved confession of Jensen's "Murmuring Breezes," Brahms' deeper utterances seem reflective and curbed.

None of Grieg's many beautiful songs has enjoyed the popularity of his early "Ich liebe dich," which is one of the most German works he ever wrote, and is quite unlike the Norwegian style he afterwards succeeded in putting into his music. The song's popularity was due to the warmth of passion Grieg expresses in the music for the passionate words.

Hugo Wolf and Richard Strauss can hardly be called popular song writers even in a limited sense of the word popular. A great artist here and there makes a success of some of Strauss' fine songs, but we are hardly justified in saying yet whether Strauss is at his best as a writer of love songs or of romantic and tragic songs. In the poetical songs of Wolf there is a good deal of the bitterness of disappointed love, but very little of the joy and glowing passion that fill Schumann's "Du meine Seele, du mein Herz," and Grieg's "Ich liebe dich."

One of the most popular songs Germany ever has given us is Bohm's "Still wie die Nacht," a love song pure and simple.

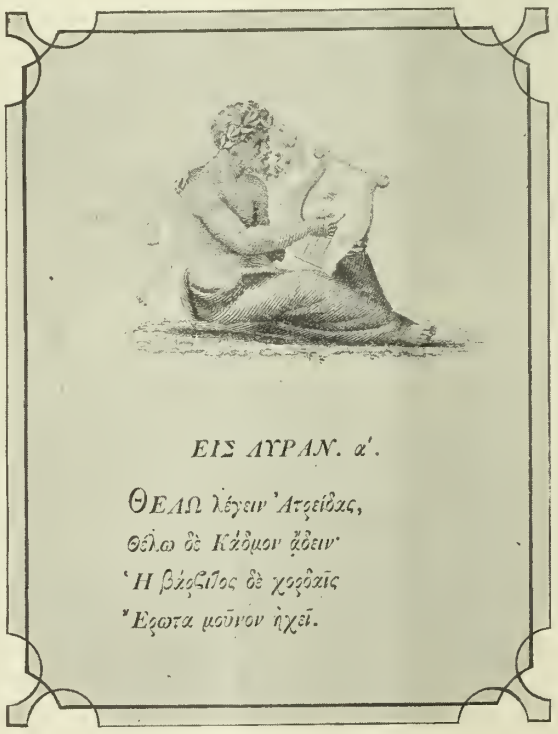
"O Happy Day," by Carl Goetze, is a love song; so is Jensen's languorous and sentimental "O Let Me Press Thy Cheek to Mine."

Lassen's "It was a dream," and Kjerulf's "Last Night" likewise are love songs.

Schumann, Liszt, Rubinstein and a host of lesser and later composers have set to music Heine's famous love lyric, "Du bist wie eine Blume."

But of all these German, Scandinavian, Russian love songs, Schumann's "Widmung" or "Du meine Seele" is without a doubt the finest.

When we turn to France, again, we find the love song taking precedence.



One of the greatest of French love songs is the grand opera air, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," from Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila." French operas, of course, contain many love songs, but few of them have become popular on the concert stage. There is the "Dwelling Pure and Lowly" from Gounod's "Faust," which used to be a famous concert air for tenors. Bizet's "Toreador" song from "Carmen" is not a love song, but its melody is known to all the world.

Apart from the operatic stage, however, there are few songs of French origin which are widely popular. Faure's "Palms" is a martial sort of song, although the words are religious.

Most of Debussy's songs are love songs, as anyone can see on examining a collection of this modern Frenchman's work. In America today probably the most popular of Debussy's songs is "Mandoline," which can hardly be called a love song, though Verlaine's words describe young couples serenading and courting by moonlight.

Bachelet, Bruneau, Chausson, Coquard, D'Indy, Duparc, Hue, Lalo, Leken, Leroux, Paladilhe, Vidal, and others of less merit, are popular to a certain extent, but are hardly known to the American public and need not detain us now.

Massenet was a successful exponent of love in music. Pierné's "To Lucette," and Widor's "Nothing I Ask Thee to Give Me" are certainly songs of love.

ANACREON AND HIS LYRE.

When we cross the channel from France into England we find an immense amount of songs and ballads, mostly about (a) love, (b) the sea, (c) religion. Few of these songs have any artistic value, and not many of them ever become known outside of the island kingdom.

Arthur Sullivan's only really famous song is of a religious nature, "The Lost Chord." Frederic Clay's "I'll Sing Thee Songs of Araby," and Goring-Thomas' "Night in June" are perhaps the most highly esteemed of English songs, and they are both love songs. There is a widely popular and famous love song, written to English words and composed in England by the Italian composer Tosti, which was one of the best selling songs ever published. We refer to "Goodbye."

"Love's Old Sweet Song" is another well known ballad from England.

What are the most popular songs by American composers? Unquestionably love songs.

Seldom have two songs had a greater reputation among the song lovers of the nation than De Koven's "Oh, Promise Me," and Nevin's "Rosary." The sale of these two love songs has reached up into the million mark.

It seems to be an established fact, therefore, that love is the most popular of all themes for song words.

Shakespeare's love-sick Duke Orsino says: "If music be the food of love, play on." We may justifiably say that love is the food of song. But if any young or inexperienced composer thinks that he can compose a successful song merely by choosing words of an amatory nature he will soon be disillusioned when he publishes his lucubration.

A successful song must have the warmth and passion in the music, no matter what the words have.

Where is the successful song of high, or low, art which does not owe its reputation primarily to the music?

One of the earliest recorded writers of love songs was Anacreon, the Ionian poet who lived in Athens twenty-five centuries ago. He tells us in his famous "Ode to the lyre" that he often tried to sing of heroes and great men of antiquity, but that his lyre refused to sound any note but that of love, no matter how he changed the strings.

Schubert has set a German version of this ode to music.

We reproduce the first stanza of the original Greek and the accompanying vignette from Forster's highly prized edition of the Odes of Anacreon, published by Bulmer, of London, in 1802.

There is a statue of Anacreon in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass.

A PLEASANT FICTION.

It is always a pleasure to read of the achievements of great men, especially if the great men are musicians. Unfortunately, however, so much of what we read in histories, particularly ancient histories, is little better than the unconfirmed and unofficial war news which makes our daily papers sell. Even the upright and God-fearing John Evelyn, friend of John Milton and a worthy English gentleman of blameless life, got a false wireless message from "they-say-ville" into his diary. Writing from Rome in 1644, he has a good deal to say about Bernini, the extraordinarily popular architect and sculptor, who was then alive and in the height of his powers.

We learn that shortly before the arrival of John Evelyn in Rome, Bernini had arranged the public performance of an opera "wherein he painted the scenes, cut the statues, invented the engines, composed the music, writ the comedy and built the theatre." John Evelyn reported a report. He does not say that he saw Bernini's opera. Neither does John Towers say anything about an opera by Bernini.

Grove's Dictionary is likewise silent on the subject. We are forced to conclude that Bernini was not a composer, and that John Evelyn lent too credulous an ear to hearsay. We censor the message and set the seal of our official stamp upon it: "Unconfirmed; delayed in transmission."

When we looked up Bernini in a biographical dictionary we found that this reputed prototype of Oscar Hammerstein and Richard Wagner was merely an architect and sculptor whose fame has greatly waned during the last two hundred years. Several of his statues and groups are now to be found in Florence, and his magnificent colonades of pillars in a semicircle round the plaza in front of St. Peter's in Rome are known to all the world. But as for his music, we can find no more trace of it than Macbeth found of the air drawn dagger he attempted to clutch.

METROPOLITAN OPENING WEEK.

Monday, November 16, "Ballo in Maschera," with Destinn, Hempel, Caruso, Amato, Rothier, Segurola, etc.

Wednesday, November 18, "Lohengrin," with Gadski, Ober, Urlus, Braun, Weil, Middleton (debut), etc.

Thursday, November 19, "Carmen," with Farrar, Alda, Caruso, Amato, Rothier, Reiss.

Friday, November 20, "Rosenkavalier," with Ober, Hempel, Schumann, Goritz, Weil, Althouse, Reiss.

Saturday, November 21 (matinee), "Boheme," with Bori, Scotti, Didur, Segurola, etc.

Saturday, November 21 (evening), "Aida," with Destinn, Matzenauer, Martinelli, Amato, Rothier, Rossi, etc.

A WORD ABOUT THE CENTURY.

H. O. Osgood has been abroad for the MUSICAL COURIER during the past four or five years, and arrived in this city from London last week. With his foreign impressions fresh upon him, the MUSICAL COURIER commissioned Mr. Osgood to attend a Century Opera performance and report to the readers of this paper how that organization compares with the opera companies of Europe. Attached is Mr. Osgood's review:

"On Wednesday evening, November 4, I had the pleasure of seeing one of the regular performances of 'Boheme' at the Century Opera House, and in this case the expression 'had the pleasure' is no mere empty phrase, for it was a pleasure to hear the splendid rendering which was given. I do not believe the average American, who is constantly told about the excellence of opera abroad, has any idea of the splendid quality of work which the Century Company is doing—at least, as I saw it the other night in 'Boheme.'

"I have seen this opera at the Royal Opera in Munich, with a cast headed by Caruso and Marcella Craft; I have seen it at the Royal Opera of Vienna; I have seen it done by a little Italian company of unknown singers at the Volksoper at Budapest; I have seen it at the Opera Comique in Paris, and the performance at the Century stands comparison with any one of those just mentioned—in fact, for general, all round excellence, it exceeds any of them, except, perhaps, the performance which I have referred to at Budapest, which was really remarkable in every way. There was not one single weak point in the performance at the Century Opera. Everything was good. The soloists were, without exception, possessed of excellent voices, of a knowledge of how to sing and act, and gave a performance more evenly balanced than any I ever have witnessed. It was no case of one or two stars surrounded by many inferiors, but each artist, no matter what the length and character of his or her part, formed a complete, satisfactory and indispensable part of the whole ensemble.

"Aside from the singing, this was particularly noticeable in respect to the fine details of the action. Jacques Coini is certainly a genius at stage management. I never have seen on any stage the final scene—the death of Mimi—done so simply and, at the same time, so effectively and with so much tragic force. Then the conductor, Agide Jacchia, knew his score and its nuances thoroughly, and, what was more, he knew how to bring forth the effects that he wished both from the stage and the orchestra pit.

"The orchestra itself is an excellent one, fit to be compared, except in size, with the orchestra of any opera house abroad; in fact, as I have already said, there was in each detail an achievement of capable thoroughness, not excelled, as far as my experience goes, in any other opera house in the world.

"Formerly I was no believer in opera in English, but I must admit that the excellence of the diction at this performance, and at some which I heard in London before leaving that city, have converted me, and I am as willing to hear opera in English, when well sung, as in any other language. It is true that occasional phrases sound ridiculous, but that is absolutely true of other languages as well. One cannot conceive of anything sounding more grotesque than some of the phrases in the standard German operas.

"I am very willing to admit that the absolutely high standard of the performance surprised me considerably. I have been living in Europe for several years and am afraid that I had the idea that they did things of this sort better over there, but it is not so. Leaving out of consideration the Covent Garden Opera, which is not indigenous to England and cannot be reckoned as a product of the country in any way, there is absolutely no opera house in any city of Europe which, with its regular company, can produce a more finished, effective performance of 'Boheme' than I saw the other night done by an American company in an American city, and there are a great many of them who do not even approach the excellence of the production at the Century.

"It is most sincerely to be hoped that New York some day will become proud enough of this native organization to support it financially as it should be supported, for it most certainly deserves it."

THE BOSTON FIASCO.

The occurrence on Monday night, November 2, at the Boston Theatre, was the same sad old story of operatic failure which, pitifully enough, we have to hear far too often in our struggle for operatic establishment in the United States. The MUSICAL COURIER representative arrived at the theatre a few minutes before the performance should have started and found the lobby packed with a great throng of anxious looking ticket holders. Everyone was in total ignorance of the state of affairs existing behind the closed doors of the darkened interior. Reassuring announcements in the morning papers stated that this was to be the only opera company in Boston the present season and a very attractive cast for the evening's performance of "Traviata," including Miss Ardini as Violetta, succeeded in drawing a big crowd. The audience had not long to wait until announcement was forthcoming that there would be no performance , but that the management hoped to be able to open "within a very few days" and continue with its season throughout the balance of the originally proposed plan of twelve weeks. Money was refunded to all those holding tickets, and the throng dispersed in quick order, seemingly neither surprised nor particularly displeased at the outcome. Information of the approaching debacle, hinted at in a recent Boston letter of the MUSICAL COURIER, now is justified.

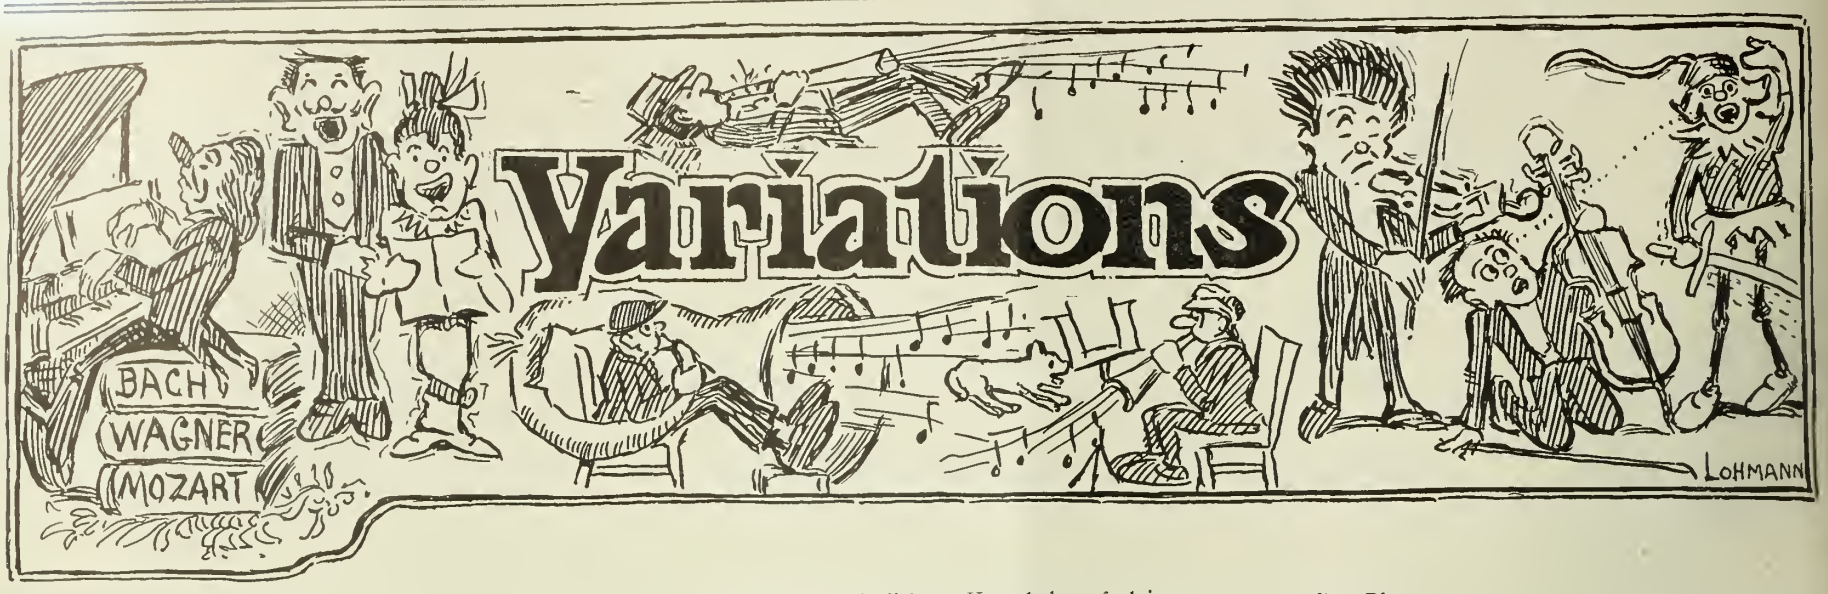
The Boston Theatre opera organization has not been a paying one since the time of its opening four weeks ago. As a matter of fact, the real cause for the closing, according to the MUSICAL COURIER Boston representative, was lack of sufficient funds to pay either principal singers, orchestra, chorus, or stage hands. The management had been hoping for the best for the past week or more while it, aided by Mayor Curley, kept up a vigorous appeal to the citizens of Boston for financial support. According to the Mayor, it was "a noble institution, enabling persons of moderate means to enjoy beautiful opera, beautifully given, and the question of opera or no opera for Boston this winter is but a matter of hours."

This eloquent stating of the case did not save the cause as apparently was expected. The Evening Transcript commented rather heartlessly on the Mayor's appeal, but since that paper in truth touched on facts of much value concerning the question of municipal subsidization of opera projects, the article is here in part reprinted. "Nor does he (Mayor Curley) show clearly why public spirited citizens should pay the bills of a company to the performances of which, however well intentioned or meritorious in their kind, the public that it would gain, has plainly shown itself indifferent. Admittedly, opera in America must be subsidized by those that are minded so to support it; but in the eyes of those that make its audiences, it must stand or fall on its appeal to them like any other pleasure of the theatre. Whatever may be the motives of those that subsidize opera of any sort, men and women go to it, as they go to any other entertainment, for the pleasure they expect to receive and not for any educational or communal end. And there is just as much reason for being sane about opera as about anything else."

OPERA STARS RETURN.

Neither European war, military conscription, nor oceans strewn with mines now will be able to prevent opera at the Metropolitan this winter, for last week witnessed the arrival here of Giulio Gatti-Casazza, Enrico Caruso—isn't that enough for a profitable grand opera season?—Toscanini, Polacco, Rosina Galli, Bori, Hempel, Destinn, Bada, Ober, Braun, Goritz, Urlus, Leonhardt, Amato, Didur, Ananian, Rossi. While all the operatic personages were full of war talk and political philosophy, the only one of their utterances which shall find room in the MUSICAL COURIER is that of Giulio Gatti-Casazza, who said: "There is enough war discussion disrupting the world without dragging these things into opera." Also the head of the Metropolitan announced that in January he will do Giordano's "Madame Sans Gene" and Leoni's "L'Oracolo" (founded on "The Cat and the Cherub"), and in March, Borodine's "Prince Igor." Beethoven's "Fidelio," Weber's "Euryanthe" and Bizet's "Carmen" are slated for revivals, and prove that the international operatic "balance of power" at the Metropolitan is most properly on a strictly neutral basis.

BURMESTER NOT COMING.



Willy Burmester has decided not to come to America this season. It is almost impossible to get passage by way of Italy at present, the Scandinavian boats have become doubtful, and as a German subject Burmester cannot go via England, so his only hope of transportation would have been the Holland-American Line via Rotterdam. But Burmester is too much afraid of the mines to risk going by this line at this late date. Furthermore, he is fearful of not being able to return to Germany, even if he should reach America, and there would be, as a matter of fact, danger of his being apprehended by the British authorities. At any rate, the famous violinist has decided to postpone his American tour. He will give about thirty concerts in Germany for the benefit of the Red Cross, the first of which occurred at the Philharmonie in Berlin recently before a sold out house.

A VIOLIN PRIZE.

Following the piano contest which resulted in the appearance at Orchestra Hall, Chicago, last week, of Pasquale Tallarico, of Wilton, N. H., several violinists of Chicago, reports our office in that city, have resolved to give a similar prize for violin pupils of teachers of Chicago and other cities. A committee has been appointed to select a work for violin and orchestra suitable for such a purpose. The Clayton F. Summy Company, of Chicago, agrees to publish the work chosen should it be in manuscript. American composers—that is, composers who are citizens of this country—are invited to send manuscripts to Herbert Butler, Kimball Hall, Chicago. The work selected will be performed in the fall of 1915.

BOSTON MUSICIANS' CLUB HOUSE.

The Musicians' Mutual Relief Association of Boston has just built itself a new club house and headquarters in Boston at an expense approximating $170,000. The building contains the conveniences and appurtenances of a modern club house, and in addition a very beautifully decorated and finely planned music hall seating 1,000 persons. About 2,000 musicians belong to the association. A Mason & Hamlin piano has just been purchased by the association for this hall and it thus becomes the official piano of this body of musicians. That is a compliment indeed for the tonal value of the Mason & Hamlin.

Why Some Persons Avoid Music.

Have you ever heard the Bach violin concerto in E major? And having heard it, have you ever thought about it? Do you know what it means? Are you aware of what Bach had in mind when he wrote it? Do you think it is merely music, written to be enjoyed as tune, harmony, rhythm, and symmetrical construction? To answer to yourself all the foregoing questions you must read what Sir Hubert Parry has to say about the E major violin concerto by Bach. Sir Hubert Parry has this to say—and for saying it, no doubt, was made a "Sir": "What was most probably in Bach's mind was to make the subject which is given to the basses a kind of text or psychological entity which recurred persistently in the manner of what the French call happily an 'obsession,' to which the violin solo constantly discourses in answer, as though arguing the contention of the basses from different points of view. The great fascination which such movements exercise over people who are not essentially musical (as well as over those who are musical as well as poetical) lies in the fact that the form is psychological rather than essentially musical. The form is of the spirit rather than the letter. Bach spent a great part of his life feeling his way in this direction, and never till his last days quite made up his mind whether the usual mechanical view of form (the view based on distribution of keys and themes), or the view which puts the psychological scheme in the forefront, was the right one. But it is in his wonderful slow movements that he reveals the actual intention to use music as the vehicle of psychological concepts, and touches the fringe of the question, which was due to excite so much attention a century and a half later, of program music. The adagio movement in the violin concerto in E is particularly illuminative in this sense, and has even a dramatic character, owing to the very definite manner in which the dialogue is carried on."

With Interest.

At the "Lilac Domino," Andreas Dippel's opera comique venture, a baritone named Douthitt holds a high tone for thirty-five seconds. The other night Howard Shelley, press representative of the Century Opera, heard the singer, and remarked laconically: "If he held that note any longer it would go to protest."

False Cadence.

Arthur Hartmann and his family, like other Americans, left Paris at a few hours' notice in accordance with the request of our Ambassador there, and nearly all the Hartmann belongings remained behind, including Thérése, the faithful nurse and housekeeper. Last week the violinist received from Paris a large package sent by express and heavily insured, for which he had to pay all the charges, which were considerable. Accompanying the bundle was a letter. It read as follows:

"My Dear Master—I have stored all the furniture of your apartment, but before doing so, I made a careful search through boxes and drawers to see whether I could find anything that you might need over there. And what think you? Oh, oh, the carelessness of artists. And you so hard pressed for money when you left, because the banks would not give you any. What think you that I found? You never will guess. I am sending it to you in this package; because I know that you will need it. I found it in the lower drawer of the escritoire in the salon, and the drawer was not even locked. Oh, oh, Mr. Hartmann, I have often told you to be more careful. But do you know what I found? It was money. And do you know how much? I counted it. It was $600. Here it is, and pray, do be more careful in the future. It is fortunate that I am honest. If those furniture movers had seen it—oh, oh, oh! Your devoted, Thérése."

Hartmann opened the package guiltily. It contained exactly $600—in Confederate money.

Versatility.

A "fine old Southern family," advertising in an Alabama newspaper, writes: "Wanted—A Music Teacher who can also make beds and wash dishes. Knowledge of plain sewing and lawn-mowing also desired."—Century Opera Magazine.

We Support Ourself.

"He is a genius."

"Who supports him?"—Philadelphia Ledger.

Effects of War.

H. O. Osgood has just returned from the troubled seat of war and therefore he should be pardoned for inquiring whether the six piccolo players who stand up and do the "Stars and Stripes" variations in the Sousa Band, might not properly be called "The Piccolomini."

"How the Sousa audience always chortles for joy within itself," adds Mr. Osgood, "when these piccolos, the seven cornets, and the half dozen trombones come up to the front to thunder out the theme of the trio, with the two polyphonic themes which accompany it. The conservative musician may look upon this as only a Sousa trick, but the great bandmaster is in good company in bringing his men forward for this special effect. It is a Bayreuth tradition, followed also by the late Felix Mottl in the festival performances of Wagner in Munich, that in a certain passage in 'Siegfried' the four horns (unseen by the audience, of course, in the invisible orchestra) stand up and turn the bells of their instruments toward the audience in order to blare out a theme with special effect. Again, Gustav Mahler, in his eighth symphony, in the finales of both the first and second parts, calls for a brass orchestra of eight trumpets and eight trombones, the players of which stand up à la Sousa and thunder out their parts—so much so, in fact, that with the accompanying orchestra and full organ added, it is quite impossible to hear a single note from the chorus of over a thousand, who are doing their best to be heard above the instrumental racket."

ARRIOLA PADDLING HIS OWN CANOE.

Annotated Annotations.

In his program annotations written for the New York Symphony concert of last Sunday afternoon, Daniel Gregory Mason says that "the opening allegro of the Bach E major concerto is a solid piece in the contrapuntal style, all built upon the theme of three even notes (do, mi, sol) with which it starts." As far as we know the Bach E major concerto, it starts with E, G sharp, B, which would read mi, sol, si, in the Italian translation, but perhaps that is a minor point. However, the annotations should at least have made mention of the fact that the "Bach" E major violin concerto is a transcription by the revered Johann Sebastian Bach of a piano concerto by Vivaldi. Bach made no less than five of such adaptations.

Aiding President Wilson.

Of course there is only one thing to do this winter when Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto and Haydn's "Kaiser" quartet are played, and that is to play "God Save the King," the Russian anthem, and the "Marseillaise" between the movements of the Haydn and Beethoven works.

Accordion Bleats.

According to the Board of Appraisers at our Custom House, accordions are not toys under the existing American tariff laws. We always considered an accordion a weapon.

Retreat in Good Order.

So many German doctors of music have repudiated their English titles recently that—but you'll have to finish this paragraph for yourself. We thought there might be a joke in it, but blest if we can find any.

Chaconne á Son Gout.

Helen Ware was in a Western town last year when an earnest looking man crowded his way to the violinist's dressing room after her concert. "I'm a dance fiddler," he announced, "and I'm always looking for new tunes to play for fiddle alone. You're some musician. Do you know any tunes like that?"

"A dance tune for fiddle alone?"

"Yes."

"Bach's 'Chaconne' is the best one I know."

"Sounds a bit Dutch," remarked the Westerner, "but I'll give it a try." He jotted down the name carefully, which Miss Ware spelled for him.

"Is it a one step or a hesitation?" he asked.

"It will make them hesitate beautifully," was the reply.

This winter Miss Ware is to return to the man's town, and if he asks her for an explanation she intends to tell him that the chaconne is danced only in Philadelphia but she had forgotten to mention the circumstance.

Tired Business Man.

The foregoing reminds us of the naive auditor at the recital of a violinist who began his program with the Bach chaconne. After he had been playing for ten minutes or so, the naive one said: "Whew! I never before heard any one tune his fiddle that long."

Elevated Art.

Leo Slezak stands as high among the tenors as Max Pauer does among the pianists.

Berlin Humor.

When Germany was being overwhelmed with declarations of war in the early period of the present difficulties, a Berlin shoemaker, located in a rickety cellar establishment, scrawled a charcoal announcement over his door, reading: "Declarations of war received here."

What Did He Mean?

Harold Bauer brings back an amusing story from New South Wales. He says that at a reception given to him there the president of the local musical association made an address which he wound up as follows: "To those who have not heard Mr. Bauer, I would say that they should lose no time in doing so."

General Disability, Too?

Alberto Jonas will make our town more musical through his presence here. He is a pianist of parts and a teacher of rare skill. One of his best known pupils was little Pepito Arriola, who astonished this country a few years ago with wunderkind pianism of a diabolically advanced type. Mr. Jonas likes the peace and quiet which America is enjoying under President Wilson, and says that he left Europe solely because "that turbulent individual, General Uproar, is in supreme command over there just now."

Scraps of Paper.

To the white, orange, grey, blue and yellow papers issued by the various nations we now should like to see added a salmon pink paper put out by the Metropolitan Opera House explaining why "The Masked Ball" was dug out of its quiet and honorable grave in order to constitute the season's opening operatic attraction at the Metropolitan on November 16. The Only Sousa.

Despite the constant advocacy of numerous enthusiasts we have not gotten as far as the establishment of a national institution of music under public auspices, though we are the only large country of the world that has not; but if we have no public national institution of music we have a private one, very large and very important, nothing less than the best military band which exists—a band which knows how to play classical music as well as the ordinary poom-poom kind, and a band which makes a specialty of playing the most characteristic music which has yet been produced on this side of the ocean—the marches of John Philip Sousa. Certainly by this time the master leader and his band have every right to be regarded as a truly national institution.

Sousa's first New York concert of the season took place at the Hippodrome last Sunday evening, November 8. There was a big crowd and a tremendous amount of enthusiasm. There was a program, although at a Sousa concert one hardly needs to bother about the program, as the encores generally form the larger and more interesting part of the evening's music. However, on Sunday evening it was as follows:

Sixth Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Cornet solo, Neptune's Court (new) ..... Clarke
Herbert L. Clarke.
Suite, Impressions at the Movies (new) ..... Sousa
Soprano solo, The Crystal Lute (from The American Maid) ... Sousa
Virginia Root.
Picturesque scene, The Angelus ..... Massenet
Sheridan's Ride ..... Sousa
Shepherds Hey (new) ..... Grainger
March, The Lambs (new) ..... Sousa
Violin solo, Fantasie, Carmen ..... Sarasate
Marcel Gluck.
Overture to The Charlatan ..... Sousa

John Philip came upon the stage. Tremendous applause. The band started off with the inspiring measures of Liszt's rhapsody. Tremendous applause. "Hands Across the Sea." Tremendous applause. "Papa and Mama." Tremendous applause. Mr. Clarke played his new composition, "Neptune's Court," a melodious work, and, naturally, well calculated to show off his ability on his chosen instrument. Tremendous applause. Two more numbers from Mr. Clarke, the second the famous old "Carnival of Venice" variations. (One noticed it had been played so often that the card announcing it had all been worn away at the corner which the young negro takes hold of when he puts it upon the rack.) Then Sousa's new suite, "Impressions at the Movies," the second number of which, "The Crafty Villain and the Timid Maid," is a specially delightful thing, with the poignant and rugged two note theme descriptive of the evil doer. Tremendous applause. Two or three more encores. Tremendous applause. And so it went throughout the entire evening.

After the new march, "The Lambs," which promises to fill an honored place in the famous line of Sousa marches, the audience was not satisfied until they had had the "Stars and Stripes," "Manhattan Beach" and "El Capitan" in quick succession. A particularly ingenious thing was the fantasie on "Get Out and Get Under," played as an encore, in one of the variations of which there was, musically speaking, a most remarkably clever combination of this popular song with the best known of the Liszt rhapsodies, the second. By the way, the sixth rhapsody was described on the program as the "Pester Carnival." Not so. The "Pester Carnival" is the ninth of the rhapsodies.

As usual with Sousa, the soloists all were excellent in their respective way. Herbert L. Clarke, the cornet soloist, needs no new praise. Virginia Root has a very powerful and yet agreeable soprano voice and distinctly knows how to use it. Marcel Gluck is an accomplished violinist.

As for John Philip Sousa himself—to sum it up in three words, he is Sousa, and all the world knows what that means. All the old gestures are there and the results which they conjure forth from the splendid body of musicians who play under him are as fine as of yore, some of them even finer. There was, for instance, in Massenet's "Angelus" an effect produced on the clarinets in imitation of the staccato of the strings which was truly astonishing in its deceptiveness.

The great bandmaster surely had every reason to be highly delighted with the splendid reception which welcomed him back to New York at the beginning of yet another of his perennially successful seasons.

A Zoellner Quartet Medal.

Among string instrument quartets, one which does not fail to call forth spontaneous approval whenever it appears, is the Zoellner Quartet. This is, as press reports of its concerts from coast to coast unanimously verify, due to its excellent ensemble, intonation, attention to nuance, polished and temperamental readings.

This quartet is strictly a family organization, so far as its members are concerned, being made up of Joseph Zoellner, Sr., the father, viola; Antoinette Zoellner, first violin; Amandus Zoellner, second violin; Joseph Zoellner, Jr., violoncello, who is also a skillful pianist. Each of the Zoellners is likewise a soloist of a high order on his own particular instrument.

MEDAL PRESENTED TO THE ZOELLNER QUARTET BY THE COUNTESS OF FLANDERS.

With this article is reproduced a medal which was presented to the quartet by the Countess of Flanders, mother of the King of Belgium, who was herself a musician. It was made for the Zoellners especially and is of pure silver.

Percy Hemus' Courage.

Percy Hemus, the baritone, has a rooted conviction that many good songs are being turned out by American composers, and furthermore, he has the feeling that there is no reason why he should not sing them. Also Mr. Hemus appears to think that there is nothing criminal or even unethical in making up an entire program of such songs and performing them before a New York audience. If whole concerts are devoted to German music, Russian music, French music, Italian music, and Scandinavian music, why not an entire list devoted to American music?

The critic of the New York Sun differs from Mr. Hemus and in reviewing the concert given by that artist in Aeolian Hall, Friday evening, November 6, indulges in the appended ungermane and entirely superfluous reflections:

"Entertainments of this kind invite searching criticism, but there are reasons why comment, however, pointed it may be, need not be extended. In the first place, propagandism for American compositions is made most plentifully in ways which bring its sincerity into question. Hand in hand with such advocacy goes the repeated assertion that the hearer who cannot find it possible to commend all the twaddle which is published by native musicians is opposed to American genius and given over to the glorification of foreigners. Whenever opinion favors an American composition, it is right; when it condemns one, it is wrong.

"Obviously neither art nor patriotism can benefit thus. Nevertheless, whenever an American produces a really good work he is honored for it, for the excellent reason that in this country no one cares a farthing whence art comes so long as it is worthy. Mr. Hemus cannot ride into the sunlight of immortal fame by singing whole programs of American songs for two reasons, first, because so few of the songs are of the first rank, and second because the musical public cannot be aroused by such programs."

There is every reason why comment on a program of American compositions should be extended, particularly when they are as good as most of those rendered by Mr. Hemus at his fine recital. As his purpose was artistic and his intent sincere, why drag in references to the efforts of others who are not as idealistic in their views as Mr. Hemus? Propaganda always is to be commended when undertaken for a noble object and especially for one in need of support. If "no one cares a farthing whence art comes so long as it is worthy," why write two long winded paragraphs about the nationality of the works presented by Mr. Hemus? As a parting conclusion, one is forced to the belief that the Sun critic hardly can know whether or not Mr. Hemus will "ride into the sunlight of immortal fame" by singing the program he did.

Leaving aside the question of the sunlight of eternal fame, the fact remains that Mr. Hemus received splendid praise for his singing—even from the Sun critic—and pleased his hearers mightily. He is a baritone who has an unusual range of voice of exceptionally sympathetic quality, who obviously is familiar with the requirements of bel canto, and possesses before all things, reliable musicianship and a fine sense of interpretative values. He illustrated convincingly moods ranging from the lyric to the dramatic and accomplished also several incursions into the humorous, which met with a rousing response from the hearers.

As a matter of record, the Hemus program is given here in complete form:

Hail Ye Tyme of Holiedayes (Chrystmasse) ..... Gena Branscombe
There Was a King of Liang (from the Chinese) .. Gena Branscombe
I Am the God Thor (King Olaf) ..... Carl Busch
How Long and Dreary (from Sprays of Heather) . Edna Rosalind Park
There Was a Bonnie Lass (from Sprays of Heather),
Edna Rosalind Park
Invictus ..... Bruno Huhn
The Day Is Done ..... Chas. Gilbert Spross
The Pirate Song ..... Henry F. Gilbert
When I Bring to You Colored Toys ..... John Alden Carpenter
When to Sleep I Must ..... [illegible]
The Fiddler of Dooney ..... M[illegible]
The Forgotten Land ..... Harriet Ware
(Accompanied by String Quartet.)
Flower Rain ..... Edwin Schneider
The Drink of Life (MS.) ..... Mary Helen Brown
Mexicana (MS.) ..... Ward-Stephens
Identity (MS.) ..... Emil Hahn
Mother o' Mine ..... Arthur Claassen
(Accompanied by String Quartet.)
Alois Trnka, first violin; Gerard Reidy, second violin;
Bernard Schmidt, viola; Josef Gotsch, cello.
Con Amore ..... Fay Foster
Peace, Ye Martyred Ones (MS.) ..... Fay Foster
(Written for and dedicated to Mr. Hemus.)
I Dreamed and Wept Dreaming ..... A. Walter Kramer
Two trivial songs—
Wind and Lyre ..... Harriet Ware

In none of the foregoing numbers was there apparent any of the frantic striving for "modern" effects which one notices so often in the current output from abroad. Mr. Hemus' list of pieces nearly all had melodiousness and genuineness of expression to recommend them. The Branscombe creative vein is of agreeable caliber. Carl Busch handles his material like the master musician one knows him to be. Bruno Huhn's "Invictus" represents a lofty flight into the dramatic, with a tremendous climacteric support. Spross' and Carpenter's songs are of uncommon fineness in texture and sentiment. Harriet Ware long ago has established her position as a writer of melodic fecundity and subtle discriminativeness. Schneider's "Flower Rain" was encored, and deservedly so, for it is a remarkably delicate tonal lyric. Fay Foster's "Peace" revealed virile force and large imaginativeness.

Mr. Hemus made a profound impression upon his audience and, to judge by their unfailing applause, they endorsed him without stint in his desire to make known good songs—even though they may be written by those unspeakable culprits, the American composers.

Sears' Organ Recital.

On Monday evening, November 2, S. Wesley Sears, organist of St. James' Church, Philadelphia, gave a recital at Grace Church, Haddonfield, N. J. His numbers were as follows: "Marche Pittoresque," Kroeger; "Andante Grazioso," Smart; "Entr'acte Gavotte," Thomas; aria, "Lord God of Abraham," from "Elijah," Mendelssohn; "Cantique d'Amour," Strang; "Minuet," Beethoven; fugue in E flat, "St. Ann's," Bach; "At Evening," Kinder; intermezzo, Callaerts; baritone solo, "Babylon," Watson; largo, Handel; "Grand Offertoire de Ste. Cecilia," Batiste.

As was his due, Mr. Sears was received with enthusiasm, and his work on this occasion was in keeping with the high standard which he has set for himself. This enthusiasm was especially marked after the playing of the familiar largo by Handel, and the Beethoven minuet.

Henry Ullrich, baritone, assisted Mr. Sears, singing the aria, "Lord God of Abraham," from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and "Babylon," by Watson.

Lennon Returns to Houston.

Emmet Lennon, the concert tenor, has returned to Houston, Tex., and will continue to give vocal instruction. Mr. Lennon specializes in preparing singers for church, concert and operatic work. His studios are located at Diehl's Conservatory, Rusk and Austin streets.

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE PROGRAM.

Zimbalist in Role of Composer and Soloist At Fourth Pair of Concerts—Other Quaker City Musical News

Philadelphia, November 7, 1914.

Efrem Zimbalist passed in review both as composer and violin virtuoso at the fourth pair of concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the Academy of Music this week. Substituting for Mme. Stokowski, who is unfortunately indisposed, Zimbalist played Max Bruch's concerto in G minor, and two numbers from his own suite of national dances—the "Hebrew" and "Polish."

Zimbalist long ago won his laurels as a performer. If his contribution to this week's program is any criterion, he is predestined to still greater fame as a composer. Both pieces are gems of melody and bear the distinct racial stamp. Zimbalist exhibited quite as masterly and fluent technic in their composition as in their performance. Powers of an even higher order were revealed by the soloist, however, in the Bruch concerto. In the memorable adagio of this work—surely one of the wonder works of the last century—Zimbalist attained the loftiest heights of his art. He held his audience in a manner attained by few instrumentalists and made this supreme work of the Cologne master a thing of forceful meaning to many who have heard it but knew it not.

Zimbalist shows increased maturity every year and herein probably lies the explanation of his growing popularity. Technically, he is becoming each year more conscientious; his tone is warmer, fuller and capable of exquisite shading; his whole performance was clear, precise, impressive.

Schumann's symphony in E flat, the "Rhenish," was Stokowski's initial number. Entirely without the assistance of score (as usual), Stokowski gave an excellent reading of this entertaining work. With its brief periods, its easy melody, and the "modern" inclination of many of its harmonies, this work has ready at hand all the elements which go for making wide and lasting popularity. It was enthusiastically received at both concerts this week, and it was well played, particularly the solemn fourth movement.

In marked contrast were the tone poem, "Finlandia," of Jean Sibelius, and Tschaikowsky's "Marche Slav," which completed the program. The former composition was played here for the first time.

Amato With Boston Symphony.

Pasquale Amato, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its first local concert of the season at the Academy of Music last Monday evening, November 2. Amato sang the "Qui donc commande" aria from "Henry VIII" and "Ombra mai fù" from Handel's "Serse." These numbers of varying moods were sung by the distinguished baritone in forceful and appropriate style. The orchestral offerings were Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Strauss' "Don Juan" tone poem and Smetana's "Sold Bride" overture.

Philadelphia Notes.

Arthur Woodruff was last week chosen as conductor of the Eurydice Chorus for this season. Mrs. Leopold Stokowski has been made vice-president. It is also announced that the regular concerts of the organization will be given on January 13 and April 14.

It was with deep regret that Philadelphia musicians learned last week that Eugen Klee, for many years a well known choral director in this city, is to leave here to become director of the Arion Singing Society of Brooklyn. Mr. Klee is to take up his new work immediately.

An interesting novelty in the shape of Handel's overture to "Arminius" will be offered by Leopold Stokowski at next week's concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Frank Gittelson, the young Philadelphia violinist, who is entering upon an American tour which promises to be as successful as his European appearances, is announced by Charles Augustus Davis for a recital in the Academy of Music on November 10. On November 13 and 14 Gittelson is to play the Brahms concerto with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

Horatio Connell, baritone, and Mae Farley, soprano, will be the soloists at the Choral Society's presentation of "The New Life" under the direction of Henry Gordon Thunder at the Academy of Music on November 19.

John McCormack is to give a recital in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, December 2.

Gittelson Plays Bach.

Frank Gittelson surmounted distressing obstacles last Sunday afternoon, November 8, at Aeolian Hall, when he played the Bach E major violin concerto against a surprisingly uneven and untuneful accompaniment, which might have appalled a performer less musical and less sure of himself. Pardonably nervous, the young artist became palpably more and more disconcerted when he felt the lack of harmony between his intentions and the execution of the leader and the orchestra, and at times the ensemble assumed dangerous instability, through no fault of the soloist, however.

Gittelson revealed the same facility of finger and bow which he had displayed in Philadelphia a week previous, when he rendered the Lalo concerto, and again his tone had decided sweetness, his phrasing was smooth and musical, and his temperament reflected warmth. Too much cannot be said in praise of his choice of the Bach concerto as his medium for the New York debut. It proved that he is willing to make his appeal on the most legitimate lines only and disdaining the easier path along which lie the sure triumphs that go with virtuoso compositions set forth with surface brilliance. Gittelson read his music with dignity, with fine regard for its scope and purpose, and with full appreciation of its violinistic content. He was rewarded with resounding applause and had to bow his acknowledgments at least half a dozen times.

The orchestra played Bantock's "The Pierrot of the Minute," which is a skillful and pleasing work; Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, and Elgar's "Cockaigne," a work containing slow music, quick music, loud music, and soft music. The symphony was read in a manner too assertive for its simple and ingratiating content.

Bergman's Gennaro.

Gustaf Bergman's portrayal of the role of Gennaro in the recent production by the Century Opera Company of Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna" is tellingly set forth in the following New York criticisms:

BERGMAN'S GENNARO A STRONG FEATURE OF CENTURY COMPANY'S PERFORMANCE.

Of the individual singers, highest praise belongs to Gustaf Bergman for a very impressive performance of the role of Gennaro. His excellence was due to a fine gift of characterization and a sincerity that kept his sense of the role always on firm foundation.

He was able to send across the footlights a very real conception of the shifting emotional state of the rather heavy witted blacksmith, caught up in a whirl of passion he does not quite understand and driven dazedly into a sacrilege his real self recoils from in horror. Altogether his was a performance that few tenors before this public could have equalled.—Times.

GUSTAF BERGMAN, OF THE CENTURY OPERA COMPANY, As Gennaro in Wolf-Ferrari's "Jewels of the Madonna."

BERGMAN ROYALLY GREETED.

. . . The big audience was alive from the start. It clapped Bergman's first entrance and his duet of the blacksmith with Miss Howard as the mother. . . . In simple Gennaro's death, Bergman was simply magnificent.—Evening Sun.

. . . Gustaf Bergman, only two or three days off the steamer, was a Gennaro not to be overlooked in any opera company as to voice and action.—Evening World.

Mr. Bergman resumed the role of Gennaro, in which he did so well last year. Mr. Bergman is one of the best artists the Century Company has numbered in its ranks. His vivid, powerful impersonation last evening was the feature of the performance.—Globe.

Bergman proved last season that he was ideally fitted for the part of Gennaro. . . . His Teutonic restraint and intelligence, combined with an Italian quality of tone make him an excellent representative of similar dual characteristics in Wolf-Ferrari himself. Bergman is unquestionably a great artist, and one from whom many a tenor, in more pretentious surroundings, might learn a valuable lesson. It has been a long time since we have had such a combination of singing and acting as he presented last evening.—Evening Mail.

As the moody, love-sick Gennaro, Mr. Bergman was most capable. This was his first appearance since his arrival from Europe, and his efforts were received with hearty enthusiasm.—Commercial Traveller.

Mr. Bergman, the tenor, whose Gennaro breathed life and truth, a role easily weakened or melodramatically exaggerated, must be named first. From a dramatic standpoint, uncommonly effective and affecting, vocally simply complete, it seemed as if the virile resonant voice of the singer had grown since last year, as if this art had grown in subtler finish.—Staats Zeitung (translation).

Gustaf Bergman, whose pleasing virile tenor, and whose forceful characterization suited the Gennaro, deserves highest praise. He rose with this delivery not only above his environment, but also above the average of opera tenors.—Abendblatt (translation). (Advertisement.)

Century Sunday Night Concert.

An excellent popular concert was heard at the Century Opera House, New York, on Sunday evening, November 8. An unusually large and enthusiastic audience was in attendance.

Maude Santley was heard to advantage in Braga's "La Serenata," with violin obligato played by Hugo Riesenfeld. "Caro Nome," from "Rigoletto," was beautifully sung by Florence Macbeth. This marked Miss Macbeth's first appearance at a Sunday night concert at this house, and she was received with hearty and spontaneous applause, and was forced to give two encores.

Orville Harrold sang Fay Foster's nocturne and "I'm Falling in Love with Someone," from "Naughty Marietta," scoring his unusual success. The fine bass voice of Henry Welden was particularly effective in the serenade from "Faust." Thomas Chalmers, feeling somewhat indisposed, sang Harriet Ware's "Boat Song" instead of "Largo al Factotum," from the "Barber of Seville," as scheduled. A duet, "Love and War," as sung by Hardy Williamson and Alfred Kaufman, had to be repeated, as did also the quartet from "Rigoletto," the singers being Florence Macbeth, Elizabeth Campbell, Thomas Chalmers and Hardy Williamson.

The opening number by the orchestra was the overture to "Oberon" (Weber) which was followed by the second Hungarian rhapsody by Liszt, the ballet suite from "Sylvia" completing the first half of the program. Johann Strauss' waltz, "Vienna Blood," began the second half of the program, and Berlioz's "Hungarian March" marked the finale of the evening's enjoyment. The conductors were Josef Pasternack, Hugo Riesenfeld and Alexander Smallens.

The last Sunday concert of the season will be given next Sunday evening, November 15.

Mme. Leblanc-Maeterlinck to William Thorner.

William Thorner, the vocal teacher, who recently arrived from Paris and opened his studio at 2130 Broadway, New York, counts among his pupils Georgette Leblanc-Maeterlinck, from whom he recently received the following letter showing the esteem in which this distinguished artist holds her master. The letter herewith reproduced is a translation from the original one in French, and is published by permission of Mr. Thorner:

Abbaye de St. Wandrille,
Seine-Inferieure, September 28, 1914.

My Dear Maestro:—How sorry I am to know that you are so far away. After having addressed two letters and a dispatch, and waiting for an answer, I became most anxious and telegraphed to your concierge. I received your New York address from him at once.

I understand perfectly that you could not remain in Paris, but why did you return to America when victory is so near? Then there will be in France a renewal of strength, vitality and art. Will you not come back? Must we abandon hope of again having the benefit of your unique instruction? I can never find adequate words to express my regret and disappointment.

Up to now, I have used my voice very little, as I depended upon you. I had occasion to sing before sincere friends of mine who marveled at the progress that I made with you. I shall try to continue following your principles of instruction, but you know that I attribute to you a "magnetic" power. Under your guidance one cannot fail. The change in my voice is especially noticeable in the three pieces which I studied with you, to such degree that I endeavor to imitate the sonority which I produced in the role of Iphigenie. But you know I still have need of you and I am hoping for your prompt return.

Au revoir, my dear maestro. M. Maeterlinck wishes to be most kindly remembered to you; and I beg you to believe in my profound and friendly appreciation.

(Signed) Georgette Leblanc-Maeterlinck.

LEONARD BORWICK, Great English Pianist

Unequaled Success at his New York Recital. Comments from the New York Daily Press:

BORWICK HEARD IN PIANO RECITAL.

ARTIST AN EXCEPTION AMONG A TOO NUMEROUS CLASS THIS YEAR.

It will be better that many concert givers should content themselves with the applause of friends than that they should be measured by standards set up by duty toward real art and real artists. High merit is not likely to be overlooked by those capable of recognizing it.

Leonard Borwick, an English pianist, gave a recital in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. He is a seasoned player and an artist, who caused a considerable expression of surprise among the knowing when he appeared here in the fag-end of the season two years ago. New York had acquired a habit of thinking that it knew by name, at least, every artist, foreign as well as native, that was worth knowing. Expecting little from the newcomer and receiving much, it received a shock of surprise, but a pleasant shock, for New York's interests and sympathies are not narrow or selfish. Yesterday Mr. Borwick received a dignified welcome and the kind of appreciation that a serious artist, who knows nothing of ad captandum tricks, is entitled to. He played an unconventional program, not one feature of which had been chosen to display a specialized quality or style, though, for students, it had an historical interest. There was at the opening a Bach fugue translated into the modern pianoforte idiom by the player; a rondo by Beethoven (in G, op. 51, No. 2), which spoke the language of tonal beauty in conventional phrase and essayed no emotional preachment; then three short pieces by Scarlatti, charming illustrations of the harpsichord style as developed in Italy, and valuable as showing how much volubility of finger and sense of symmetry was demanded of the harpsichord players of two centuries ago. Thus the old, the classic period in its best sense was closed. Then came the composition which Mr. Borwick had evidently chosen to be the center of gravity in his afternoon's work: Brahms' sonata in F minor, in which the spirit of classicism and the spirit of romanticism meet and embrace and are wedded in as noble a union as the post-Schumann art has yet disclosed. Finally there came Paderewski's theme and variations in A major, a serenade (op. 3, No. 5), by Rachmaninoff, and Liszt's "Concert Study" in F minor.

Mr. Borwick's playing is not sentimental, and in this and his disregard of sensuous beauty of tone he opens himself to the accusation of being an academic player. In a noble sense he was academic in Bach, Beethoven and Scarlatti; but he showed the Brahms poetic fibre in the sonata—strength, sincerity, tenderness. He may not be a player for schoolgirls; he is for men and women.—H. E. Krehbiel in New York Tribune, November 6, 1914.

Leonard Borwick, an English pianist of renown, who won hearty praise here for his playing in a recital at Carnegie Hall a year or two ago, gave a recital in that hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Borwick's main offering was the Brahms sonata in F minor, and his performance of the work was one of the finest achievements by any pianist heard here in recent years. The physical qualities of tonal beauty and mechanical mastery were combined in it with a depth and warmth of feeling that made the reading one of those rare ones to which the term poetic can be applied without reserve. The andante and the intermezzo were in particular of surpassing loveliness. Mr. Borwick was heard also in pieces by Bach, Beethoven, Scarlatti, Paderewski, Rachmaninoff and Liszt. Throughout the recital his playing was uncommon pleasure to an audience which, if moderate in size, was gratefully appreciated.—New York Evening Globe, November 6, 1914.

MR. BORWICK'S RECITAL.

THE ENGLISH PIANIST REAPPEARS AFTER THREE YEARS IN CARNEGIE HALL.

About three years ago Leonard Borwick appeared in Carnegie Hall and gave a recital that surprised and delighted a handful of listeners, few of whom probably knew this English pianist even by reputation. For he came without any of the preliminary heralding that often announces the fame of lesser men. It appeared that he was on his way from Australia to England and gave his concert here as he was passing through. He passed on and was heard no more.

Mr. Borwick appeared again yesterday at Carnegie Hall, giving the first of three projected recitals, and again showed that he is a pianist of the highest accomplishment, an artist of singular individuality, gifted with poetic vision, but essentially sound and wholesome in all that he does. There is nothing to be allowed for the idiosyncrasies of virtuososhiip, for any obtrusion of the player's personality, in Mr. Borwick's performance. It is first and foremost an interpretation of the composer's meaning and intention.

The most significant feature of his playing is a certain vitality, a stimulating quality that charges it and gives it a ceaseless fascination, no matter what he undertakes. His program yesterday began with his own arrangement of an organ fugue in G minor by Bach—not the one that Liszt arranged—played with consummate clearness in the leading of the voices and with a finely felt molding of its former structure; Beethoven's rondo in G, op. 51, No. 2; three "harpsichord lessons" by Domenico Scarlatti, which he played in exactly the right spirit of debonair brilliancy, and Brahms' sonata in F minor, op. 5, a work whose beauty, poetry and true grandeur are not staled by the passage of years, and which stands forth today as one of his greater compositions, though one of his earliest. Mr. Borwick's performance of it was the crowning achievement of his recital. Some may have wished for a little more repose in the first movement, especially in its opening chords, and a little more definite composition of the rhythm there. But there were warmth of feeling, the pulse of life, an impulsive vigor, and in the andante and its echoing intermezzo a poignant tenderness of poetical feeling.

For his last group there were Paderewski's "Theme Varie," op. 16, No. 3; a serenade by Rachmaninoff, op. 3, No. 5, and Liszt's "Etude de Concert" in F minor.—The New York Times, November 6, 1914.

MR. BORWICK'S RECITAL.

PLAYING BY A PIANIST OF VIRILE AND ARTISTIC STYLE.

Leonard Borwick, an Australian pianist, who made his first appearance in this city in December, 1911, has returned and gave his first recital yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. His program, as on the occasion of his debut, was by no means conventional. It consisted of a Bach organ fugue in G minor, arranged by Mr. Borwick; Beethoven's rondo in G, op. 51, No. 2; an allegro in B minor, tempo di ballo in D and presto in G by Scarlatti, the great F minor sonata of Brahms, Paderewski's "Theme Varie" in A, Rachmaninoff's "Serenade," op. 3, No. 5, and Liszt's concert study in F minor.

Here is a piano recital program without the Chopin group, which the typical artist regards as essential to popularity. Also it was a thoroughly interesting program, albeit the essence of its interest might have been lamentably diluted by playing of a less individual character than that of Mr. Borwick. This is a pianist who ought to grow in general favor and whose concerts ought to command the attention not only of connoisseurs of piano playing, but of music lovers in general.

Mr. Borwick's art is above all things sane and healthy, but this does not mean that it lacks true romantic quality or those charms of sensuous beauty without which piano playing becomes a dry proceeding. The highest qualities of Mr. Borwick's art were disclosed in the Brahms sonata. He interpreted this composition with dignity, with virility, with fine sentiment and with admirable beauty of tone and technic.

The brilliant proclamation of the first movement, instinct with power and passion, was paired with the nobly tender and sustained reading of the slow movement. The playing of the andante was one of those achievements which make the most potent appeal for the recognition of the piano as a means of eloquent musical utterance. It was in the sonata, too, that Mr. Borwick compelled the admiration of students of the instrument for the adequacy of his technic. Few pianists know as well as he how to evoke from the strings their deepest and richest sonority without approaching exaggeration. And clarity marches in company with all that he does.

In the Scarlatti numbers rapid, scintillating, complicated passages rippled in crisp showers, while every significant item in the counterpoint was perfectly brought out. It was always brought out just enough, and never too much. A fine sense of proportion is one of the striking traits of Mr. Borwick's musical organization. In short here is a man whose playing impresses the hearer by its splendid vitality, while at the same time it wins the most fastidious auditor by the thoughtful composition of its style, the judicious adjustment of details to the general interpretation, the presentation of nice balance in melodic voices to the end that principal and subsidiary thoughts are published fully and in their proper relations.

Doubtless the leaning of Mr. Borwick away from much of that which is accepted as emotional, but which is perhaps rather to be called lachrymose, will operate to make his friends few among the excessively sentimental; but among women who have not altogether too many nerves and men whose hearts are sound, whose vision is still good and whose breathing is normal, he ought to find great and lasting favor.—The Morning Sun, November 6, 1914.

BORWICK LEADS DAY OF BRITISH POETS.

With only the fleeting record of a day in New York on his way from Australia years ago, the English pianist, Leonard Borwick, came again around the world to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon and found those who remembered him. He is a great pianist, who looks and acts simply like a man. If he plays with a poet's heart and hand, his years of discretion date from a London Philharmonic debut in 1890, while his schooling goes back to six Frankfort years with Clara Wieck, widow of the composer Schumann.

Borwick began with the three B's, Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, interspersed with Scarlatti, Liszt, Rachmaninoff and Paderewski. The so called "little" fugue in G minor by Bach was Borwick's arrangement. After Beethoven's rondo, three "harpsichord lessons" of Italian Scarlatti were lessons indeed, as the Austrian Halpersen declared, "not to play them unless you played as Borwick can."

Brahms' sonata in F minor was a superb performance, marked by a crescendo in the "moonlight" passage from the poet Sternau that was like the flood of circled lamps from Carnegie's ceiling upon a dark stage below. After Paderewski's variations conjuring a vision of personality, Rachmaninoff's serenade of Oriental lilt and a Liszt concert study, Borwick gave as encores a quite unknown "Pedal Study" of Schumann and the "Spring Song" of Mendelssohn.—W. B. Chase in the Evening Sun, November 6, 1914.

A RECITAL BY LEONARD BORWICK.

A piano recital with Chopin left out seems almost an anomaly, but such a recital was given by Leonard Borwick, the English pianist, at Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon. Mr. Borwick studiously avoided any highly emotional music, so it is at present impossible to give more than a one sided estimate of his playing. Possibly at his next recital at Carnegie Hall, on November 24, his program will be made up entirely of romantic composers.

Three names of the romantic school did figure on his program: Paderewski, Rachmaninoff and Liszt, but no one of the three numbers was more than moderately emotional. Mr. Borwick's playing of all three was admirable. He has a beautiful tone, a splendid technic—nowadays this is practically taken for granted—and a highly intelligent and musical grasp of his work. It was a great pleasure to hear him play Paderewski's delightful Theme varie in A major. The finale is superb and suggests by its characteristic color Paderewski's later work, the "Polish Fantasie." Little by little, pianists are realizing that the great Polish pianist's works are valuable additions to their own programs, and such playing as Mr. Borwick's, yesterday, will certainly help to popularize Paderewski's compositions. Admirable, too, was his playing of the familiar, but always welcome, "Etude de Concert," in F minor, by Liszt; and Rachmaninoff's "Serenade" was equally interesting. This serenade is suggestive of Spain, but a Spain seen curiously tinged by Russian color.

The rest of Mr. Borwick's program comprised his own arrangement of Bach's organ fugue in G minor, the familiar rondo in G, by Beethoven, three "Harpsichord Lessons," by Scarlatti, and Brahms' F minor sonata. In the Brahms sonata Mr. Borwick's happiest moments were in the more poetic portions of the work, the andante and the intermezzo. The andante, which is built around the lines of a love poem, fails to convey the passion of the words, but Mr. Borwick made the most of its gentle phrases. The Bach fugue was built up to a fine climax, with splendid solidity. Of all this first part of the recital, the fugue, despite its somewhat antiquated form, was by far the most modern work. At the end of the concert Mr. Borwick added several encores.—New York Evening Post, November 6, 1914.

PIANIST DELIGHTS HEARERS.

LEONARD BORWICK GIVES EFFECTIVE RECITAL IN CARNEGIE HALL.

One of the least known of the great pianists, Leonard Borwick, who has not been heard here in three years, gave a recital in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, and the audience expressed its approval emphatically. Mr. Borwick began his program with an arrangement of his own of Bach's organ fugue in G minor, and as Bach's arrangements go it was a good one. He was at his best in the Beethoven rondo in G, op. 51, No. 2, which followed. There is nothing obtrusive about his playing. Sensationalism is entirely lacking. He makes no use of long hair or dim lights to attract his hearers. A wide range of tonal effects and of dynamics, added to a highly developed finger technic, were disclosed in the way he played the Beethoven rondo. There also was a strong emotional element. Three brilliant harpsichord lessons of Scarlatti, an allegro, a tempi di ballo and a presto, closed his first group.

The most important number was Brahms' sonata in F monor, op. 5. Except in the hands of a real artist, much of the piano music of Brahms is pretty dull. But there was nothing dull in the sonata yesterday. Particularly beautiful was the reposeful playing in the andante movement. The interpretation always was clear. Wherever rapid fingering was used it was smooth and clear, and the melodies in the inner parts were brought out with unusual skill.

In the third and last group Mr. Borwick played Paderewski's theme varie in A major, op. 16, No. 3; Rachmaninoff's serenade, op. 3, No. 4, and Liszt's "Etude de Concert," in F minor. Altogether it was an interesting program, effectively played.—New York Herald, November 6, 1914.

AMERICAN COMPOSITIONS HAVE A HEARING IN CHICAGO.

Works By Native Writers Performed Under Most Favorable Auspices—Chicago Symphony Orchestra Begins Series of Popular Concerts—Pavlowa Prize Won By Local Musicians—Blackstone Monday Musicales—Other Current Events and Mention.

Chicago, Ill., November 7, 1914.

The first American concert of the season given by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Glenn Dillard Gunn, took place at Orchestra Hall on Monday evening, November 2. The soloists were Chris Anderson, baritone, and Pasquale Tallarico, pianist. The program included the overture to "Zenobia," by Coerne, and an aria from the same opera, sung by Mr. Anderson. On this occasion these two numbers had their first performances in Chicago. This was followed by a serenade for orchestra (also a novelty) by the Chicago composer, Eric Delamarter. Then Mr. Anderson was heard in a group of songs, including "Golden Eyes," by Freer, Kramer's nocturne, and the "Pilgrimage," by Arthur Dunham. After the intermission the MacDowell concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor was played by Mr. Tallarico. The orchestra was heard also in Hadley's "Angelus" and "A Southern Fantasy," by Humiston.

Mr. Gunn was the bright star of the night, and American composers of this and future generations will owe a debt of gratitude to this Chicago pianist, who, as much as any one else in the country, has helped the cause of American music not only by virtue of his pen and baton, but also for having many times gone out of his way to give lectures in the interests of American music. Looking over the program one is impressed by the many novelties presented, as nearly each number had on this occasion its first performance in Chicago, and at the next concert other novelties are promised. Thus the American composer will hear his work performed by one of the best orchestras in the world and under the direction of a very talented conductor. Mr. Gunn was, one or two years ago, a novice at the conductor's desk, but today he is a full fledged leader. His beat is decisive, his readings are sane and at all times he had his orchestra well in hand.

The overture to "Zenobia" was given a spirited reading and opened the program most auspiciously. This overture was received with spontaneous applause, yet the aria from the same opera which followed, impressed only moderately. It might be that Chris Anderson, a local baritone, who sang it, was somewhat responsible for its poor reception. Mr. Anderson is not the best exponent of American music that could have been selected, his enunciation of the English text being inaudible, at least to one auditor. Mr. Anderson's reading of this aria and of three other songs by American composers was in every respect artistic, but vocally he left much to be desired. The Delamarter serenade for orchestra, which is divided into four parts—a prelude, snapshots (burlesque variations), song and scherzo —clearly reveals the composer's keen sense of humor. Eleanor Everest Freer's "Golden Eyes" won much applause, being one of the best vocal compositions from the pen of the versatile Chicago woman, who has done so much for American music. The nocturne by Kramer had little to recommend it. Not so the Dunham "Pilgrimage," an exceptionally good song which should be inscribed on many programs. It made a deserved hit.

Pasquale Tallarico, pupil of Rafael Joseffy, was heard in the MacDowell concerto. Mr. Tallarico, who earned the honor of his appearance at this concert by winning the first prize in competition with thirty-five pianists from all parts of the country and who has received his entire training in America, was quite the hero of the night. Equipped with a facile and sure technic, Mr. Tallarico's playing is clear cut and velvety. He drew from his instrument tones of great beauty and played the concerto remarkably well. Such a performance would have been a credit to many a professional pianist, and the vociferous applause that shook the hall at the close of the number was fully deserved. The young artist was recalled to the platform time after time, and his future will be closely watched by all those who were present at his debut in Chicago.

The Hadley "Angelus," built on the same lines as Bizet's "Arlesienne," awoke but little enthusiasm; likewise the Humiston "Southern Fantasy," which closed the program.

As a matter of record, it might be added that the audience was large and included many of Chicago's leading musicians.

First "Pop" at Orchestra Hall.

The first of a series of six popular concerts given by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, under Frederick Stock, conductor, took place in Orchestra Hall on Thursday evening, November 5. The house was practically sold out—this due to the coöperation of the City Club of Chicago and the Civic Music Association. Tickets for this concert were on sale during the two weeks at various settlement houses throughout the city. The program consisted of selections that are sure to find response from the music lovers and laymen alike. The first "pop" of the season presaged well for the five following, and it may be that in a year or so popular programs will be performed more frequently and that twelve concerts will be given during the symphonic season.

Chicagoans Win Pavlowa Prize.

As the Musical Courier announced recently, two Chicagoans have won prizes offered by Anna Pavlowa, the dancer, for modern ballroom music. One of them is Edward C. Moore, the music critic of the Chicago Journal. Mr. Moore won a $500 prize with a dance to be called "Pavlowana." The other Chicagoan, Harry R. Auracher, divides a $500 prize with H. B. Ackley, of Waukesha. The third prize of a similar amount was won by Philip I. Jacoby, of San Francisco. Two hundred and eighty-three composers entered the competition. Mr. Moore has been a member of the Chicago Musical College faculty for the past three years. He is a graduate of Yale University.

Harry Auracher, the other local prize winner, is a student of the Chicago Musical College, where he pursued his work in composition under the direction of Felix Borowski, a composer of international reputation.

Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler's Twenty-fifth Year Under Neumann.

Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler will be heard in a piano recital at the Illinois Theatre next Sunday afternoon, November 15, under the direction of F. Wight Neumann. This season will mark the twenty-fifth year that Mrs. Zeisler has given her Chicago recital under the direction of Mr. Neumann.

Amy Emerson Neill's Recital.

The violin recital of Amy Emerson Neill, at the Fine Arts Theatre, Sunday afternoon, November 1, was a delight to all its hearers. Miss Neill is a performer of exceptional talent, which she shows to have been developed along the very best lines. In the beginning of her program Miss Neill won the admiration of her audience by an excellent rendition of Mozart's concerto in D major. Her second number consisted of three selections, the last of which, "The Chase," by Cartier-Kreisler, deserves mention. The music is very suggestive of the title, but Miss Neill's dainty handling of the theme made it more so. A repetition was demanded. The closing number, Wieniawski's "Faust" fantasie, was excellently done, especially in Gounod's most beautiful strains where the playing was really inspiring. It is not often that a violinist so thoroughly pleasing is heard; she combines artistic playing with youth, charm and graciousness. She was very generous with encores.

Helen Ware-Marie Edwards Joint Recital.

Next Sunday afternoon, at the Blackstone Theatre, Helen Ware, violinist, and Marie Edwards, pianist, will be heard in a joint recital. On this occasion the sonata in A minor for violin and piano, by Akos von Buttykay, will be played for the first time in Chicago. The other numbers on the program are well arranged and the recital should prove an interesting event.

Harry Weisbach in Recital.

Harry Weisbach, one of Chicago's leading violinists, gave his annual recital last Thursday evening, at Orchestra Hall. His program consisted of numbers seldom heard here, the most pretentious of which were concertos by Vivaldi and Dvorák, and Beethoven's romance in G, which were capably rendered. These were followed by selections of a lighter vein, and varied enough to show Mr. Weisbach's versatility with his instrument. Yet the total unfamiliarity of the program seemed not fully to satisfy the audi-

Metropolitan Artist Series.

The next recital in the Metropolitan Artist Series will be given by Helen Bright Bengel, contralto, with Edgar Nelson, accompanist. Ethel Burket Russell, pianist, will be the assisting artist.

Giuseppe Fabbrini to Give Recital.

Jessamine E. Allen, Western manager of the Henry C. Lahee Bureau of Music, will present the Italian pianist, Giuseppe Fabbrini, in a recital on Friday evening, November 13, at the Auditorium Hotel. He will be assisted by Iva Bigelow Weaver, soprano; Alberto Salvi, harpist, and Beatrice Baxter McClure, dramatic reader.

Concert of Amateur Musical Club.

At the 436th concert given by the Amateur Musical Club, in Assembly Hall, Fine Arts Building, on Monday afternoon, November 2, the program was furnished by Llora Withers Biggs, soprano. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler gave a very interesting little talk on "The Public and Its Attitude Toward the American Musician," and George P. Upton's elongated lecture on "The Song, Its Birth and Evolution" was also well received. Agnes Lapham, pianist, concluded the program with the Strauss-Tausig "Waltz Caprice." The president's reception followed, at which refreshments were served.

Monday Blackstone Musicales.

The fourth season of the Monday Blackstone Musicales will be inaugurated on Monday, November 9, and will continue every other Monday during the winter season at 11 o'clock a. m., in the Crystal Ballroom of the Blackstone. This year they will be given under the auspices of the Music League of America, which organization has its headquarters in New York City, with branch organizations being established in other large cities. The officers and directors of the Music League of America are as follows: Mrs. H. O. Havemeyer, president; Mrs. Willard D. Straight, first vice-president; Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, second vice-president; Mrs. Linzee Blagden, third vice-president; Mr. Dave Hennen Morris, secretary; Mr. Alvin W. Krech, treasurer. Directors: Malvina Hoffman, Mrs. John Henry Hammond, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Rawlins Cottenet, Rudolf E. F. Flinsch.

Among the subscribers to the last New York series of entertainments given by the Music League were the following well known New York people: Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, Mrs. Willard Straight, Dave H. Morris, Mrs. John Henry Hammond, Mrs. W. D. Sloane, Mrs. W. H. Harriman, Mrs. F. W. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Edward Harkness, Robert Goelet, John W. Frothingham, Mrs. Samuel Thorne, Mrs. John E. Parsons, Mrs. Henry Burden, Mrs. Douglas Robinson, Mrs. W. R. Thompson, Mrs. Arthur C. James, Gertrude Watson, Gertrude Parsons, Mrs. C. B. Alexander, Mrs. E. C. Converse, Mrs. W. B. Field, Mrs. Elliott F. Shepherd, Mrs. Frank Vanderlip, Mrs. George Leary, Miss Greer, Bernard Baruch, Mrs. Benjamin Guinness, Mrs. Jacob Schiff, Mrs. John T. Waterbury, Mrs. Lewis T. Wolff, Mrs. Gustav E. Kissel, Mrs. Whitney Warren, Mabel Choate, Mrs. B. Nicoll, Mrs. Charles Ditson. This list shows the character and support given to the work of the organization.

The Music League of America has on its rolls a list of musicians whose qualities and capabilities have been passed upon by expert musical judges, and whose work is now being recognized as of the purest and highest type of musical art offered to a discriminating public. The musicales, as outlined in The Blackstone announcement, bid fair to be of exceptional interest this year, and an additional incentive to the complete success of the first series of five is the announcement by the Drake Hotel Company that the surplus remaining after the payment of expenses (which will not be large, owing to the fact that no exorbitant and inflated prices are to be paid), will be given to the United Charities of Chicago to help the existing condition, due to the extraordinary situation which confronts everybody this year. Season tickets will not be sold, it being the purpose of The Blackstone management to make a popular admission fee ($2) for each musicale.

Marcella Sembrich's Appearances.

Marcella Sembrich will make only four public appearances in recital this season; two will take place in New York, one in Boston and one in Chicago, at Orchestra Hall, January 3, under the direction of F. Wight Neumann.

Allen Spencer and Glenn Dillard Gunn Recital.

Jessamine E. Allen, Western manager of the Lahee Bureau of Boston, will present, in a two-piano recital, Fine Arts Theatre, Sunday afternoon, November 22, Allen Spencer and Glenn Dillard Gunn. They will play, among other things, a "Benedictus" by Alkan and a concert piece by Ravel, which are new to Chicago. Marion Green will add to the program a group of songs new to local music lovers.

Annual Concert of Amateur Musical Club.

The Amateur Musical Club will present at its artists' recital next Monday, November 9, Charles W. Clark, baritone, and Amy Emerson Neill, violinist. The concert is given for the extension work which is devoted to the presentation of free concerts in public and charitable institutions by student members of the Amateur Musical Club, who are remunerated for their strvices from this fund and thus assisted in pursuing their studies and preparing themselves for greater artistic careers.

Mrs. Prindiville Scores in Recital.

Mrs. Thomas J. Prindiville, professional pupil of Herman Devries, met with marked success when she appeared before the Cercle de L'Amitie, Fine Arts Building, last Tuesday, November 3. Mrs. Prindiville sang an aria from "Lakme," "Faure Clair de Lune" and Debussy's "Mandoline." Herman Devries presided at the piano.

Concert at the Bergey Chicago Opera School.

Mr. and Mrs. Theodore S. Bergey, directors of the Bergey Chicago Opera School, have issued invitations for a recital to be given in their studios next Sunday afternoon, November 8. An interesting program will be furnished by Mae McMinn, soprano, and Leslie Voightmann, tenor, both pupils of Mr. Bergey, and Irving Engel, pianist, pupil of Mrs. Bergey.

The musicale given recently by Florence Benson, pianist, and George Simons, tenor, pupils of the Bergey Chicago Opera School, was repeated on Friday evening, November 6. The musicale was so successful that the Bergeys have had many requests for a repetition, which also met with the full approval of all those present.

Advanced piano pupils of Heniot Levy, vocal pupils of Ragna Linne and violin pupils of Herbert Butler appeared in recital on Saturday afternoon, November 7, furnishing a well arranged program.

Glenn Dillard Gunn's Interpretation Class.

Glenn Dillard Gunn's interpretation class meets at his studios, 421-424 Fine Arts Building, and these weekly musicales are attracting a great deal of attention among the young pianists of the city. Last Saturday the program introduced Joseph Corey (aged eleven) in the Beethoven rondo "Rage Over the Lost Penny"; Jacob Fisher (aged eighteen) in shorter pieces by Grieg and Chopin; Corinne Frada (aged fifteen), Chopin etudes; Helen Leifeldt (aged sixteen), Chopin scherzo and fantasia; Harold Yates, in shorter pieces by Debussy, Paderewski and Chopin; Seneca Pierce, Brahms' "Hungarian" variations; Ernest Bacon, Schumann fantasie pieces; Belle Tannenbaum, pieces by Moszkowski and Schulz-Evler-Strauss; Ebba Noer, Chopin etudes, op. 25, complete.

Chicago Musical College News.

Students of the Chicago Musical College school of expression gave their first recital of the season in the Ziegfeld Theatre, Saturday morning, November 7. Thirteen students appeared on the program, and presented one of the most attractive and interesting entertainments thus far given this season in the regular series of Ziegfeld Theatre matinees. Felix Borowski's lecture covered the subject of "The Rise of Instrumental Music." Next week he will devote his talk to "Bach and Handel."

Saturday morning, November 14, students of the Chicago Musical College Orchestra will present, under the direction of Signor Sacerdote, acts from "Cavalleria" and "Rigoletto." A section of the college orchestra will play the accompaniments.

Matzenauer-Fontana Recital at Blackstone.

At the Blackstone Theatre last Sunday afternoon, November 1, F. Wight Neumann presented Margarete Matzenauer and Eduardo Ferrari-Fontana in a joint recital. Both artists were new to Chicago, yet their fame had preceded them and musicians were cognizant of Mme. Matzenauer's triumphs at the Metropolitan Opera House, in New York; likewise, Mr. Ferrari-Fontana by his striking creation in "L'Amore dei tre Re," presaged well for an interesting afternoon. The glowing reports were justified, as both artists scored a rousing success here with the discriminative part of the audience. Both Mme. Matzenauer and her husband have a thorough conception of the requirements deemed necessary for the concert platform. Their choice of numbers was most fortunate. Mme. Matzenauer's voice impressed by its wide compass and large volume. Mr. Fontana was in fine fettle and vocally came up to expectations fully.

Chicago Symphony Orchestra Program.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra presented at its fourth pair of concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, November 6 and 7, Handel's concerto grosso in F major and Mahler's symphony, No. 1, in D major. Both selections were played with that finish expected from this organization under the able direction of Frederick Stock.

After the intermission the Schumann piano concerto was played by Josef Hofmann.

Rose Lutiger Gannon Much in Demand.

Rose Lutiger Gannon has been selected as the first soloist of the season to open the Sinai Orchestral concerts with Arthur Dunham as conductor. Mrs. Gannon will also sing at the orchestral concert given in the Art Institute on Sunday, November 8.

A Benefit Concert.

For the benefit of the family of the late N. B. Emanuel a concert will be given at the Auditorium on Sunday, November 15. The soloists will be Jenny Dufau, soprano, and Julia Claussen, contralto, of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, and Léon Marx, violinist.

Chicago Grand Opera Company Sued.

Last Saturday, in the Municipal Court of Chicago, Lena G. Humphrey placed her claim for compensation for service rendered by the plaintiff at the special intance and request of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, viz. procuring advertising matter for programs of said company at Chicago and Philadelphia and for damages to plaintiff on account of breach by the defendant of a certain contract for the services of the plaintiff for one year extending from April 26, 1913, to April 26, 1914. This is followed by the different claims which came to a total of $5,594.75. The suit was entered for $6,000, including lawyer's fees.

The First Ganz-Ware Recital.

Mankato, Minn., October 30, 1914.

Helen Ware and Rudolph Ganz have been booked for a number of joint recitals during this season; the first of these interesting programs was given in this city on October 30. Following the opening number, the Goldmark suite for violin and piano, both artists received on ovation from their enthusiastic audience. The ensemble playing of these two artists was remarkable in its musicianship and perfect harmony.

Mr. Ganz gave a splendid reading of his solo numbers, especially of his Chopin group, and compositions of his own brought out his eminent musicianly powers and distinguished judgment. He had to respond with many encores.

Helen Ware chose Hungarian and Slav compositions for her numbers; most fortunately indeed, for the overflow of youthful spirit and poetry and her thorough study and love for these soulful and stirring melodies have made her a master interpreter of Hungarian and Slav music. The advantage she has had in studying with the best masters of the Hungarian and Slav school has made it possible for her to penetrate into the very soul of these plaintive melodies, and therefore she gives them a dramatic declamatory interpretation that discloses their unique and fascinating characteristic traits.

These two artists will at all times be welcome in our city, for they have found a warm place in the hearts of our enthusiastic music lovers. M. C. H.

Frances Alda to Give New York Recital.

Frances Alda, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will give a song recital in Carnegie Hall, New York, Tuesday afternoon, December 1.

On this occasion Mme. Alda will be assisted by Frank la Forge, the pianist-composer.

Alma Gluck's New York Reci

Comment by the Daily Papers of New York, on Alma Gluck's Song Recital in Carnegie Hall, Saturday Af

(New York Times, November 1.)

MME. ALMA GLUCK'S RECITAL

The interest taken in Alma Gluck's song recital last season, when she had just returned from a period of study with Mme. Sembrich, was renewed and increased yesterday afternoon, when she appeared again in Carnegie Hall before an audience that filled that auditorium. It was a pleasure for her admirers to note how she had progressed in the finer and subtler qualities of her art. It does much credit to her intelligence and sense of the fitness of things that she should persevere in the strict schooling necessary for the mastery of the true art of song, which so few singers today attempt to reach; that, having shown at the opera that she possessed one of the most beautiful of soprano voices, a great natural endowment, she should realize how great were the responsibilities imposed by that endowment and how far she was from grasping all the secrets of vocal art, and should betake herself away from the easily won plaudits of enthusiastic opera goers to put herself under the severe tuition of the one perhaps best able to do her the most good.

Her singing yesterday afternoon did her the highest credit. The beautiful voice seemed never more beautiful in its native quality; and it had a certainty of poise, a smoothness and an evenness in all its ranges, a perfection of equality throughout that she has never reached before. The higher tones are more freely delivered than they were last season; they were produced more spontaneously and they had a fuller and rounder quality. There was a greater facility than she showed in the past in the few flowery passages occurring in Rameau's "Rossignols Amoureux" and in Mozart's "Zeffinetti Luisingheri" which came first on her program; though there will be still greater flexibility and ease in such passages if Mme. Gluck continues the improvement she has made, as there likewise will be a little more brilliancy and evenness in her trill.

These airs she sang with much charm, and so she did Haydn's ingratiating "Mermaid's Song," and the long-sustained tones that make Handel's air "Come, Beloved," from "Atalanta" so exacting were wholly admirable. This performance, in fact, was an achievement of unusual distinction that she was very properly called on to repeat. Mme. Gluck has gained further insight into the German lied. Her interpretations of the songs by Schumann and Brahms upon her program were something more than a disclosure of beautiful tone and its modulations and carefully studied phrasing. There was a pointed intimation of the character, the mood, the higher significance of each of these, and especially the tender grace of "Der Nussbaum" and the joyous uplift of "O Liebliche Wange" were there.

It cannot be said that Mme. Gluck has as yet found how to convey the deepest feeling in her voice, or that she often imparts to it a varied emotional coloring, matters more difficult of attainment in such an organ as hers than in others of a more robust sort; but what she did in this direction was not to be overlooked, as, notably, in the beautiful Little Russian folk song arranged by her husband, Efrem Zimbalist (which she sang in the Ruthenian language), and the sombre song of Charpentier, "La Cloche Felée."

Among the interesting new songs on a program in general admirably selected and contrasted were three by Max Vogrich, "Vaer Daer," "De ol Wichel," "Wenn Framme Kindlein Schlafen gehen," and three by Americans—Edward Horsman's truly musical and finely felt "Bird of the Wilderness," (which she repeated), Sydney Homer's setting of negro verses, "Long Ago," and Frank Lafarge's arch and clever "To a Messenger." It is necessary to add, however, that Mme. Gluck's enunciation, especially in English, was not all that it might be in clearness and purity.

After adding a charming and familiar song of Sinding's "Sylvelin" after her second group, and a French song after her French group, Mme. Gluck added several songs in English at the close of her program—songs that were not chosen with the fastidious taste evidenced in the printed list.

Her accompanist was Willy Spoor, who played in a delightfully sympathetic and musical style.

(New York World, November 2.)

SEMBRICH, TEACHER, HEARS GLUCK, PUPIL

Marcella Sembrich sat in a Carnegie Hall box yesterday afternoon listening to the singing of her recent pupil, Alma Gluck. The season's first song recital of marked importance, the event took on an added interest because of Mme. Gluck's popularity and the much-discussed fact that she had spent the summer coaching under one of the greatest artists the lyric stage has known.

No singer of intelligence could emerge from such advantages and not benefit thereby. On that account, to write that Mme. Gluck's singing yesterday was an improvement over that disclosed some six months ago is only what in the circumstances, one would expect to write.

The extent of the former Metropolitan Opera Company soprano's advancement, however, is quite another matter, and one likely to be freely argued in music circles for some time to come.

In general there was a degree of vocal repose in Mme. Gluck's phrases which she has not heretofore shown, excellent singer though she was before coming under the helpful shelter of Mme. Sembrich's artistic wing, and she realized certain elements of finish which at other times were only approached.

Mme. Gluck's voice, always most agreeable in quality, showed more velvetiness than ever. The florid phrases revealed an evenness not usual for the soprano to command, and she even trilled with some measure of success. Thus reinforced and greeted by an audience which manifested its friendliness at her first appearance, Mme. Gluck began well and finished her varied and musically splendid program even better.

The singing she provided for her hearers was restrained, and gauged for niceties of detail rather than for breadth of artistic sweep. And while the soprano revealed an admirable legato, a most commendable musical taste and fairly clear enunciation, her lack of vocal power prevented variety of tonal color and effectiveness in climax which many would like to have had supplied.

Some of the distinguishing traits of her illustrious teacher were seized for the occasion by Mme. Gluck, and one of them was the familiar Sembrich skip on leaving the stage which that artist never failed so naturally to indulge. All that the singer offered, however, was most acceptable to her auditors, who applauded and redemanded some of the compositions she interpreted with particular charm.

The program included songs by Rameau, Mozart, Handel, Haydn, Schumann, Brahms, Rachmaninoff, Glazounow, Massenet, Charpentier, Ravel, Vogrich, Horsman, Homer and La Forge.

NEW YORK AMERICAN

Alma Gluck yesterday afternoon returned to the music activities of New York with a recital in Carnegie Hall. An audience that tested the seating and the standing capacity of the house greeted the young soprano. Seated in a conspicuous box and beaming on her cherished pupil was that other favorite soprano, Mme. Sembrich.

It was evident yesterday that the young American singer is gradually approaching that degree of artistic attainment that will ultimately entitle her to fill the place left vacant by the Polish prima donna. Her admirable voice has undoubtedly taken on new color and charm since its cultivation has been directed by Mme. Sembrich. Then, too, Mme. Gluck has, unconsciously or otherwise, adopted so many delightful mannerisms of her gifted tutor, mannerisms that ornament and enhance each selection presented.

ALMA GLUCK GIVES SONG RECITAL HERE

Lovers of song turned out in full force yesterday afternoon for Alma Gluck's first recital of the season.

There were few empty seats in Carnegie Hall, so great had been the onrush of students and teachers, many of whom, no doubt, were anxious to gather some information regarding Marcella Sembrich's methods.

Up in one of the first tier boxes, accompanied by her husband, the amiable Herr Stengel, and by Frank La Farge, sat the great Polish soprano herself. On her as she watched eagerly over the fortunes of her pupil almost as many opera glasses were leveled as on the charming singer below.

Surely Mme. Gluck never appeared before a more critical gathering of listeners.

Contrary to the belief held by many, Alma Gluck has not reaped the benefit of instruction from Mme. Sembrich for a long time. To judge from yesterday's experience, however, she made marked progress during the few months of study last summer in Switzerland, a fact that reflects great credit on her famous teacher.

It was evident repeatedly, to be sure, that the soprano had not quite rid herself of the shortcomings she is trying to overcome. Almost invariably, for instance, her high G assumed a guttural quality that seemed in marked contrast to the normal beauty of her tone production, and often her breathing left something to be desired.

On the whole, however, she was heard to better advantage distinctly than at a recital the writer attended three months ago in London.

Her voice had greater volume, greater carrying power, and the emission of her high tones generally was noticeably clearer and less constrained.

There seems to be no reason to doubt that Alma Gluck may approach close to perfection as a representative of bel canto singing. Her voice is one of rare lyric charm, and she has plenty of ambition and perseverance.

It is hard to avoid a certain skepticism, however, regarding her capacity as an interpreter of lieder. Her performance yesterday of such songs as Schumann's "Intermezzo," in which she gave expression to mournful instead of rapturous feelings, of the same composer's "Nussbaum," which she sang with a bland regardlessness of sentiment and of Charpentier's "La Cloche Felee," the poetic content of which she seemingly quite failed to grasp, suggested that Mme. Gluck lacks entirely the gift of probing into the inner meaning of a song that falls outside the limitations of her personal experience. Even when she succeeds in giving outward expression to feelings that lie below the surface the impression she makes is that of one imitating others rather than drawing upon her own resources.

Mme. Gluck was heard to advantage in a folk song of Little Russia by her husband, Efrem Zimbalist; in Rachmaninoff's effective "Fruehlingsfluten," in Glazounoff's "The Nereid," in Massenet's "Crepuscule," which proved to be decidedly one of her best contributions, and in Frank La Forge's "To a Messenger."

Her program included a group of classical numbers, three lieder by Brahms, Ravel's "Tout-gai," two songs in Plattdeutsche, by Max Vogrich; Edward Horsman's "The Bird of the Wilderness," which she repeated, and Sidney Homer's "Long Ago."

Among her encores may be mentioned Sinding's "Sylvelin," Paladilhe's "Psyche," Homer's "Way Down East," Chadwick's "My Love Is Like a Red, Red Rose," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Chant Hindou." Willy Spoor played the piano accompaniments.

SONG RECITAL BY ALMA GLUCK

The serious and observant lover of song and song-singing has found a pleasant occupation at intervals during the last few years in noting the development of the one among all the young singers of the day who promise to take the place which Mme. Sembrich shall vacate when she retires from the concert-room as she, in the fullness of her powers, retired from the operatic stage.

That singer is Alma Gluck, who in a recital in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon gave an audience that crowded the great room exquisite delight, not only by the quality of her voice and art, but also by recalling the voice and art of her illustrious exemplar who listened to her with evident pride and pleasure in one of the boxes. There was a suggestion of Mme. Sembrich in every feature of the affair, except, perhaps, in the selection of songs which made up the final group on her program and those which were given post festum. First, there came examples from the historical period of bel canto: Rameau's "Rossignols Amoureux," Mozart's "Zeffiretti lusingheri," Handel's "Care selve" and "The Mermaid's Song," by Haydn—all from Mme. Sembrich's list except the exquisite air from Handel's opera "Atalanta," which is a worthy companion of "Oh, Sleep," which Miss Gluck sang in Mme. Sembrich's manner last year. Then a second part, composed of gems from the treasure houses of Schumann and Brahms—"Intermezzo," Er ist's," "Der Nussbaum," "Botschaft," "Sonntag" and "O liebliche Wange." Three songs by French and Slavic composers, with a folksong admixture, in the first of which (a combination of two songs from Little Russia arranged by Mr. Zimbalist) there was an echo of Mme. Sembrich's epoch-making folksong recital, "O susida chata bila." The last song in this group was an arrangement of a modern Greek folksong made by Maurice Ravel, which was comparatively ineffective, largely, we fancy, because of Miss Gluck's misconception of its tempo. There were new offerings in the concluding group—two Low German songs ("Vaer daer" and "De ol Wichel"), and a German song, "Wenn fromme Kindlein," set by Max Vogrich, an English song, refreshingly effective, because of its freedom from affectation and its pure feeling of aspiration; "The Bird of the Wilderness," by Edward Horsman; Sidney Homer's "Long Ago" and Frank La Forge's "To a Messenger." Mr. Horsman's song won a repetition; after the second group Miss Gluck added Sinding's "Sylvelin"; after the third, Paladilhe's "Psyche," and after the fourth, Sidney Homer's poetically conceived "Way Down South," "My Love Is Like a Red, Red Rose," by Rawlins Cottenet, and two or three more. Thus the record of the affair is completed.

Miss Gluck has put on a pretty pair of seven league boots since she sang last in New York, and made tremendous strides onward technically, intellectually and emotionally. The few clogs in her tone production which were commented on a year ago have been put almost wholly aside, and her voice, unimpaired in its limpid beauty is almost completely at the service of the lofty things in musical interpretation. Emotionally there are still depths which she has not sounded that can be reached without sacrifice of the purely sensuous beauty for which she strives successfully with an art that conceals the striving, and therefore shows appreciation of a high ideal. Her enunciation is exquisite, and so is her diction for all those who conceive the term to mean only phonological clearness. But in her declamation there is still merely surface sentiment. She sends no plummet into the soul depths of such songs as those by Schumann and Brahms, which she sang yesterday, Rachmaninoff's "Frühlingsfluten" and Charpentier's "La Cloche Felee." But the warmth now lacking in a measure will come; and soon. An innovation was Miss Gluck's singing of two of the Vogrich songs in the original Low German dialect, a proceeding which no doubt caused some bewilderment yesterday. The touchingly naive poems by Klaus Groth, with their homely folk-song sentiment and form, though more intelligible to the many, would have lost charm in the translation. There is a sweeter note of music in the Low German poet's "Quickborn" than in Heine's lovely lyrics.

NEW MME. GLUCK DELIGHTS HEARERS WITH NEW ART

Enthusiasm was evoked yesterday afternoon at Alma Gluck's song recital in Carnegie Hall in a way which seldom is duplicated by artists who appear here. It was the singer's first appearance here since she became Mrs.

viewed by the Daily Press

31, as herewith reproduced, demonstrates that she is one of the Foremost Sopranos now before the public

Efrem Zimbalist, and it was the first time she had sung here since she went abroad to study with Mme. Sembrich. Mme. Sembrich sat in a box yesterday and applauded her to the echo.

When Mme. Gluck appeared a whisper of admiration swept over the feminine portion of the audience, for she wore a cloth of gold jacket with a blue filmy skirt that was simply tier upon tier of flounces, and a chic black hat topped by a blue plume. It was a striking effect, both in color and line.

But what Mme. Gluck wore soon became a secondary consideration to her singing. It was soon made clear to her hearers that since her last recital here she had made tremendous strides. Her voice ever was beautiful, even when she sang in the Metropolitan Opera House, but she lacked variety, and this she has gained. There was no monotony in her interpretation yesterday. Her tones were charged with the freshness and fullness of youth, and marked with exceptional beauty. Her high notes simply soared upward into the spaces of Carnegie Hall. Her phrasing, save at rare moments of nervousness, was admirable, and her enunciation was a model of clarity. She indulged in few exaggerations, and never was inartistic. It was no wonder the audience demanded encores and stampeded to the platform at the end of the concert and remained there until the lights were lowered in the hall.

Mme. Gluck sang in French, German, Russian and English—a most catholic program, and she is deserving of comment on the exquisite manner in which she sang Handel's "Come, Beloved"; the tremendous temperamental expression which she put into Russian folksongs, which had been arranged by her violinist husband, Mr. Zimbalist; the fine repose in her interpretation of songs by Brahms, and the remarkable singing of a group of American composers, songs, chief among which was Edward Horsman's "The Bird of the Wilderness," which had to be repeated and which is a brilliant example of song writing.

Willy Spoor played the singer's accompaniments in a most sympathetic, artistic manner. In fact, everything combined to make the recital a triumph for the young singer, to which even the wealth of flowers sent her seemed gladly to contribute their share.

ALMA GLUCK HEARD IN SONG PROGRAM

The song recital given by Alma Gluck yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was of more than common interest. When this soprano returned to the local concert stage in January last after a short term of study with Mme. Sembrich it was evident that her studies with the famous mistress of the art of bel canto had not proceeded far enough. Her upper tones, always insecure, were still badly attacked. Her voice was uneven in its upper scale and she was unable to evoke from its medium the fullness and rich sensuous beauty which seemed rightly to belong to it.

Furthermore, in interpretation the young singer had nothing to offer but imitations of her teacher. Mme. Sembrich had taught her how to deliver the songs, and she carefully observed her instructions. That Miss Gluck had little of her own to give was made all the more conspicuous by the long established fact that temperament had never been one of her large assets. And her singing, often elegant and even at times exquisite in its externals, had always lacked the impact made by a commanding personality.

Yesterday's recital demonstrated that the singer since her second sojourn abroad had developed into an artist demanding serious consideration. In the first place it seems not only permissible, but even obligatory, at this moment to make one of those inclusive assertions which judicial comment is loath to employ. But it must be said that as Miss Gluck's voice now stands it is the most beautiful lyric soprano before the public. Nature gave her a notably fine organ, and its resources have at last been brought fairly, if not completely, under her command.

Her medium and upper middle tones are now not only ravishing in quality, but they have a splendid fullness and vigor. Her upper scale is now generally well attacked and cleanly delivered, and she has been initiated into the school of all perfect equalization, to wit, the emission of head tones and the art of carrying them down. Miss Gluck sang sonorous, flutelike high tones yesterday which last January would have been half strangled in her throat and would have been without quality.

Her technical equipment has gained too in the clearness of its colorature, though this does not promise to be one of the most effective factors in her art. But it is commendable, if not brilliant, and certainly not slovenly. The only element of her delivery which now falls far below the general level of merit is her pronunciation, which is not at all what should be heard from a singer of her accomplishments.

Those who take note of the mechanism of singing will gather from these comments that Alma Gluck is a very well prepared singer. The truth is that she must be accorded a position among the best young sopranos of this time. If she has not eloquence of utterance, she has much finish, much taste, much delicacy. If she is wanting in archness, infectious gayety and playful humor, she possesses in no ordinary measure the power to communicate sentiment, gentle feeling and the varying moods of reflection and mediation.

She sang "Come, Beloved," from Handel's "Atalanta" with authority of style and with broad, reposeful delivery and finish. "Der Nussbaum" was perhaps not deeply moving, but it was tender and sensitive. She was weakest in her group of three Brahms songs, for which she has not the needed penetration of imagination. Folk songs of Little Russia, arranged by her husband, Efrem Zimbalist, she sang delightfully. She sang also very beautifully Charpentier's "La Cloche Felee" and Massenet's "Crepuscule." Unfamiliar numbers on her list were three songs by Max Vogrich and "The Bird of the Wilderness," by Edward Horsman, a local composer of taste. A carelessly made, even thoughtless, attack threw the singer off the pitch at the beginning of Schumann's "Intermezzo" and ruined the whole song. Eternal vigilance is the price of safety in song, as well as in some other things.

NEW YORK STAATS-ZEITUNG

Alma Gluck, whose swift comet-like career offers a telling proof of unlimited possibilities, which are possible to American artists here, in so far as they have the elements of success in themselves, had the satisfaction yesterday afternoon to see the spacious auditorium of Carnegie Hall filled with an elegant and representative public, which willingly was captured again by the charm of the artist. Vocally the sympathetic artist at present has reached her zenith. Scarcely ever has her unique voice, which incidentally reminds one of the glitter of a costly jewel, sounded so sweet, so full, so resourceful and untiring, as yesterday. Only in the highest tones was a certain harshness observable at times; over against which in the middle register was a more caressing and a softer sound than I have heard in it earlier. The legato of the lady has progressed in fine restraint, her mezza voce has become rounder, her breathing more harmonious and her piano singing won in intellectuality.

Under such conditions the ample and well made program of the artist brought forth much of the beautiful. The first division: Rameau, Mozart, Händel and Haydn, found her not entirely sure and at her ease. On the contrary, she was entirely ready in the second group vocally. Unfortunately only vocally and purely technically, for the German singing of lieder is the weak side of the lady, and will always remain that. She does not succeed in getting hold of such a delicate soul-song to bring it out with feeling, to create the atmosphere. These Schumann and Brahms lieder are in the mouth of the singer little more than a succession of well graded pianissimo and fortissimo, and that is really not much. The third and fourth groups brought almost unalloyed pleasure. How the "exotic" songs, so soft and graceful and so fine and piquant, fell from these lips. Soft tear-veiled sadness was embodied in a small Russian folksong arranged by Mr. Zimbalist, the husband of the singer. Charpentier and Massenet songs (namely, the fanciful "Crepuscule" of the latter), especially a rhythmical and modulated and uncommonly fascinating Rabel song, "Tout gai," allowed the fine art of the artist to appear at its best.

From the last division I should call "The Bird of the Wilderness," by Edward Horsman, an effectively declaimed song of modern art, which had to be repeated, and Homer's "Long Ago," one of the best songs of the talented American, which through simplicity and force captures. Naturally, Mme. Gluck did not omit the "encores" which assumed the form of a broader chain of successes. In addition there were flowers, flowers, and again flowers. The natural charms of the artist were no small asset in her success. Again and again she had to appear to the public the cry seemed to ring out, "Alma, Sweet Alma, Where Do You Live?" (Translation.)

RECITAL BY ALMA GLUCK

That Alma Gluck is a popular favorite was once more thoroughly demonstrated by the size and enthusiasm of her audience at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. She is young, charming to look at, she has a lovely voice, she is musical. What more could one wish? Her gifts include still one more, however; namely, intelligence. The fact that she has this gift, necessary beyond all others, for the making of a real artist, is conclusively proved by her continued study with Marcella Sembrich and the consequent improvement in her singing. For a popular artist, who is already well launched in her career, to have the brains and courage to continue earnest study, is a phenomenon infrequently witnessed. Let us hope that Alma Gluck will continue in this straight and narrow path until her voice is cleared of all its slight imperfections, until her high notes are always equally beautiful, until the scale is a perfect instrument from one end to the other of its range. It is above all important that she should realize that, for the present at least, her voice is a purely lyric organ and should be treated as such. The highest art makes it equally necessary, perhaps more so, to know what one cannot do, as what one can. Songs which call on the deeper emotions, on the darker tones, are now beyond her range, may be so forever, but at present they are a constant danger to the purity of her tone and the perfection of her breathing. Saturday the intake of her breath was altogether too noticeable during the early part of her concert—doubtless from nervousness, as this

From the point of view of taste and beautiful singing, two numbers on her program, "Come Beloved," from Handel's "Atalanta," and an exquisite Russian folksong, arranged by Mr. Zimbalist, were above everything else. The Handel number must have completely satisfied Mme. Sembrich, who was in the audience, for it was along the lines of purity and vocal beauty which she herself has so often demonstrated. Mme. Gluck sang the Russian song with touching simplicity and pathos. The wild little middle part, contrasting like the czardas's second movement with the first, was a delightful piece of local color. Many in the audience woud have welcomed a repetition of this number.

As a song, Charpentier's "La Cloche Felée" does not amount to much. It suggests in part Saint-Säens' "La Cloche," but the imitation of the bell's clang-tint is much less effective than in the Saint-Saëns song. Mme. Gluck was here beyond her present emotional depths, and failed to give even a shadow of the tragic meaning of the words. The next song, Massenet's "Crépuscule," fitted her much better. She was likewise successful with her Schumann songs, especially "Der Nussbaum," and three by Brahms. Max Vogrich's three songs suited her also.

She concluded her program with the now inevitable group of American songs, one by Edward Horsman, once a critic and organist, now a happy business man; one by Sidney Homer, the best song by him which the present listener remembers to have heard; and the third, "To a Messenger," by Frank La Forge, a dainty bit which Mme. Gluck sang archly, as befits its droll words. Mr. Horsman's effectively dramatic song had to be repeated, and the singer added a number of other encores, among others Sinding's "Sylvelin" and Paladilhe's "Psyche," a charming song.

NEW YORK EVENING WORLD

Alma Gluck, by her recital at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, won the right to be classed with the best of lyric sopranos. She has made amazing strides in a year. Her always beautiful voice, that is distinguished by a unique quality—there is none other just like it—has grown in compass and refinement and expression. A veteran lover of music said to me: "This is the loveliest recital that it has been my good fortune to attend for many years." And that, manifestly, was the impression made upon the great audience. Mme. Gluck's program ran from the eighteenth century Rameau to our own Sydney Homer and Frank La Forge. Her enunciation, no matter in what language, was a delight. Not the least pleasing number was an arrangement of "Little Russia Folk Songs" by her husband, Efrem Zimbalist, the violinist.

(New York Evening Sun, November 2.)

NEW YORK DISCOVERS A PRIMA DONNA TO THE WORLD

"How many New Yorkers," asked a woman today, "do you suppose would have stopped their automobiles in the streets a few years ago for a little Rumanian immigrant girl, the very same who kept 200 limousines blocking the crossroads two hours last Saturday while she sang in Carnegie Hall?" We suppose not one. The plain fact is that this old town had cause for excitement. It had given the world a new prima donna, as surely as it once discovered Malibran and made all creation a present of Patti.

Alma Gluck sprang into fame in a night at the New Theatre on November 16, 1909, when the little Sophie's song in "Werther" revealed a voice in a thousand. She was more of a prima donna then than all the flaccid and gaseous heroines—we quote a famous critique—imported in years from Europe. Today the most admired young artist anywhere on view, she has stolen all Sembrich's secrets except those of the soul. The profounder intelligence and depth of feeling will come with time and work under the same wise guidance.

Clad in a slim short gown that might have been wished on her in its seven decks of green gauze ruffles, with an Oriental military jacket of gold brocade and a tiny cap cocked on one side like a bird's crest by the airy weight of a single feather, the singer held New York in the hollow of her hand. Monday afternoon is too late to name over the songs she sang. But how she sang them, with the "equal" voice that ran the scale like a flute distantly heard in cool airs, was a thing to remember.

It was a Sembrich program from the first repeated Handel air, recalling "He Shall Feed His Flock," to the limpid beauty of a redemanded Horsman-Tagore "Bird of the Wilderness," as modern as tomorrow. There were Russian folksongs by her husband, Zimbalist, in the Ruthenian tongue and two in Low German dialect by Max Vogrich. After a procession of flowers to the stage, where Gluck in despair left them lying by the footlights, she added Sinding's "Sylvelin" and on the next pause Paladilhe's "Psyche."

The rush of people to the stage after La Forge's "To a Messenger" brought four encores. Homer's "Way Down South," Cottenet's "My Love's Like a Red, Red Rose," with its Rosary garlands of colorature, then Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Chant Indoue" and Cadman's "Land of the Sky-blue Water." The biggest concert audience of the new season marked a triumph unique in New York in twenty years.

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY VISITS BOSTON

Noted Orchestra Enthusiastically Received In the Hub—Wilbur Theatre Sunday Evening Concerts—Notes.

11 Boylston Road, Fenway,
Boston, Mass., November 6, 1914.

The first Sunday afternoon concert of the season at Symphony Hall brought the New York Philharmonic Society, Josef Stransky, conductor, and Efrem Zimbalist, the Russian violinist, as soloist, to a well filled house. Visiting orchestras perform at a great disadvantage here in consequence of the understandable loyalty existing among Bostonians for their home organization. Dvorák's "New World" symphony was a fine bit of orchestral virtuosity, and the audience had to grant due acknowledgment to conductor and players. The Strauss "Don Juan," the "Sorcerer's Apprentice," and Stravinsky's "Feuerwerk" were likewise performed in brilliant manner. Zimbalist was the soloist of the afternoon. His playing of the Bruch "Scotch" fantasy showed fluency in technic, refinement in tone, and breadth in interpretation. The reception was most warm, but the much desired encore was not forthcoming.

WILBUR THEATRE SUNDAY EVENING CONCERTS.

The first of a series of Sunday evening concerts at the Wilbur Theatre, held last Sunday, November 1, had Florencio Constantino, tenor, as principal soloist. He was assisted by the Grieg Trio composed of Marguerite Pearson-Moss, violinist; Edith Soden, cellist, and Mina G. Del Castillo, pianist. These concerts apparently will prove a success, as the house on this occasion was well filled with Boston's leading society element. A more charming and ideal location for concerts could not be desired. The Wilbur Theatre has been open about three months; its artistic design and appealing atmosphere make it one of the most suitable concert rooms in Boston for smaller musical affairs. Besides the tenor solos, the program included the first movement of Mendelssohn's trio, op. 49; an arrangement for trio of Chabrier's "Espana"; trio pieces by Maerchner and Ruebner; cello solos, prayer from "Jewels of the Madonna," mazurka by Popper; piano solos, "At Sundown," Hopekirk; "The Maiden's Wish, Chopin-Liszt, and the violin solos, "Meditation," from "Thais," and Kreisler's "Caprice Viennois."

FRANK GITTELSON'S RECITAL.

Frank Gittelson, the new violinist, that is, new in America, had his first Boston appearance here in recital at Steinert Hall on Friday afternoon, November 6. The young artist had a splendid reception. His program consisted of the Nardini E minor concerto; the Bach chaconne for violin alone; a group of three characteristic national dances representing the composers Dvorák, Sarasate and Brahms; and the d'Ambrosio concerto in B minor. In the first concerto the player was immediately stamped as a master of his instrument. His individuality makes his playing doubly interesting. His own cadenza was played in the Nardini number and showed a marked degree of musical ingenuity in its construction. The chaconne was played with as much ease and assurance as the simplest phrase in the opening concerto. Gittelson's left hand technic is surprising, the double stopping being remarkable for its clearness. His tone is powerful and rich in color and his bow arm has wonderful sweep. The closing concerto also was well played and drew such applause from his auditors as broke all bounds. Several encore numbers had to be given. A return engagement in Boston is positively assured.

DR. KARL MUCK (LEFT) AND CARL STASNY EN ROUTE TO AMERICA ABOARD THE STEAMER RYNDAM, OF THE HOLLAND-AMERICAN LINE.

STASNY RESUMES TEACHING.

Carl Richard Stasny, the Boston pianist and instructor, one of the few living pianists who studied with Liszt at Weimar, has resumed his teaching activities at the New England Conservatory of Music, and finds that this season has proven, thus far, one of the busiest he has ever experienced in America. Mr. Stasny was abroad during the summer on a visit with relatives in Frankfort and looking up old colleagues in the music world. The war situation brought its troubles to Mr. Stasny, as it did to many other musicians, but he finally succeeded in booking passage on the steamship Canopic, together with Dr. Karl Muck, and is now congratulating himself on his safe arrival on real neutral soil. During the three years from 1879 to 1882 he was a devoted pupil of Liszt at Weimar. During 1878, before studying with Liszt, he made a concert trip through Russia, and after finishing his work at Weimar he went on a second tour through Russia. In intermediate years between this second Russian tournee and the time of his coming to America in 1891 to accept a post in the New England Conservatory of Music, concert tours all over Europe were made, some of them in conjunction with other artists such as Patti, David Popper and Emile Sauret, but most of them were carried on alone.

NOTES.

Julia Culp was to have appeared in the Sunday afternoon concert, November 15, with Olga Samaroff, but as she will not be in America by that time Reinald Werrenrath, the New York baritone, will take her place in assisting Mme. Samaroff.

Sousa and his Band will be here Sunday, November 15, at the Colonial Theatre. VICTOR WINTON.

Stoeving Coming.

29 Blenheim Road, Abbey Road, N. W.,
October 26, 1914.

To the Musical Courier:

In consequence of the violent antiforeign trade propaganda and fear of espionage in this country my professorship at the Guildhall School of Music, which I held for sixteen years, has been withdrawn from me, and this, together with the subsequent loss, for the same reason, of other valued work, has decided me to seek a new field of activity in one of the large Eastern centers of the United States. I expect to sail by the steamship St. Paul for New York next Saturday, October 31, and should be very much obliged if you would kindly announce my coming to America in your reading columns, and, if possible, lend me your help by any suggestion as to the best means of placing my talents at the service of the American musical public.

Some of your readers may know my name as that of the author of the "Story of the Violin," "The Art of Violin Bowing" and other books which have had a large sale in America, as well as in England and Germany.

In addition to my professorial and literary labors, playing chamber music and conducting, I have been interested in the philanthropic aims and efforts of the National Union of School Orchestras and the Morley College for Working Men and Women, which make it their object to carry the love of music and music making into the homes of the industrial classes. These are taught in class forms, ranging from six to fifteen and more people; and it has been my experience, even under such conditions, that the violin can be taught with success on strictly artistic lines.

Yours sincerely,
PAUL STOEVING.

Gadski Program.

This afternoon (November 11) Johanna Gadski is to give her recital at Aeolian Hall, and the vocal fraternity and song recital public are looking forward to hearing the attached program: "Widmung," "Stille Thränen," "Wenn ich früh in den Garten geh'," "Mondnacht," "Frühlingsnacht," Schumann; "Der Neugierige," "Litanei," "Who Is Sylva?" "Nachtstück," "Hark, Hark, the Lark," Schubert; "Willkommen mein Wald," "Für Musik," "Es hat die Rose sich beklagt," Franz; "Von Ewiger Liebe," "Wiegenlied," "Meine Liebe ist grün," Brahms; "In dem Schatten Deiner Locken," Wolf; "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges," Mendelssohn; "Die Nacht," "Ständchen," Strauss.

Exercises for the Development of the Higher Pianoforte Technic
By ISIDOR PHILIPP
Ditson Edition, No. 196
Price, 75 cents net, by mail 8 cents extra

Isidor Philipp is known to pianists as one of the most distinguished teachers of piano playing connected with the celebrated Paris Conservatoire. His system, which has been the educational basis of the training of many of the younger French pianists, consists in using exercises to give drill in variations of intensity of tone, or duration of tone; practising passages in legato, detached and portamento styles; changing of key, etc.

All pianists should possess this volume, which is the product of a great French artist of long experience.—Musical Courier.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

Our orchestral visitors from the Hub, the Boston Symphony players, opened their Greater New York season with concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 5, and Saturday afternoon, November 7, and in Brooklyn on Friday evening, November 6.

The first of the New York programs presented the "Eroica" symphony, Brahms' variations on a Haydn theme, Strauss' "Don Juan," and Weber's "Euryanthe," while the second list comprised Brahms' second symphony, Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches" and Sibelius' "Finlandia."

There was no novelty in the foregoing programs so far as New York was concerned and, therefore, no extended comment upon them is necessary.

The orchestra played with its usual polish and authority, and it was not apparent that the new blood in the body had in any way shaken its customary excellent ensemble. Refined tone, technical accuracy and musical dignity still are the outstanding virtues of the Boston players, even if they are surpassed by the virility and temperamental impetus of our own Philharmonic Society. Dr. Muck conducted with all of his former keen artistic insight and conscientious regard for the tenets of good taste in the matter of dynamics, phrasing, and accentuation.

To be accurate, the opening concert last Friday night of the annual series played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, was not as satisfactory as those given in New York. It was not the fault of the Brooklyn audience, which appeared in large numbers and in smart clothes; it was not the fault of the orchestra, which played with all its traditional skill; it was not the fault of Pasquale Amato, a most capable artist, who can always be depended upon to do anything he undertakes in a thoroughly finished manner, but it was most conspicuously the fault of Dr. Karl Muck if, as one must presume, the program was his choice and arrangement. It was as follows: Brahms' second symphony, Saint-Saëns' aria, "Qui donc commande quand il aime?" from "Henry VIII," Sibelius' "The Swan of Tuonela" and "Finlandia," Handel's air. "Ombra mai fù," from "Serse," and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe."

This program has no focus. Read the list of composers, one after the other, Brahms, Saint-Saëns, Sibelius, Handel, Weber, and its faults are at once apparent. The climax is reached when it is scarcely begun in the third and fourth movements of the Brahms symphony, and after that it dawdles along in a carelessly assorted series of rather uninteresting and unimportant numbers, ending with the good old circusy "Euryanthe."

The only genuine enthusiasm of the evening was roused by the soloist, Pasquale Amato. The Saint-Saëns number, not particularly valuable in itself, afforded him, however, a splendid opportunity of displaying the extraordinarily effective range of his voice and his magnificent vocalization. The "Ombra mai fù" was delivered with great dignity and breadth. It is evident that the excitement connected with the war and the trouble of getting here has happily had no effect on Mr. Amato's art, even for a moment, and he is sure to be the same great favorite with his audiences as for the last several years. This was proved again Friday night by the tremendous applause which greeted him on his appearance and which compelled him to return time after time to bow his acknowledgments after each number.

There is no need of praising the playing of the orchestra further than to say that everything was up to the usual standard. Little bits which show how high this playing standard really is are, for instance, the coda of the first movement of the Brahms symphony and the little recurring prestos in the second movement. The Sibelius tone-poems, with their intricate orchestration, were done with beautiful clarity and precision, especially on the part of the strings. How often these rather uninteresting works smack of Wagner, particularly in the handling of the orchestra. In parts of "Finlandia," for instance, one could imagine himself listening to "Lohengrin." Dr. Muck conducted with precision and great clearness.

Mme. Brocks-Oetteking in New York.

Johanna Brocks-Oetteking, the soprano, who has located in New York, will be heard in concert during the season. Prior to coming to New York Mme. Brocks-Oetteking gave several recitals in Buenos Ayres, South America. The Deutsche Plata Zeitung says of Mme. Brocks-Oetteking: "The firmness of her voice in all its registers, the ease of her coloratura, the energy and soulfulness of her expression, strongly impressed the audience."

Oratorio Society in "Gerontius" December 9.

Correcting the erroneous report in last week's issue of the MUSICAL COURIER to the effect that "Elijah" was to be given, it is announced that Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" is to be performed December 9, at Carnegie Hall, by the Oratorio Society of New York, full orchestra, and the following soloists: Gervase Elwes, tenor, who has sung the name-part a hundred times, and comes from England especially for this performance; Mildred Potter, contralto, and Frank Croxton, bass.

It is also announced that Bossi's "Jeanne d'Arc," planned for the third concert, is to be performed as scheduled, the publishers sending word that the score and parts are on the way.

Myrtle Elvyn Appreciated.

The following letter sent to her manager will show the esteem in which Myrtle Elvyn is held in Arkadelphia, Ark.:

Harry Culbertson, Chicago, Ill.:

MY DEAR MR. CULBERTSON: I want to tell you how much we enjoyed Miss Elvyn at Ouachita College on Friday evening. It was a great treat to the students, and her gracious manner of shaking hands with all the young ladies and the concert will be a memorable event in the lives of these young musical aspirants.

MYRTLE ELVYN.

Before Miss Elvyn left the auditorium all the students assembled on the stairway and gave the college yell for the renowned pianist.

We are looking forward to my dear friends, the Zoellners. . . .

Wishing you a glorious season, I beg to remain, my dear Mr. Culbertson, Respectfully, (Signed) A. HOSKEN STRICK.

Helen Bixby Wetzel Sings on Shipboard.

Helen Bixby Wetzel is depicted in the accompanying snapshot on board the steamer Saxonia during a recent storm.

The concert on the steamer at which Miss Wetzel gave a scene and lullaby from the opera "Dinorah," on an improvised stage, was the occasion for an ovation tendered the young artist from the four hundred passengers present. For an encore she sang the "Ah non giunge" aria, from "Sonnambula."

HELEN BIXBY-WETZEL BRAVING A STORM AT SEA.

Miss Wetzel was an accomplished pianist prior to taking up her operatic work and speaks Italian, French and German fluently, as well as reads the classic literature of these three languages. The writings of Dante, Voltaire and Mme. de Maintenon are all included in her reading. Miss Wetzel is unusually talented along artistic lines, having modeled statuettes of Anna Pavlowa and Michael Mordkin and painted scenes from Dante and Beatrice.

Connell and Tollefsen in Joint Recital.

Horatio Connell, the baritone, appeared in a joint recital with Mme. Schnabel-Tollefsen, pianist, at Aeolian Hall, New York, on Wednesday evening, November 4. Mr. Connell opened his half of the program with the pathetic song by L. Mililotti, the "Heart-broken Mariner," which he sang with mournful cadence in excellent imitation of the moaning of the waves and the wind. His next number was in an entirely different vein, being the aria, "Triumph Now Is Mine," from Bach's cantata, "I With My Cross-staff Gladly Wander." Two German songs by Brahms completed this group. Mr. Connell's rendering of these selections was particularly appreciated because of his good diction and interpretation. The audience apparently would have greatly enjoyed more songs of this nature.

MME. SCHNABEL-TOLLEFSEN.

His second group consisted of four songs, "If That Angel of Shiraz" (Ghazel from the Divan of Hafiz), by Granville Bantock, the "Song of Boscosel de Chastelard," by Fini Henriques, and two charming selections by Ward-Stephens, "Hour of Dreams" and "Be Ye in Love with April-tide?" Regarding the two first ones, Mr. Connell made some explanatory remarks. Hearty applause followed this group and testified to the enjoyment of his audience.

"Weary, So Weary," from Wolf-Ferrari's "The New Life," opened his third and last group, the other numbers being three songs by Roger Quilter, "April," "A Last Year's Rose" and "The Song of the Blackbird."

Throughout his entire program Mr. Connell displayed his versatility and his command of various moods. The clarity and sonority of his tones were particularly noticeable, while each number was characterized by a thoughtful interpretation.

Ellis Clark Hammann was the accompanist for Mr. Connell and as such added greatly to the enjoyment of the evening. Mr. Hammann is an artist in his line and his services are in great demand, which is as it should be. At all times his playing of the accompaniments was sympathetic and in keeping with the interpretations of Mr. Connell.

Mme. Tollefsen's opening number was Grieg's G minor variations on a Norwegian air, which she interpreted beautifully. Her other numbers included selections by Moszkowski, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Chopin, the Strauss-Tausig waltz ("Man lebt nur einmal"), MacDowell's "Witches' Dance" and the second Hungarian rhapsody by Liszt. Mme. Tollefsen's excellent interpretative powers were in evidence throughout her numbers. The charm and grace of her playing were nowhere more prominent than in Moszkowski's "Etincelles," which was truly delightful. These same qualities were also in evidence in her playing of Mrs. Beach's "Le Fee de la Fontaine."

Fiqué's Fifth Lecture Recital.

Assisted by Katherine Noack-Fique, Carl Fique gave his fifth lecture-recital on the works of Richard Strauss in the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Academy of Music, Tuesday evening, November 3. Regarding this, the Brooklyn Eagle says:

Carl Fique gave his fifth lecture-recital on the works of Richard Strauss at the Academy of Music on Tuesday under Institute auspices. The program was devoted to miscellaneous instrumental compositions and songs, and Mr. Fique explained and played some of the composer's earlier works, such as the suite for wind instruments and the largo, in which the influence of Beethoven and Schubert is in evidence. Played also were the "Episode from Fire Famine," which shows Strauss in his highest mood, and the "Traumerei," in his most poetic.

The Strauss songs were interpreted by Katherine Noack-Fique, soprano. To interpret a Strauss song requires not only a good voice and fine command of vocal art, but also keen interpretation and high musicianship. They are technically enormously difficult, both vocally and in the accompaniment. Mme. Noack-Fique made her audience love the Strauss songs. Her singing of "All Souls' Day" was full of tender pathos. "Tomorrow" was a dramatic recitative, to which "Queen of My Heart" formed a happy and melodious contrast, while "Dream Through the Twilight" was sung with expression. Other songs were "Devotion," "Serenade" and the brilliant "Lover's Pledge," all of which were given with characteristic enunciation and the atmosphere of high art which Richard Strauss requires. The sixth and last recital by Mr. Fique, on November 10, will be on "Elektra."

Malkin Engages Malkin.

Manfred Malkin, director of the music school of that name, 26 Mount Morris Park West, New York, announces the engagement of his brother, Josef Malkin, as cello teacher. Mr. Malkin's tour in America (season 1909-1910) left a lasting reputation for this superior virtuoso. He also has pupils of renown, among them Gesella Trau, Paulo Gruppe, Joseph Ullstein, Jacques Lundendoen and others. Director Malkin feels very happy in having secured the services of his celebrated brother. This raises the standard of the string department very greatly. Josef Malkin comes to this country as first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Borwick's Impressive Art.

One of the most satisfying and thoroughly uplifting experiences which a sincere music lover may experience is to attend a piano recital by Leonard Borwick, and those who were at Carnegie Hall last Thursday afternoon, November 5, to hear the English player found him in one of his finest executive and interpretative moods.

His status as a real artist had been established here some years ago on the occasion of his single appearance in the metropolis, but last week's performances raised Borwick to an even higher plane of importance than hitherto in the estimation of New York's discriminative critics and professional keyboard sharps.

One of the first things that immediately impresses the visitor to a Borwick recital is his freedom from conventionality in the makeup of his program. At the concert in question the usual Beethoven sonata was substituted by that of Brahms in F minor (and placed in the center of the program, and not at the beginning) and Chopin's name was not among those of the composers represented. Also the transcribed G minor organ fugue by Bach was not a Liszt arrangement, but the player's own adaptation, and the concert failed to wind up with a Johann Strauss waltz or any resounding piece of dynamic display. The closing group consisted of Paderewski's very interesting A major variations (they are not, however, as good as his earlier variations in A minor), Rachmaninoff's "Serenade" and Liszt's ever lovely F minor study. Other numbers on the list were Beethoven's G major rondo, and three Scarlatti pieces.

A fine air of authority, felt in everything which came from under Borwick's fingers, is the result of the man's exquisite musical culture and finely balanced artistic perceptions. He is steeped in the most dignified and elevated musical traditions, and good taste, refined utterance and faithful adherence to the composer's wishes and ideals ever have been to Borwick the main achievements to be striven for rather than the exploitation of self in the larger sense and of individual accomplishment in a technical way or a bid for popular favor through the appeal of personality.

Borwick's nature is essentially that of a student and a thinker, but his readings are leavened by a subtle poetical sense and true temperamental expression, so that everything he does reveals form and finish in structural and artistic outline and yet has the added charm of being thoroughly heartfelt and human. He is in touch with all that in piano art which makes for the highest in spiritual expression. His presentation of the Brahms sonata, for instance, has not been surpassed here for profundity of feeling, bigness of drawing, power of musicianship, and versatility of lyric and dramatic resource. It was a masterful proclamation, and had Borwick done nothing else all afternoon the sonata would have stamped him indelibly on the minds of the listeners as one of the unquestionable giants of the piano. The andante and the scherzo, as Borwick did them, still are being talked about enthusiastically in local keyboard circles.

Borwick's Bach transcription is an impressive piece of workmanship, reverent, exhaustive, effective. He played it with a marvelous revelation of its inner structure and its musical beauty. Beethoven's G major rondo and the Scarlatti morceaux were delightful examples of that crisp touch, unfailing digital dexterity, and directness of sentiment which Borwick knows so well how to apply to his instrument.

Rare imagination and ability to paint picturesquely in tone were reflected in the Paderewski performance, while the ear was ravished with lovely sound and delicate finger technics in the Liszt etude.

There is in the Borwick art something so lofty in ideals, so impressively masterful in purpose and execution and so convincing as to the thoroughness of the musical knowledge and general culture which inspire the player, that no doubt as to his real significance is possible after hearing him deliver even a few dozen measures. He is a truly fine and sensitive pianist, and the warm applause he received from a singularly representative audience demonstrated the high esteem in which he is held here by the elect.

Mme. Schnabel-Tollefsen in Concert.

Augusta Schnabel-Tollefsen first came to the notice of the musical public when she was but eight years of age, and such progress did she make in her art that her talent attracted the attention of the Princess of Hesse and the Rothschilds, who took an active interest in her welfare. As a child she was heard in Germany, Switzerland and Belgium. At the age of fifteen she returned to this country from Frankfort and made a tour of the Middle West. After continuing her studies with Paolo Gallico, she made her debut with the New York Symphony Orchestra on November 25, 1906.

Mme. Schnabel-Tollefsen takes her art seriously and is continually meeting with marked success therein, as may be seen from the following press notices, which refer to a recent concert appearance:

Mme. Tollefsen, who had established her reputation as a pianist with the Tollefsen Trio, showed that as an individual concert artist also she possesses unusual powers.—New York Evening Mail.

Mme. Schnabel-Tollefsen, after she had played Grieg's ballad in G minor, a set of variations on a Norwegian air, devoted herself almost wholly to pieces of a light and brilliant character. These she played correctly in a neat and sparkling style.—New York Times.

Her playing was sparkling and brilliant and the applause evoked being well deserved.—Brooklyn Citizen.

Mme. Schnabel-Tollefsen played Grieg, Chopin, Moszkowski, Liszt and Mrs. Beach. Her gift is pronounced and her powers emphatic.—New York Morning Telegraph.

The deftness and grace of her playing came out with particularly charming effect in things like Moszkowski's "Etincelles" and Mrs. Beach's "La Fee de la Fontaine."—New York Globe.

Mme. Tollefsen's numbers included Mrs. Beach's "La Fee de la Fontaine," a study in A flat, and Grieg's variations, all played pleasingly.—New York Evening World.

Mme. Tollefsen made a decided hit in the Liszt Hungarian rhapsody, No. 11.—Brooklyn Standard Union.

Mme. Tollefsen opened the program with Grieg's ballad. She gets a good tone and has developed her technic sufficiently for most needs. Her best playing was in such works as Moszkowski's "Etincelles."—New York Herald.

There was hearty recognition for the efforts of Mme. Tollefsen, a pianist of pleasing methods.—New York World.

Mme. Schnabel-Tollefsen looked the part of a highborn, charming artist. She began with Grieg's ballad in G minor and she gave to it lofty meaning, a singing beauty of tone, and a facile technic. The Liszt number was made gorgeous, though it has not the fireworks motive in it to startle an audience; its sparkling quality was made highly effective.—Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

Miss Schnabel, or Mrs. Tollefsen now, has played in a well known trio and showed to advantage in compositions by Mrs. Beach, MacDowell and Moszkowski.—New York Evening Sun.

Mme. Tollefsen had selected a program from Grieg, Chopin, Moszkowski, Strauss-Tausig, Mrs. Beach, and in them the lady disclosed a wealth of purling finger technic.—New York Staats Zeitung.

George Sweet Pupil Gives Musicale.

Florence de B. Allen, a pupil of George Sweet, gave a musicale at her New York studio, on Thursday, November 5. Music was furnished by Mr. and Mrs. Bechtel Alcock, Frank Warner, David Talmage, Gladys Allen, Frederick Whyte and Samuel Brown.

Tina Lerner Charms.

One of the most welcome of New York's many interesting pianistic visitors from Europe is petite and dainty Tina Lerner, "the tiny woman with the big technic and wide musical understanding," as a leading musician remarked after he had heard her play Liszt's B minor sonata at her Aeolian Hall recital, Tuesday afternoon, November 10.

It was a surprise to her admirers here when Miss Lerner put the massive Liszt work on her program, as it is not a composition ordinarily chosen for performance by women, and also her pianistic style as demonstrated in this city previously seemed to point rather to the lyrical than to the poignantly dramatic. But those who wondered at Miss Lerner's selection of the Liszt leviathan sonata had reckoned without the tremendous intellectual and musical development which has gone on in the young artist's mind and soul for the past few years, and whose rich flowering was revealed so strikingly at her latest New York appearance. She did not approach the colossal piece of writing in an experimental spirit, nor was there apparent in any part of her reading the mere surface victory of technical command. The musicianly dissection and analysis of the score, as shown in the Lerner version, her sure penetration into Liszt's moods, now deeply introspective and again assertively eloquent, her freedom from all temptation for external display, her exceptionally virile technical grasp, and the refreshing air of sincerity and conviction with which she projected the epical musical pages, all combined to prove that Tina Lerner must no longer be reckoned among the promising talents of the piano, but should be accorded a position in the ranks of its most telling exponents. There is no other way to express the impression she made in the sonata than to say that she filled her hearers with amazed delight and aroused them to demonstrations nothing short of fervent.

The same remarkable expansion of the Lerner art was noticeable in the Martini minuet and rondo, and the Sgambati old style gavotte, in which uncommon repose, limpid clarity of tone and absolute reproduction of the archaic spirit that invests them, were outstanding features. Grateful to the ear and delicately adjusted as to dynamics and rhythmic nuances were the Busoni transcriptions of Beethoven's "Ecossaises." A melodious G minor prelude by Rachmaninoff, Tscherepnine's humoresque, and a scherzo by Balakireff, had dash, piquancy and tonal appeal in their presentment.

Chopin always was one of the composers who found especial sympathy in the Lerner repertoire, and so his A flat impromptu, F minor nocturne, etudes Nos. 8, 6, 9, from opus 251, and the polonaise fantaisie, received full due from the player. Her unexcelled rapidity of finger movement, her fine ear for tonal and pedal effects, her versatile exposition of the morbidezza as well as of the whimsical moments in the Polish composer, and her ability to draw sentiment from the keys as well as to build her tone into climaxes of ringing power, fit her to voice the works of Chopin in the fashion which has been acknowledged to be the most characteristic of his music and its manner.

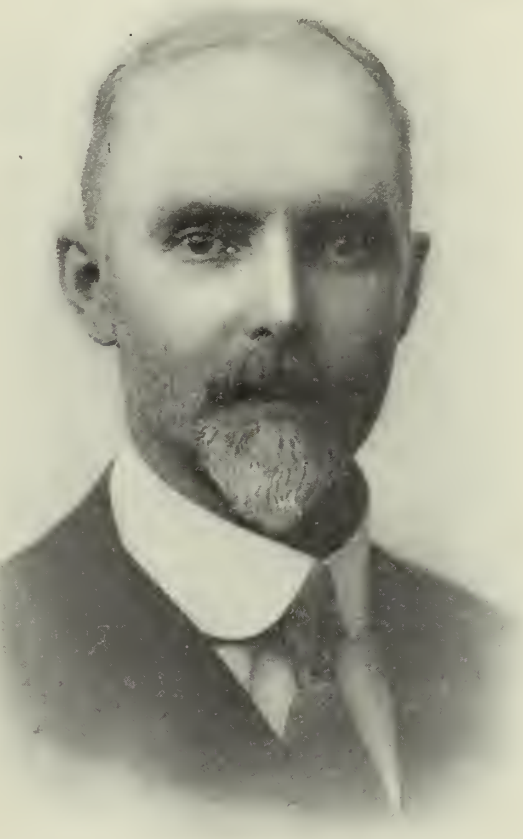
From first to last the audience showered Miss Lerner with marks of its favor and compelled her to add three additional numbers at the end of her program. She never has been more successful in New York and her future looms imposingly.

Paul Althouse Sings at Norwich.

Norwich, N. Y., November 6, 1914.

Paul Althouse, tenor, whose rise to fame in a very short period is a matter of record, gave a song recital of fifteen numbers in the Monday Evening Musical Club course, on November 2. Mr. Althouse, who sang Italian arias, American and English composer's songs and a group of German lieder, greatly pleased his large audience. He had their attention from the very first, and admiration for his singing and his wholesome personality increased with every number. Mr. Althouse might be called a cosmopolitan singer, for he sings Italian street songs with genuine Southern spirit, and his German songs are rendered as only a real German can sing them. His songs by American composers were as follows "Before the Dawn," Chadwick; "If I Were King of Ireland," Fay Foster; "In After Days," Chadwick; "Here on the Brae," Jordan; "Love Song," Haesche.

Following each of his groups of songs, Mr. Althouse was obliged to sing an encore. At the close of the program prominent musical people of this very musical town crowded forward to meet the singer, who proceeded to Portland, Me., to sing on the next evening.



This is the native town of F. W. Riesberg, who was accompanist for Mr. Althouse. Both gentlemen were the recipients of pleasant social attentions during their stay.

Norwich is now the youngest city in New York State, having been recently incorporated. Much of its musical progress is due to the deceased Dr. Linn Babcock, who as early as 1870 taught music here and founded the well known piano firm of L. & A. Babcock. It is the only city in New York State having a "graduation course" in piano, which is charge of Sophia Tefft. The Monday Evening Musical Club, Kathryne A. Lee, president, and Ethel Jewel, treasurer, is doing much for the cause of music, bringing splendid artists here every season. More of the doings of this club anon.

Florence Austin, violinist, is to be here with her own company February 1, 1915. H. R. F.

Dr. A. Madeley Richardson's Activity.

Dr. A. Madeley Richardson, who came to America several years ago after occupying prominent positions in England as organist, choir director and conductor, is much in demand as organist and director of the Calvary Grand Choir, at Calvary Baptist Church (now known as the Rockefeller Church), etc. Dr. Richardson says: "This choir is coming ahead finely." The organization as formed by the lamented E. M. Bowman is continued. Bessie Bowman-Estey, and Mrs. Bowman, remain as interested in the choir as ever. There are nearly one hundred singers, and an examination of the church programs shows the performance of such choral numbers as "The Heavens are Telling," Beethoven's "Hallelujah" chorus, excerpts from Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," etc. Besides Mrs. Bowman-Estey, the remaining soloists of this choir are Miss Remington, soprano, and Messrs. Ormsby and Bushnell, tenor and bass, respectively.

DR. A. MADELEY RICHARDSON.

Dr. Richardson is also on the staff of the Institute of Musical Art, where he teaches theory, and of the Trinity School of Church Music, where he has a large class of young organists. He spends one day weekly at St. Mary's School, Peekskill-on-the-Hudson. This is a flourishing private school under Episcopalian auspices. Beside these connections, he has many private pupils. The present writer had opportunity to observe his method of vocal coaching, and found it admirable in all respects.

Dr. Richardson's various books upon church music and other subjects have a wide and constant circulation, and considerable interest is being evinced in the forthcoming publication by Schirmer's of his latest work, "The Choir-trainer's Art."

Thursday evening, November 5, there was a musicale, address, choir parade and installation of officers of "The Order of Macintosh," the choir organization of Calvary Church, as follows:

Grand Macintosh, Milburn C. W. Spalding.
Chief, Division I, Jane A. Pendergrass.
Chief, Division II, Ida Smelt.
Chief, Division III, Fannie Russell.
Chief, Division IV, Carrie Lockwood.
Secretary, Division I, Edythe I. Kells.
Secretary, Division II, Pauline Hagood.
Secretary, Division III, Wilhelmina Hinck.
Secretary, Division IV, Ethel Russell.

Dr. Richardson is pleasantly located in a Riverside Drive apartment, overlooking the Hudson River and the Palisades, and thoroughly enjoys his work in America, so widely divergent in character from that pursued abroad.

Hamish MacKay's Recital.

A song recital with some unusual features was given by the Scotch baritone, Hamish MacKay, assisted by Fay Foster, American pianist and composer, at the New York debut of the former in Aeolian Hall, Thursday evening, November 5. A striking innovation was the appearance of Mr. MacKay in full Highland dress for the group of Scotch folksongs, which concluded the program. The costume, copied from that of "Bonnie Prince Charlie," was very handsome, and was worn with distinction, so the novelty was agreeable.

The program was made up of English and Scottish art songs by composers who, with few exceptions are unknown here, a group of Irish folksongs, and the Scotch songs before mentioned, arranged by present day composers.

Mr. MacKay sang all these with considerable taste, charm and excellent enunciation, particularly in the dialect songs. His voice has a warm, sympathetic quality and the pianissimo is effective. He did good work in the art songs, notably in the dramatic "Ethiopia Saluting the Colors," "Son of Mine" and a powerful song by Miss Foster, "The King," which was enthusiastically received. An extra number was added to this group. The Irish songs were well liked, the quaint "Cuckoo Madrigal" being redemanded.

But it was in his singing of the Scotch folksongs that Mr. MacKay distinguishes himself. He has instinctive feeling for the exquisite tenderness and humor that characterize them, and they are well suited to his voice. The Jacobite song, "Johnnie Cope," was given with satiric gaiety, "The Braes o' Balquidder" with charming sentiment, and the delicious "Skye Milking Song" had to be repeated. After this group the artist gave "Loch Lomond" by request, and showed fine feeling for its pathos. Mr. MacKay prefaced the Scotch songs with some remarks on his and his compatriot's purpose of raising the standard of Scotch music and making it more widely known. These beautiful folksongs, well loved by those who know them, are unfamiliar to he general public; Mr. MacKay's efforts to make them better known are most praiseworthy.

A very enjoyable feature of the recital was the exquisite accompanying of Miss Foster. Before the last group of songs she played three Scotch dances by MacCunn, with sure, clean touch and much interpretative charm. Both she and Mr. MacKay were warmly applauded by an audience of fair size.

Gemünder Items.

The October issue of the Violin World, issued by the long established firm of August Gemünder & Sons, contains many articles of suggestive interest. Some of the captions of these articles are as follows: "Do You Think While You Are Practising?" "Concerning Old Masters," "Are Musicians 'Freaks'?" "Maud Powell's Practice Rules for Violinists," etc.

The advertising in this little publication is also interesting. Here is Gemünder's own advertisement:

Another article begins thus: "Since moving into our new home we have had a very steady increase in our violin string trade. This division of our business is growing rapidly. We are constantly aiming to improve and perfect our strings," etc.

Goetzl and "Lilac Domino."

Anselm Goetzl, alluded to by New York critics as "A real find for Dippel," is creating warm admirers with every performance of the Cuvillier operetta, "The Lilac Domino," now on the boards of the Forty-fourth Street Theatre. Here he wields the baton with surety and clearness, so that not only orchestra, chorus and principals understand, but the general public also obtain a clear conception of real conductorship. There are no posings or affectations in Goetzl's leadership; everything is as crisp and direct and understandable as if it were spoken speech. Particularly do the ensembles go well, when this musical general handles his forces with precise military effect; what he wants he gets, and that is the highest conductor-art. Of particular charm is the musical intermezzo, with Kinemacolor pictures. Dr. Goetzl has himself written operettas which have had successful production in Germany, and it is rumored that one is to be produced here ere long, with a libretto by Leonard Liebling.

Werrenrath in Boston.

Reinald Werrenrath, the baritone, is to appear with Olga Samaroff, the pianist, in the Ellis series at Symphony Hall, Boston, Sunday, November 15.

Alda's Press Tributes.

Frances Alda, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, opened her concert season at Newark, N. J., where she sang on October 20. Following this she appeared in concert on October 26 at Hartford, Conn. In both cities she met with instantaneous success, the audiences being unusually large and very enthusiastic, as may be seen from the opinions of the music critics on the Newark Evening Star and the Hartford Post, which are quoted herewith:

Rarely has the pleasure been accorded to me to listen to such exquisitely beautiful tones as came last night with nightingale-like ease from the throat of that wonderful prima donna, Frances Alda, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Oh, for a pen capable of picturing in words the emotions those divine notes aroused in my bosom! What a pity that the art of writing—not only the little of it which I possess, but even that of the greatest writers—should straggle so far behind the art of music as to be unable to conjure up such visions as fill the mind while an Alda is pouring forth her soul in song!

The Graces, no less than the Muses, were kind to Mme. Alda. She is as beautiful in form and feature as she is gifted in song. And her smile is something memorable. She seemed to radiate cheer, joy and happiness when she entered upon the stage. Her smile captivated the audience; and every nod and every gesture was fraught with a grace and elegance which stamped her at once as a true denizen of Parnassus.

As is customary in all concert singing, she remained almost motionless; and yet her entire frame seemed vibrant with the varying emotions called forth by the successive phrases of the songs.

With your eyes closed you might have fancied you were in Elysium listening to the "harmony of the spheres"; with your eyes open, you had the added pleasure of beholding the enactment of a drama. For there were life and fire in every movement, even though barely indicated rather than actually carried out.

It were hard to conceive any gesture more graceful or gracious than that with which at the conclusion of three songs Mme. Alda each time indicated that Frank la Forge, who accompanied her at the piano, was their author.—Newark Evening Star.

. . . Mme. Alda, the principal vocal soloist of the program, was to me a charming and delightful revelation. With a personality radiant with intelligence, a voice of brilliant melody, a method as simple in appearance as it was effective and a dramatic perception that lent conviction to every syllable she uttered, she presented an elaborate and varied program, ranging from Dr. Arne's foolish little "Polly Willis" to the prayer from Puccini's "Tosca," with the rarest skill of a finished artist and the convincing appeal of an honest heart.

It was a performance that found without effort an abiding place in the memory of its hearers and won for Mme. Alda the lasting friendship of our Hartford audience.

Mme. Alda's upper register has the singing quality of a violin and the inexhaustible volume of Caruso's crescendos in contradistinction to the usual tempie racking stridency of the ordinary feminine vocalist. . . . It was a most enjoyable concert, and I don't remember any vocalist who ever responded to encores in quite such a spirit of gracious comradeship. I hope she sings in Hartford again soon. Bogert Sings Before MacDowell Club.

At the request of the board of directors, Walter L. Bogert gave his program, "Folk Songs of Germany, Ancient and Modern," before the MacDowell Club of New York on Election Day, Tuesday, November 3. There was a large and appreciative audience, among whom were Mrs. Edward MacDowell, Charlotte Babcock, Adele Baldwin, Miss de Ahna, Mrs. Smock-Boice, Heinrich Meyn, Clarence Dickinson, F. Morris Class, Lewis M. Isaacs, and others.

This was Mr. Bogert's seventh recital since October 1.

The program was as follows:

ANCIENT.

Thirteenth to Sixteenth Centuries.

Hildebrandslied	Historic Folksong
All' mein Gedanken sind bei Dir	Minnelieder
Ach Elslein	Minnelieder
Es steht ein' Lind' in jenem Thal	Minnelieder
Es taget vor dem Walde	Minnelieder
Das Maidlein	Minnelieder
Sommerlied	Neidhart (Minnesinger)
Lied eines Fahrenden	A Traveling Minstrel's Song

MODERN.

Der Weihnachtsmann	Children's Christmas Song
Die Auserwählte (The Chosen One)	1828
Spinnerliedchen (Spinning Song)	1836
Alles ist hin (Everything's Gone)	1799
Schwäbisches Volkslied (The Lantern)	1771
Doctor Eisenbart (Doctor Irongray)	——
Der Tannenbaum (The Fir Tree)	1709
Lorelei	F. Silcher (1837)
Treue Liebe (True Love)	1840
Die Wacht am Rhein	Carl Wilhelm (1854)

Steinberg in Boston November 15th.

Bernhard Steinberg, the cantor of Temple Beth El, New York, has been booked for a number of Hebrew Temple music concerts. The first of these concerts will take place at Symphony Hall, Boston, Sunday evening, November 15.

Owing to the splendid educational value of his work, and the many interesting musical features which Dr. Steinberg is so well fitted to embody with his magnificent voice, in addition to the high position he occupies as the cantor of one of the foremost temples in America, an unusual demand has been created for these concerts.

They will be of unique interest to the Gentile as well as to the Jew, for even the former race hardly realize in its entirety the exquisite beauty of the music which has been in vogue in the synagogues from time immemorial to the present day.

NEW YORK BREVITIES.

Max Jacobs' Engagements—William Nelson Burritt's Booklet—John Finnegan Busy—Noble's Program—Margaretha Kirpal—Notes.

New York, November 9, 1914.

Max Jacobs, violinist, leader of the quartet of that name, and conductor, has already booked eight engagements for this month, as follows: November 7, Hotel Astor, International Art Club; November 9, Brooklyn, N. Y.; November 11, Newark, N. J.; November 12, Christ Lutheran Church; November 13, Mineola, N. J.; November 14, Beethoven Society, Waldorf-Astoria; November 21, Murray Hill Lyceum; November 29, Bronxville Labor Lyceum.

BURRITT BOOK.

William Nelson Burritt, the voice specialist and repertoire builder, announces the publication of the eighth edition of his practical guide for the training of the voice, "A Process of Vocal Study." Those who know Mr. Burritt will find in his book the reflection of much material which he uses in his teaching. Those who do not know Mr. Burritt, but are interested in his methods will do well to order this booklet, which is for sale at all music houses.

JOHN FINNEGAN.

John Finnegan, who made such a hit as soloist at the Maine Festival last year, writes that he is unusually busy, with engagements coming in every day. He expects to have a very active season. He says: "The war is not going to bother me." Of his various appearances throughout the United States and Canada, readers of the MUSICAL COURIER will hear more later.

NOBLE'S NOVEMBER 15 PROGRAM.

T. Tertius Noble plays the following "international program" at his next Sunday evening organ recital at St. Thomas' P. E. Church, Fifty-third street and Fifth avenue, November 15.

Sonata No. 1	Borowski
Barcarolle	Sterndale Bennett
Two Woodland Sketches	MacDowell
Madrigal	Lemare
Andante and Passacaglia	Rheinberger
Finale symphony pathetic	Tschaikowsky

All of the selections are by composers residing in or descended from residents of different countries, Poland, England, America, France, Germany and Russia being on the list.

MARGARETHA KIRPAL.

Margaretha Kirpal, teacher of singing, having studios in Flushing, L. I., and at 235 East Fifty-second street, New York, is a great believer in deep breathing. A circular from her says: "It makes new red blood. It makes muscle tissue. It builds up your body." Some of her pupils sing in New York City choirs, and her annual recital at the Hotel Plaza shows the results of her practical teaching.

NOTES.

Lalage Fletcher, soprano, was the vocal soloist at the Country Life Permanent Exposition musicale, October 31. She sang songs in French and English in a clear and true soprano voice, with a good deal of taste. Her enunciation, especially, is to be commended. Miss Fletcher is a sister of Mrs. Fletcher-Copp.

Mathilde Hallam McLewee will give an afternoon of songs, in which she and various other well known artists will take part, on Sunday, November 15, at her handsome residence-studio, 21 West Sixty-ninth street. Songs of Hallet Gilberté form an important feature of the program.

Maarten Spies, the Hollandish pianist and teacher, for three years professor at the Stern Conservatory, Berlin, assistant to Breithaupt, is now in America. He studied with Leschetizky.

Abram Roy Tyler, formerly organist in Brooklyn, now professionally active in Detroit, Mich., is giving a series of recitals at Temple Beth El, Detroit. He calls these a "Quiet Hour of Music," and this is his third season. On the program are various modern and classic works with a solo singer assisting.

The New Assembly concert of November 19, 3 p. m., at the Hotel Plaza, will be given by the Cosmopolitan Quartet, composed of Grace Northrup, Mabel Beddoe, Melville W. Barton and R. Norman Jolliffe. The solo pianist will be George Halprin, and the accompanist Harry Oliver Hirt. Belle Ranske is the founder, David Bispham the honorary president, and Rudolph Ganz the honorary vice-president of the New Assembly.

Five members of the Lachmund family gave an evening of music, including national character dances, in Yonkers, October 30. Little Anita is apparently the most talented of the three children. She played the piano, danced, and gave a musical monologue, all in charming fashion. There were clean playing and good style in Marjorie Gleyre Lachmund's playing. Arnaud Lachmund played with power and effectiveness. "Five Minutes with Liszt" was an address given by Mr. Lachmund, Sr., and this, in which were incorporated some of the personal experiences of Mr. Lachmund (who was a Liszt pupil, proved very interesting to the large audience. Mr. Lachmund's New York studio is at Steinway Hall.

The Women's Philharmonic Society of New York, Amy Fay, president, gave the first concert, November 7, in the Chapter Room, Carnegie Hall, the program being selected from compositions by Benjamin Lambord. These were the artists concerned: Benjamin Lambord, pianist; Clementine Tetedoux-Lusk, soprano; Robert Maitland, baritone; Laura Tappen, cellist; Edward Manning, violinist. Mr. Lambord accompanied all his compositions. Of the artists, Robert Maitland, baritone, is a new arrival from England. He sang the following songs with rare finish: "Remember or Forget," op. 1, No. 1; "Lehn' deine Wang'," op. 7, No. 1; "Mir ist's nun ich dich habe," op. 7, No. 2; "A Health to King Charles." Mrs. Tetedoux-Lusk was chairman of the committee. At the next musicale, November 28, 4 p. m., compositions of Hallet Gilberté will be performed.

Isabel Franklin Longbotham is a pupil of Christine Adler, and possesses a beautiful voice and good style in singing. She has a repertoire consisting of the standard oratorios, operatic arias and songs, all of which she has perfected under Mme. Adler. A very pleasant appearance is also one of her assets.

May McGibeny's singing has won warm admiration from Dr. Henry T. Fleck. This soprano was soloist on November 1 at the concert given by the City Orchestra, under Dr. Fleck's direction, at East Side Forum. She sang the following: "Ave Maria," with violin obligato, Gounod; "Sing, Smile, Slumber," with flute obligato, Gounod; "Where Blooms the Rose," Clayton Johns; "Frühlingsfluten," Rachmaninoff. Mrs. McGobeny pleased her audience to such an extent that she was obliged to sing encores after each appearance.

Edwin Orlo Bangs, tenor of the Mehan Studios, will give a recital at Milbank Chapel, Columbia University, Wednesday afternoon, November 18, at five o'clock. Mrs. Mehan will play the singer's accompaniments.

"I have a great idea for a musical comedy!" exclaimed one manager.

"Something in the way of a plot?"

"No. But I know how to get a letter of introduction to a man who might put up money to run the show."—Washington Star.

THE MANAGERS' FORUM.

High Schools and Good Music.

The wonderful possibilities that lie within the reach of the supervisors of music in smaller cities has been clearly demonstrated by Miss H—— in a city of only 50,000.

This city was known for many years past as a "cemetery" for any high class musical entertainment that ever dared to risk a performance in its opera house. Things went from bad to worse, for once the outside musical artists ceased coming little by little the local musical activities diminished, until outside of a few picnics given by the German music societies no other attempt was ever made to cultivate good music.

What Miss H. Did.

Such were the prospects when Miss H—— struck town. After studying the situation for a while, this energetic little woman set about to concoct the remedy. It was not long before she organized a high school orchestra, and after a few successful "home talent" musical entertainments, she pointed out to the Board of Education the absolute necessity of bringing professional musical artists to the city in order to educate the children to the appreciation and cultivation of the best music.

"You can, if it pays," was the laconic answer.

Miss H—— at once engaged her artists and without delay set about to prove to the Board of Education that such things as concerts could be made to pay, even at popular prices.

As soon as she received a program she requested the children to "read up" on the lives and accomplishments of the composers, and, nolens volens, they were all compelled to take interest in her work, for she requested essays to be written by all the children in the higher grades.

Her next step was to deliver lectures on the mission of good music, and again she compelled the children to write essays on that subject.

Bringing Music Home.

She did not stop at this, for Miss H—— realized that only if she should carry the message into the home would her campaign prove a success. This was accomplished in a very simple manner. Miss H—— requested very strenuously from the pupils that all those essays must be read by the parents, and their aid was sought in correcting the papers before submitting them to her. It all worked like a charm; the parents who heretofore never had given a passing thought to what good music meant to their children, these very parents, without their knowledge, were being recruited into the ranks of enthusiasts for the cause of better music.

Other Factors.

A phonograph was brought into the high school auditorium and illustrated lectures were given, at all times bringing forth the "human interest" forces in the compositions, and in the life of their composer.

This incessant campaign was kept up to the night of the concert. The press reached out its helping hand and through its liberal contribution of interesting reading matter, perfected the crusade.

The result was that 1,320 people jammed the hall to the doors and hundreds were turned away.

That first concert opened the eyes of every intelligent person in the city I mention. The sceptics who spoke of lack of appreciation of good music in days gone by were not to be found anywhere after the concert.

The next concert was given in the largest theatre; the price of admission ranged from 25 cents to $1, for Miss H—— did not intend to make money—her only aim was to give the best available talent for the least money and to the majority of the people.

There are hundreds of cities all throughout this country that are in sore need of a brave woman like Miss H——, but as long as they cannot all win her services and fine spirit for their cause, why not adopt her methods?

Managerial Jottings.

These paragraphs are not written in the spirit of competition, but that of co-operation with Laszlo Schwartz's "Managerial Maxims," recently published in the MUSICAL COURIER:

Advertising is similar to matrimony—easy to get into, but difficult to get out of.

It is one of the satirical tricks of that Moloch, Publicity, to exact the greatest sacrifices from young artists when they can least afford them, and to help the artists without remuneration at a period when they could best afford to bring their offerings.

Most artists who believe they are playing "over the heads" of the audience are playing over their own heads.

You cannot play too much Bach at home for your own benefit, but too much Bach in public harms the box office and may harm you.

Show me your reëngagements and I will tell you how long your career will last.

Artists decry "commercialism in art" when it does not pay, but forget about its evils when the season ends with a goodly balance in profits.

The press agent is the scout of the artist who can point the way to victory, or hasten his downfall.

If patience is a virtue, some musical artists and their managers who are awaiting developments may be considered angels.

It takes a good press agent half a lifetime to learn what to say, and a whole lifetime to learn what to eliminate from his publicity.

The so called "short cut" in a musical career often is the longest way to the goal.

To be talented is a credit to your Maker, but to prove the value of your talent will be the making of yourself.

If you have cancellations, keep them to yourself, but let every rooster crow about the successes of your artist.

If critics knew what the artists don't know, and the artists knew what critics don't know, peace would forever reign in the ranks of both.

The difference between the poet and the press agent is just this: The poet does not care whether his dreams are published or not; the press agent sees that his are.

NEMO.

Kathleen Howard as Carmen.

Kathleen Howard's achievements in the title role of "Carmen" when that opera was given at the Century Opera House, New York, have already been chronicled in these columns. The originality and charm of Miss Howard's impersonation of this role as seen by the critics of the leading New York dailies are shown by the following press notices:

KATHLEEN HOWARD AS CARMEN.

The whole theatre rippled with applause every time Kathleen Howard whirled across the stage in a series of costumes and poses like pictures of Spain's modern painters come to life. For sheer personality and theatric instinct Miss Howard has no rival among American singing actresses since Mary Garden.—New York Evening Sun.

As the fascinating gypsy girl, full of moods and fancies, Kathleen Howard fairly outdid herself in the role of Carmen. Not a quirk or gesture, not a look or tone did she miss, and the [illegible] plause brought her before the curtain many times.—New York Press.

As the Spanish gypsy Miss Howard has been heard on previous occasions with success, and her interpretation is one that is graphic with action and artistic effect.—New York American.

Kathleen Howard presented an interesting conception of the gypsy cigarette girl. In this as in every character that Miss Howard impersonates, there is an underlying intelligence that compels respect.—New York Evening World.

The one person on the stage last night, principal or chorister, whose make-up conveyed any atmosphere was Miss Kathleen Howard, the Carmen of the cast. But then Miss Howard has shown before that she knows the importance of looking a part. Her make-up last night was distinctly valuable. Miss Howard also sang in the second act better than I have ever heard her sing. Dramatically, her impersonation was intelligent and painstaking. She realizes that the Spanish gypsy is a mobile animal.—New York Globe.

Kathleen Howard's interpretation of the title role is already familiar to Century patrons. Vocally and dramatically it is a careful piece of work, consistent with the traditions of the part.—New York Evening Mail.

Miss Howard sang her role in good taste and in a voice of wide range and pleasant timbre.—Brooklyn, N. Y., Eagle.

Her Carmen is certainly not orthodox, but it is a strong and moving interpretation, and must convince as being replete with realism and artistic verity. Miss Howard has done much to introduce the genuine spirit of the Spanish cigarette girl with this role, and hers is a strong and impassioned impersonation.—Musical Courier.

Notes on Alexander Bloch's Recital.

Alexander Bloch, the violinist, gave a recital recently in Aeolian Hall, New York, as already chronicled in these columns. His success is shown by the following excerpts from the New York daily press:

It was comparatively quiet in the concert world yesterday. There were only two entertainments, both in Aeolian Hall.

The concert of the evening was that of Alexander Bloch. This violinist was heard here last season and gained some favor. His best qualities were disclosed in the first number on the program, the sonata in G major, op. 96, of Beethoven, for violin and piano. In this the violinist had the assistance of Blanche Bloch (presumably his sister) at the piano, and it can be said without hesitation that the two gave real pleasure.

Mr. Bloch is a pupil of Sevcik and of Auer, and in the Beethoven composition he showed the value of their training. There was a restful finish in his performance that promised well for his future. Miss Bloch played her part with excellent touch, rhythm and taste.—New York Sun, October 29, 1914.

Alexander Bloch, who unobtrusively gave a violin recital in New York a year ago, as unobtrusively gave another last evening in Aeolian Hall. He showed himself to be imbued with a fine artistic spirit, a delicate and sensitive feeling for musical beauty, and a technical equipment which is in many respects soundly and healthily developed.

What Mr. Bloch distinctly can and cannot do was illustrated by the first two numbers of his program: Beethoven's exquisitely dreamy and introspective sonata for piano and violin, op. 96, he played delightfully, preserving its fragile outlines and filling them with quite the right mood and spirit, being extremely well seconded therein on the piano by Blanche Bloch. Paganini's D major concerto he played, on the whole, competently, though with some evidences of labor in certain of the more elaborate passages; but with very little of the dash, brilliancy and fire that alone make the thing worth while—if they do make it worth while—and that are about the sole reasons for its being. Mr. Bloch's tone is full and sympathetic, his bowing sufficiently vigorous and elastic, and his left hand ready to meet all but transcendent demands upon it. He plays with poise and with an innate refinement of style, and it is evident that his disposition is toward the really artistic things in music.

Besides these two major pieces his program contained arrangements of Chopin by Auer, of Brahms by Joachim, of Wagner by Wilhelmj—so poor apparently is the violinist's repertoire—and Sgambati's "Serenata Napoletana" and Wieniawski's D major polonaise. Of Blanche Bloch's accompaniments much praise is to be uttered.—New York Times, October 29, 1914.

Alexander Bloch gave a recital in Aeolian Hall last night, and to show his quality in a variety of styles, as is now the custom, he played a sonata for violin and piano (Beethoven's in C major, op. 96), the Paganini concerto in D and a group of short pieces, including transcriptions by Auer, Joachim and Wilhelmj.

Since there was no revelation in the music itself, attention was centered upon the player. Mr. Bloch is a local musician, one, we believe, who has lifted himself out of the ranks of the city's numerous cultivated amateurs. His later studies were made with the Russian, Auer, to whose devotion to sound musical taste this pupil, at least, does large credit.

Mr. Bloch seems well grounded in refined musicianship. He sacrifices nothing to a desire to display mere technical skill. He shows an effectionate appreciation of tonal beauty and of elegance in style. He is not especially virile, but neither is he effeminately sentimental.

His playing of the sonata with Miss Blanche was sweet and sane, pleasant to hear, free from affectation, and his mastery of the difficulties of the concerto highly creditable, though without suggesting anything calculated to cause wonder. His was a delightful musical entertainment in the best sense.—New York Tribune, October 29, 1914.

Leginska Recital November 16th.

An all Chopin program will be played by the young pianist, Ethel Leginska, at her recital in Aeolian Hall, Monday afternoon, November 16, 3 o'clock. She will play the twelve etudes, op. 10, the B flat minor sonata, op. 35, and twelve etudes, op. 25.

PLANS FOR TRI-CITY FESTIVAL UNDER WAY.

Four Soloists for May Concerts Announced—Second Rehearsal of Gigantic Newark Chorus Causes Pleasing Comments—List of Singers Increasing Daily—Officers of Jersey City Advisory Committee Elected—Large Body of Singers to be Organized—Chorus to be Established in Elizabeth.

Newark, N. J., November 9, 1914.

Some time—and if predictions come true the date is but a year or two distant—New Jersey will be able to boast of a gigantic tri-city music festival such as has never been given before in any State in the Union. So tremendous a scheme may seem almost impossible to the local musician or music lover, especially so because of the lack of enthusiasm and coöperation in the past. The belief that it might be accomplished, however, is sufficient ground upon which to start the foundation of such an enterprise. Once started, present encumbrances will rapidly disappear and time alone will tell how soon Newark, Jersey City and Elizabeth—and perhaps Paterson and Trenton, too—will join hands in giving the public an annual music festival so enormous in its proportions that it will be a subject for comment all over the world.

The first step toward such an accomplishment has already been taken. After years of experimenting, during which labor, time and money have been spent by enthusiastic musicians without material results, the music loving public of these cities has begun to realize the possibilities of such an undertaking, both in a commercial as well as a cultural way. The educational point of view alone has won back many a discouraged music lover, and the business men and women have been convinced that such an enterprise is well worth financial support should such be necessary.

Great interest is now being centered in the gigantic chorus which has been organized by the Newark Music Festival Association for the three-day music festival to be given in the First Regiment Armory on May 4, 5 and 6 next. The original plan to form a chorus of one thousand voices has been materially enlarged. With the prospects of a Jersey City chorus of five hundred voices, and the probable addition of two or three hundred singers from Elizabeth, this number should be increased to a much larger figure. Both in Jersey City and in Elizabeth the chorus will meet weekly, all of the singers meeting in Newark once a month with the central body for a combined rehearsal. With these three choral bodies grouped together, it is believed that a chorus of far greater size than was originally planned or ever dreamed of will be ready next spring for the Newark festival.

Pasquale Amato, the noted baritone; Anna Case, the soprano, and Paul Althouse, tenor, all of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and each one well known the world over, have been engaged as soloists for "Opera Night." The contralto who will complete the quartet has not yet been decided upon. One of the choral numbers to be sung on this occasion is the aria from the second act of "Aida," when, in addition to the above named quartet, a chorus of over one thousand voices, an orchestra of one hundred members, and even the trumpeters will be features of the evening.

For "Wagner Night" Herbert Witherspoon, also of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and well known to Newarkers, will be one of the soloists. A soprano and tenor soloist will also be selected for this program.

For "Concert Night," May 6, it is expected that both a vocalist and instrumentalist will be secured in addition to the young local soloist to be decided upon by competition some time in February.

A meeting of the advisory committee of the Newark Music Festival Association will be held on Thursday afternoon, November 12, at 4.30 o'clock at Lauter Hall, 593 Broad street. Every organist, chorus and choir leader and music teacher is invited to become a member and to be present at this time.

The Newark chorus held its second rehearsal last Wednesday evening, November 4, in the Central High School auditorium, one of the most beautiful halls in the city. The large increase in the number present was particularly noted, and the enthusiasm displayed by all even surpassed the remarkable demonstration shown the week before. During the intermission a chorus committee was appointed to arrange for a musical program to be given on the last rehearsal night of each month, the participants to be chosen from the choral body; on these occasions the rehearsal will take up the first hour of the evening, the concert occupying the remaining hour. The chorus committee is composed of Lydia Koehler, Dianne Cobb, Mrs. Spaulding Frazer, Florence Bucklin Scott, Claude Velsor, Sidney A. Baldwin, Charles Ashmun and J. E. Joyner.

The next rehearsal of the Newark chorus will be held on Wednesday evening, November 11, in the Central High School auditorium, corner High and New streets. Singers who have not yet received their membership cards are asked to apply at the office of the association, 593 Broad street, Newark, as soon as possible, so that music can be prepared for them. Applications sent by mail must include the name, address, part sung, and whether voice is high or low must be stated. The office of the association is open from 9 a. m. until 5 p. m.

Jersey City Advisory Committee Elects Officers.

The advisory committee of the Jersey City Festival Chorus, which is a part of the gigantic body of singers organized for the coming festival, met on Thursday evening, November 5, at the Lincoln High School, Jersey City. A representative number of prominent musicians were present and plans for the organization of the Jersey City singers were thoroughly discussed. Moritz E. Schwartz, director and supervisor of music in the Jersey City public schools, was elected chairman; Prof. Joseph B. Ferry, director of music in the West Hoboken public schools and also an organist, was made vice-chairman, and Jessie B. Lockhart was selected as secretary.

Some time ago it was planned to organize in Newark, Jersey City and Elizabeth an advisory committee which would be composed of the organists, chorus and choir leaders and music teachers of those respective cities. The object of these committees is twofold: First, it is believed that by bringing the musicians in each city together in such a body a great deal of work, as well as cooperation, could be counted upon in the carrying out of this gigantic festival scheme; second, the influence of their names means a great deal toward the increase of the chorus itself.

It is planned to have the different choruses meet in Newark once a month to rehearse as one body. All the singers will study the same music under the same conductor. C. Mortimer Wiske, the director, will rehearse the Newark singers every Wednesday evening, and the Jersey City members every Thursday evening. If the present plans mature he will rehearse the Elizabeth singers every Friday evening.

This year the festival will be held in Newark. Next year it is planned to divide the concerts, holding three in Newark and two or three in Jersey City. Later on it may be decided to divide the concerts between Paterson, Newark, Jersey City, Elizabeth, and possibly Trenton. The combined choruses would sing at all of the concerts. With the addition of a large orchestra and world renowned soloists can one doubt but that New Jersey could then be able to boast of the greatest music festival in the country?

Last Thursday evening in Jersey City the enthusiasm among the musicians was most evident. Every one present expressed an earnest desire to assist in the carrying out of this proposed plan. The cooperation of the most influential musicians and business men of Jersey City was promised and work has begun toward the bringing together of at least five hundred singers from Jersey City.

The advisory committee of the Jersey City Festival Chorus is composed of the following members:

The following are members of the Jersey City Advisory Committee: Raymond Lattlel, James P. Dunn, Prof. Joseph B. Ferry, Emil Mueller, Mr. De Mauris, Jessie G. Fenner, Miss M. Sniffen, Miss S. S. Paddock, Mrs. B. C. Blauvell, Cornelia Bradford, Jessie B. Lockhart, Rev. Geo. D. Hadley, Rev. Thomas Hyde, Moritz E. Schwarz, Eugene Hicks, Leffert G. Carroll, Howard Z. Long, William Pagdin, William Till, Roy K. Falconer, Benita Earl, Mr. and Mrs. D. H. Bender, Miss Bender, Mr. and Mrs. Eli Edgecombe, Mrs. Carl Willenborg, of Hoboken; Mrs. Edward Laterman, Lucy Nelson, Miss S. A. Culver, Miss E. Bauer, Mildred Pill, Mrs. Slocum, Mrs. M. E. French, Mrs. Lederhans, of Hoboken, and Edward I. Edwards.

Every organist, chorus and choir leader and music teacher is invited and urged to become a member of the advisory committee of the city in which he or she lives. The Newark Music Festival Association is desirous of making this festival of civic interest, and the cooperation of every musician is needed to make the concerts a success.

A meeting of the advisory committee of the Jersey City Festival Chorus, which has been organized in conjunction with the Newark body, will be held on Thursday evening, November 12, in the Lincoln High School Auditorium. It is expected a large number will be present.

Applications for the Jersey City chorus should be sent to Jessie B. Lockhart, 17 Brinkerhoff street, Jersey City.

Music Notes.

The Newark Musicians' Club will hold the second meeting of the season on Wednesday evening, November 11, at 772 Broad street. An attractive musical program has been arranged for.

ADDITIONAL JERSEY CITY NEWS.

A club which has recently come into existence is the Musicians' Society, of Jersey City, organized with a membership of sixty-six, consisting of teachers of vocal and instrumental music, lecturers, critics and lovers of the art. The constitution, as adopted, commits the club to the legal standardization of music teaching. At a meeting held in the charming studio of the Misses Earl, James P. Dunn was elected president; Franziska Hopf, vice-president; Henrietta Foster-Westcott, secretary, and J. Belle Bolwood, treasurer. The Board of Governors are: Mrs. D. H. Bender, Bula C. Blauvelt, Mrs. Frederick Bennitt, Benita Earl, Jessie G. Fenner, Mary L. Lockhart, Flora R. Wittpenn, Leffert G. Carroll, William Pagdin, Ernest G. Russell. The governors will meet October 29 to arrange a program.

A Red Cross Benefit Concert.

A program arranged for the Red Cross fund and given in the Jersey City Woman's Clubhouse, was made up of excellent numbers and gave pleasure to an audience that filled the auditorium of the clubhouse. Mrs. Daniel H. Bender delighted her hearers with a group of songs, "Love in the Wind," "Ah, Love, but a Day" and "Yesterday and Today." Charles Harrison sang "The Cross," "Reveries" and "Ishtar," and received hearty applause. The other selections on the program were well received. The other performers were Franziska Hopf, Clara Krause, Florence Carrick and Irma Hayden.

Leffert G. Carroll at Parmly Church.

Leffert G. Carroll has assumed the directorship of the choir of Parmly Church. Louise L. Pottle is the soprano soloist, Grace Westerfield, the contralto; Martin W. Naughton, the tenor; Harry Brodwin, the bass, and Paul W. Schlorff, organist.

Music Notes.

The Mozart Male Quartet—Williams St. John, first tenor; Charles B. Morse, second tenor; Leffert G. Carroll, baritone, and Ernest R. Whitney, bass, are to appear twice on the course of public school lectures. Mr. Carroll will talk on "English Melodies in Many Lands," illustrated by the quartet.

Henrietta Foster-Wescott will give her American Indian costume program at the Rahway public school, on November 4. On November 6 she will appear in her costume recital program in Orange; other dates are still pending.

The Schubert Glee Club announces its first concert of the season for December 8 at the Dickinson High School, the largest auditorium in the city. The soloist for the concert will be Frank Croxton, bass, who has many admirers in this city; the Marsh String Quartet will also assist. The club has about sixty members.

Mozart Society's Opening Musicale.

At the first musicale of the season given by the New York Mozart Society, at the Hotel Astor, New York, Saturday afternoon, November 7, the greater part of the program was furnished by Anna Case, the popular young American soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Case sang in German and English with delightful enunciation. Since last season her style has broadened considerably and her always beautiful voice has gained decidedly in technical efficiency. Members of the Mozart Society gave her a warm reception.

George Dostal, tenor, was also heard in two groups, in English and Italian. Mr. Dostal appeared to be suffering from a stubborn cold. Despite this he made a favorable impression, both as to the good quality of his voice and to his ability to sing most interestingly.

Charles Gilbert Spross, accompanist for the Mozart Choral Club, was heard in two groups of piano numbers.

The large attendance indicated the active interest of the members of the New York Mozart Society in its club, also the large number of new members admitted.

Walter Henry Hall, the newly elected director of the Choral Club, was presented to the members on this occasion.

Mrs. Noble McConnell, the energetic president of the New York Mozart Society, presided in her usual charming and interesting manner.

Success of Another Badham Preyer Pupil.

Margaret Hellar has sung with marked success throughout the Middle West with the Denver Symphony Orchestra. This singer is a great favorite with her audiences, winning them immediatcly with her beautiful soprano voice and charming personality. She has many engagements booked which will take her throughout the United States this season. Her specialties are old French songs and songs of the "Sunny South." Miss Hellar is the gifted pupil of the New York vocal teacher, Caroll Badham Preyer.

"Key Note Waved Wing Clavier."

Pilar Morin, the actress and pantomimist, after seven years of steady work, has copyrighted her scientific discovery, the "Key Note Waved Wing Clavier" for breath, speech and action, which she claims to be of great importance, as it visualizes to the mind's eye the form, balance and rhythm of breath, producing visualized control and fundamental power and color to voice, as well as close relationship to actions.

This discovery is reported to have been accepted already and pronounced as wonderful, medically and scientifically, by such eminent people as Thomas Edison, Dr. F. Miller, Dr. L. Curtis, Charles H. Meltzer, Ella Wheeler Wilcox, H. Hess, and many singers, and will be reviewed fully later on.

A Master Pianist.

Harold Bauer made his first appearance this season in New York last Saturday afternoon, November 7, giving a recital at Aeolian Hall.

As a general thing, it may be considered rather questionable taste for a manager to attach an adjective to any artist in announcing him, but certainly Loudon Charlton has every right in the world to employ the phrase "master pianist" as he does when giving notice of Harold Bauer's appearances in this and other cities. The program alone shows in an instant that no one but a great master of the piano would dare to offer an extended series of works so serious, without the slightest relief, for the consideration of a New York audience. The works played by Mr. Bauer were Bach's toccata and fugue in C minor; Beethoven's sonata in F sharp major; Brahms' variations and fugue upon a theme by Handel; Bach's two part inventions in B flat and F, and three part inventions in F minor, B flat, G minor, A major and B minor, and Beethoven's sonata in A flat.

Even the strictest purist in music hardly could demand a program built of more solid and serious music; it was made with an eye to the artistic side only and without a single idea of pandering to the public taste for a bit of lighter music in the course of an afternoon. When Mr. Bauer began—and he did so promptly, an example highly to be commended to all artists great or small—the hall was filled nearly to the last seat and the people who came in after the first number filled up the remaining gaps. It was an appreciative audience; it was an audience enthusiastic in advance; it was an audience very friendly to Mr. Bauer. The moment he stepped on the stage a great burst of handclapping broke forth, which must have warmed his heart, assuring him, as it did, that the few months of absence from the city have in no way dimmed the hearty respect and admiration for him of his large New York following. The decisive way in which Mr. Bauer comes in, takes his seat and squares himself before the piano shows at once, even before a note is played, that here is an artist who knows the instrument with which he deals.

The Bach toccata and fugue was laid out in truly masterly fashion and performed with that tremendous breadth of treatment and, at the same time, that scrupulous regard for niceties which always are so characteristic of Mr. Bauer's playing of Bach. Indeed, as a Bach interpreter, he has no superior and few equals at the present day.

This was followed by the beautiful F sharp major sonata which begins with the exquisite adagio cantabile, the lyric portions of which, in particular, were rendered with unusual beauty of tone and subtleness of shading, making it a bit of playing long to be remembered. In the final allegro there were dash and fire, thorough grasp of the musical content, and a most manly and virile interpretation.

A magnificent interpretation was given of the Brahms number. If there is one quality among so many other good ones which is preeminent in Mr. Bauer's playing it is a tremendous respect for rhythm—the rhythmic details and nuances of each composition which he plays—and in the Brahms variations this quality came supremely to the fore.

In the Bach inventions which followed Mr. Bauer again proved himself to be the born Bach interpreter, and his work was distinguished especially by the absolute clarity with which the various polyphonic voices were differentiated, this characteristic being noticeable also in the great fugue of the Beethoven sonata, which closed the program.

One is ever at a loss in hearing Mr. Bauer play to know what to admire most. There are so many good qualities—an impeccable staccato, an almost violinlike legato, the most delicate whisper of pianissimo, the great strength of fortissimo—all alike are at his fingers' ends and controlled by a musical intelligence most remarkable in itself.

And the piano which aided him in his work—a magnificent Mason & Hamlin grand—certainly merits a line all to itself, for it was an instrument of surpassing beauty of tone in the soft passages and, at the same time, capable of responding to Mr. Bauer's loudest fortissimo without sounding in the slightest degree harsh.

Needless to say there was enthusiasm galore and repeated recalls after each number must have made Mr. Bauer very proud of his reception.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra
Has just returned from its annual visit to Boston
What some of the Boston music critics think of the Orchestra:

SYMPHONY HALL
"The Philharmonic Society of New York heard. Large audience applauds the work of Mr. Stransky, the Orchestra and Zimbalist. We hope the time may not be far distant when this superb Orchestra may feel sure of attracting overflowing audiences without the aid of a soloist, however famous; relying upon a revelation of its varied artistic qualities, drawn from ample resources of virtuosity and flawless ensemble. The Philharmonic . . . is an instrument wonderfully responsive to Mr. Stransky's baton. It has warmth and sonority of tone, and is broadly vigorous and virile in its playing. The concert was heard by a large and enthusiastic audience, which would not cease applause until both Orchestra and Conductor bowed acknowledgment."—Boston Daily Advertiser, November 2, 1914.

"The orchestral compositions were well tried and proven war horses, a pleasure to everyone when so brilliantly performed. . . . In all of these compositions an increase in technical finish and brilliancy and euphony of orchestral tone, over any previous visit of the New York Philharmonic, were noticeable. . . . . Dvorák's symphony, admirably played, is still a work of freshness and beauty. An entertaining program . . . presented with exceptional spirit and technical excellence."—Boston Post, November 2, 1914.

"The program was a popular one and was enthusiastically received. The Philharmonic players have never before been heard to such advantage in this city."—Boston Traveler, Nov. 2, 1914.

"The Orchestra is admirable and well proportioned."—The Boston Herald, November 2, 1914.

Hudson-Alexander's New York Notices.

Caroline Hudson-Alexander, the soprano, gave a recital on October 29, in Aeolian Hall, New York. As soprano soloist at St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, and at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn (two of the best church positions in Greater New York), Mme. Hudson-Alexander has become known to a large number of music lovers in and near the metropolis. In addition to her church work Mme. Hudson-Alexander has frequently been heard in recital and concert, where her charming personality and splendid vocal attainments have made her a special favorite. Mme. Hudson-Alexander is also in great demand as an oratorio singer.

The New York daily papers had the following to say regarding Mme. Hudson-Alexander and her work at her recent recital in Aeolian Hall:

Caroline Hudson-Alexander, a soprano who is not new to New York audiences, although she has not appeared on the concert platform recently, gave a song recital last night in Aeolian Hall. Her program comprised a group of old songs, one of Schubert and Schumann lieder, some modern French songs and a concluding group of songs in English by contemporaneous composers. Her singing after the first two numbers was always agreeable and the quality of her voice excellent, though perhaps of the kind to which brilliance and power come more readily than warmth and sweetness. It is a well schooled voice, and the singer uses it with matured intelligence and judgment. Arthur D. Hyde was a skillful and tasteful accompanist.—New York Times.

Caroline Hudson-Alexander gave a song recital last night in Aeolian Hall to the evident enjoyment of an appreciative audience. Her performance included Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," Spohr's "Rose, wie bist du reizend und mild," Mozart's "Zeffiretti lusinghieri," lieder by Schubert and Schumann, Cesar Franck's "Le Procession," Amhurst Webber's "En Avril," Debussy's "Il pleure dans mon cœur," Chaminade's "La Lune Paresseuse," and a group of modern songs in English.

Mme. Hudson-Alexander revealed qualities, vocal and interpretative, worthy of more attention than the exigencies of a day overcrowded with musical incidents permit.—New York Press.

CAROLINE HUDSON-ALEXANDER.

Caroline Hudson-Alexander was heard in a recital last evening in Aeolian Hall before an audience that apparently numbered many friends. Her program was made up of songs in German, French and English.

Mme. Hudson-Aleander's greatest asset is her apparent feeling for the content of the song and her attempt to give the emotion expression. Her voice is big and powerful, and she sang with style, charm and confidence.—New York World.

Last evening's second audience in Aeolian Hall heard Caroline Hudson-Alexander, a soprano with a high, clear voice, legato style and a real pianissimo. With Arthur Hyde at the piano, she sang in four languages, from good old Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" to some modern French, for which royalty was paid to the Society of Authors, still active in war.—Evening Sun.

Caroline Hudson-Alexander, soprano, who has been heard here in oratorio, gave a song recital last night in Aeolian Hall and her voice and method were worthy of a larger audience.

Her program ranged from Bach, Spohr and Mozart to the modern French and American composers, and with most of the songs she was more than moderately successful. She has a voice of great power and flexibility. After Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" and Spohr's "Rose, wie bist due reizund," she sang Mozart's "Zeffiretti," which was one of her most successful numbers. In a group of German lieder from Schubert and Schumann, she displayed a good knowledge of lieder singing, particularly in the quiet "Nacht und Traume" of Schubert and Schumann's "Mondnacht."—New York Herald.

Haarlem Philharmonic Society.

The Haarlem Philharmonic Society of New York, Mrs. Rastus Seneca Ransom, president, will open its twenty-fourth season with a reception at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, on Thursday, November 12. Enid Watkins, interpreter of the chants, ceremonials and dances of the Zuni Indians, will entertain at the reception.

At a concert of November 19, George Dostal, the Bohemian tenor, and the Trio de Lutice will be heard.

Schumann-Heink Program.

The program selected by Mme. Schumann-Heink for her song recital in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Tuesday afternoon, November 17, is made up of classics almost to the exclusion of modern compositions. As her opening group she will sing Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," an aria from Mozart's opera "Titus," Beethoven's "Ich liebe dich" and Schubert's "Die Allmacht." Part two will be given over to Robert Schumann's cycle of eight songs, "Frauenliebe und Leben," while part three comprises eight songs by Liszt, Brahms, Rubinstein, and three songs to be sung in English.

Rudolph Reuter An American Pianist.

Although first heralded in Europe as one of the leading pianists of the younger generation, Rudolph Reuter is an American by birth. Eight years were spent abroad in study and concertizing, and upon his return to this country in 1913 he was immediately engaged by some of the leading organizations, including the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago Woodwind Quartet and the Kneisel Quartet. His appearances with and without orchestra and in chamber music concerts have at all times proved to be unqualified successes. For the season 1914-15 Mr. Reuter has been re-engaged by several of the country's leading musical organizations. During the season 1913-14 his Chicago appearances alone numbered over twenty-five.

Mr. Reuter's engagements are secured through his sole representative, Marguerite Easter, of 552 Oakdale avenue, Chicago, Ill.

Ciccolini Acclaimed on Two Continents.

Guido Ciccolini, the tenor, has become, in the few performances at which he has already appeared with the Boston Theatre Italian Opera Company, the idol of the Boston opera fraternity. His splendid voice and remarkable artistry have evoked praise from critics and musicians. Appended are a few of the comments on his spirited portrayal of the Mario Cavaradossi role in Puccini's "Tosca," which he sang last week. Further comments are also added concerning the tenor's brilliant European success won before coming to America.

The tenor, Ciccolini, was heard first here last week as Rodolfe in "La Boheme," and then won instantaneous success by the clarity of his tone, the essentially sweet quality of his voice and a prepossessing stage presence. This admirable equipment he brought to the role of Mario Cavaradossi, and his success was, of course, complete. It is agreeable to see in the role a tenor of so romantic bearing.—Boston Advertiser.

M. Ciccolini was a fiery and romantic young Mario. He managed the scene of the painter's release from torture, the swiftly passing and antipodal emotions of fury at Tosca's revelation, Angelotti's hiding place, and his mad exultation at the news of victory disturbing to Scarpia, with an instructive sense of the actor. His voice was at its best in the third act, in the opening air of desolate farewell and the following scene with Tosca. His tone was more manageable and expressive. It showed him an interpreter of warmth and intensity of feeling.—Boston Globe.

Mr. Ciccolini appeared as the artist, Mario. In the purest lyrical passages he was at his best. His dramatic accompaniment was intelligent and there was the spirit of youth and virility.—Boston Herald.

Mr. Ciccolini was an ardent and temperamental Cavaradossi. The freshness and the natural beauty of his voice have at no time been more apparent in this city, and his stage business was very original and well conceived.—Boston Post.

A few of Ciccolini's European criticisms are as follows:

At yesterday evening's performance at the Theatre of the Champs Elysees, the delightful tenor, Ciccolini, obtained a well deserved triumph in "Lucia di Lammermoor."—Echo de Paris, Paris.

With Mme. Barrientos in "Lucia di Lammermoor," the Italian tenor, Ciccolini, whose splendid voice is so warm and taking, did wonders especially in the last scene, which is so dramatic. He was well and deservedly applauded.—Excelsior, Paris.

At the first performance of "Lucia di Lammermoor" at the Theatre des Champs Elysees, the house did Monsieur Ciccolini honor. His charming and beautiful toned voice did wonders, full of fire and elan, and with most expressive feeling he carried off the air of "Marriage" and the final scene with such warmth and passion that the enthusiastic public wildly applauded him. He was repeatedly recalled at the fall of the curtain. It was a very great success for the young and gifted tenor.—Figaro, Paris.

In the role of Edgard, Tenor Ciccolini achieved great success, especially in the last act.—Corriere Della Serb, Milan.

Tenor Ciccolini was a magnificent singer and a very smart actor. His voice and personality were quite fitted for the sentimental part of Conte Riccardo.—Secolo, Milan.

The tenor, Ciccolini, made a very refined personage of Conte Riccardo, the arduous part entrusted to him. By means of his clear, sonorous and beautiful voice he was able to give to the character not only a perfect diction, but also that smart and correct interpretation necessary to the character he personified.—Gazzetta di Venezia, Venice.

At his first appearance in grand opera in St. Petersburg, the Italian tenor, Mr. Ciccolini, achieved great success in the role of Edgard in "Lucia di Lammermoor"; his delicious voice was very agreeable to the audience.—Novve Vremie, St. Petersburg.

In the role of Don Jose in "Carmen" the tenor, Ciccolini, had a most brilliant success. He showed to the audience, hearing him for the first time in this part, his beautiful qualities, both as a singer of rare ability and a very ingenious actor.—Novve Vremie, St. Petersburg. (Advertisement.)

An Established Teacher.

To be the exponent of a thoroughly tested vocal method, to have an especial gift for imparting, to be cultured and refined, and to possess a personality pleasing and confidence inspiring, seem to have been the qualities which have brought about the success of a vocal teacher well known to New York musicians. This teacher has been instrumental in placing before the public vocalists prominent in church, oratorio, concert and opera, who have again and again proven the value of her method of instruction. Teachers have come from all parts of the country to "brush up" with her and have gone away with a broader concept of vocal teaching and with renewed inspiration.

Recently she established a school in New York, which, because of continually increasing attendance, she has been obliged to move to more spacious quarters.

For the foundation of this "school of singing, which sets the standard in vocal art," namely, "the Helene Maigille American School of Bel Canto," all the credit is due to that progressive vocal authority to whom this entire article refers—Helene Maigille.

HELENE MAIGILLE.

Pavlowa Pleases.

Pavlowa made her first appearance this season at the Metropolitan Opera House, on Tuesday evening, November 3, to a house filled with enthusiastic admirers of this great terpsichorean. Pavlowa introduced some new features on this occasion, besides a number of modern dances. She has surrounded herself with a large and artistic ensemble and presents some startling scenic effects. The entire entertainment was one of unalloyed pleasure.

Virgil Students Give Recital at York, Pa.

A remarkably fine piano recital was given at York, Pa., under the management of Florence Hinkle, a prominent teacher of that city. The players were Modena Scovill, of New York, and Ethel Leese, of Trenton, N. J., artist students at the Virgil Piano Conservatory of New York.

Exceptional playing marked the program throughout, which included numbers from MacDowell, Debussy, Schumann, Chopin, Henselt and Liszt. While the execution of difficult pieces was admirable, still more surprising and delightful were the capable and inspirational interpretations given by these talented players. Their teacher, Mrs. A. M. Virgil, was present, and made some very interesting remarks on the subject of piano practice. She explained that these pupils had used a practice keyboard and through this had been enabled to make a remarkable progress in execution and in gaining a mastery of the keyboard.

The patronesses of this concert represented many of the leading families of York society. They were: Mrs. R. S. Cannon, Laura Ebert, Mrs. Nathan Lehmayer, Mrs. Carey E. Etnier, Mrs. George W. Williams, Mrs. Smyser Williams, Mrs. Edward Leber, Alexander E. McLean, Mrs. C. Elmer Smith, Mrs. O. H. Lucas, Nettie B. Frysinger, Mrs. J. St. Clair McCall.

Lily Strickland on Negro Folk-Song.

Lily Strickland, the young Southern composer, in a recent interview said: "Negro folksongs furnish the richest and most romantic field open to American composers. Negro melodies, when transcribed directly from the mouths of the rhythm intoxicated cotton picker or cheerful plowman or convict or the ever songful domestic servant, have a primitive, distinctly racial flavor and original charm not to be had from another source in this country.

"The negro, long repressed in slavery, learned to express his every mood and emotion in song. A negro will sing under any condition except when angry, and then he will hum."

Miss Strickland goes on to say that negro folkmusic is the only original source in America, with the exception of a limited field of Indian music, from which the modern composer may get inspiration.

Perhaps few composers have had better opportunity of knowing the charm and value of real negro music. Mrs. Strickland has gathered an interesting collection of these melodies which she has acquired in person and under circumstances both amusing and pathetic.

Among Miss Strickland's published negro music is "Mammy's Prayer," "Pickaninny Sleep Song" and "Negro Melodies of the Old South," a part song for male voices.

Gittelson Scores in Pittsburgh.

On October 23, in Pittsburgh, Pa., Frank Gittelson, the young violinist, who has recently returned to this country from Europe, appeared in joint recital with Carl Friedberg, pianist. Although both these artists were "entirely unheralded," as the Pittsburgh Gazette-Times remarks, "in the future both will be courted visitors." These are Pittsburgh opinions of his playing:

As to Mr. Gittelson, there is something absolutely magical in the beauty of his tone—fascinating, sentimental and, above all, pure and artistic. He gave a thrilling performance of a violin concerto by D'Ambrosio, in which the perfection of technical passages, especially in the final allegro, aroused his hearers to hearty applause. For his next number he played Dvorák's "Slav Dance," A major, and praeludium and allegro by Pugnani, overcoming the difficulties in the latter with consummate mastery. As an encore, Mr. Gittelson played "Orientale" by Cui most exquisitely; such tender, ingratiating playing is seldom to be enjoyed.—Pittsburgh Despatch, October 24, 1914.

His tone is of unusual beauty—firm, warm, pure and at times of a rare delicacy; and we may say of the quality of tone what Portia says of the quality of mercy. It is not constrained, but a gift of heaven. With such a gift, coupled with a technic so proficient and a sincerity so obvious, this young man should make himself a power in the musical world. His readings may not have the profundity and eloquence that must be associated with more advanced years, but his avoidance of the sensational gives one confidence that he will not himself stand in the way of further development.—Pittsburgh Gazette-Times, October 24, 1914. (Advertisement.)

David Hochstein's Press Tributes.

David Hochstein's success abroad in concert has won for him a place in the violin world such as an artist could well be proud of. This young artist's virtuosity has been exhibited on the Continent and in England during an extensive tour through the principal cities the year following his graduation from the Meisterschule at Vienna. Following are a few excerpts from the Continental papers, speaking of the London, Vienna and several of the Finland concerts:

A young violinist, David Hochstein, astonished his audience by the wonderful beauty of his tone, his flawless technic and emotional playing. In Bach's solo sonata his broad classical style revealed the thorough, serious musician. The Bruch D minor concerto and several smaller numbers gave this gifted artist the opportunity of displaying his great talent and versatility.—Vienna Montags Courier.

For Bach's masterpieces, an art which is both understood and spiritually realized is required. Hochstein's rendition of the G minor sonata was a pure joy. Anyone who possesses the divine gift and ability to reveal to his audiences the wonderful beauties of these musical treasures as Hochstein did, may well be reckoned among the few great artists of his time.—Vienna Tagblatt.

David Hochstein, the best graduate of the Vienna Conservatory, played a program at Bechstein Hall which served to display his command of a brilliant quality of tone, particularly in passage work, and a clean and confident technic. His interpretations of Bruch's D minor concerto and Bach's sonata had great intelligence and tonal beauty.—London Times.

After his appearance at Queen's Hall with the Queen's Hall Orchestra the Strad said

Hochstein, the winner of the Austrian government's prize, proved to be the possessor of a highly developed technic, which he displayed to great advantage in the Paganini concerto with Sauret's immensely difficult cadenza. He further gave a very finished and musical reading of the Beethoven concerto.

Bruch's Scottish fantasy was masterfully played by David Hochstein, a violinist new to Finnish audiences. His beautiful elegiac tone made a profound impression in the slow movements, and he played the warlike finale with a freshness and vigor which only youth can give. After his marvelous playing of Saint-Saëns' rondo capriccioso, he was compelled to add three numbers which were not on the program.—The Sanomat, Finland.

The purity and facility of his technic disclosed wonders of violin playing. Hochstein's splendid interpretations, combined with his serious dignified bearing, provoked such storms of applause as have rarely been heard in our concerts, and the audience unwillingly quieted down only after many encores had been granted.—Usui Aura, Finland. Return of Wager Swayne.

Wager Swayne, the Paris piano teacher, who has made an enviable name for himself during the last few years in his specialty of preparing pianists for public performances, arrived in New York last week and will teach here until conditions of the war will allow him to return to his fine home in the French capital. His studio will be at 326 West Ninetieth street, corner of Riverside Drive, in the beautiful mansion known as "Mrs. Parsons' house."

Mr. Swayne's work has already begun and indications point to the fact that he will be as busy here as he always has been in Paris.

Affiliated Lyceum Bureaus to Meet.

During the week beginning November 16 the Affiliated Lyceum Bureaus of America will hold their annual meeting in New York at the McAlpin Hotel. At this meeting the list of talent for the season of 1915-16 will be made up, and if it is at all in keeping with the list for 1914-14 it will be an excellent one. Besides many well known singers, its list includes well known orators, senators, actors, writers, preachers, professors, impersonators, etc.

Gadski Honored.

To the Musical Courier:

I have been requested by Sigma Alpha Iota to notify you that Mme. Gadski was initiated as an honorary member into that society, in Ann Arbor, on October 27.

Very truly, LOUISE R. HEWLETT, Corresponding Secretary.

Christine Miller Returns from Europe.

Christine Miller, the American contralto, arrived from Europe on the steamer Potsdam, November 3. Miss Miller departed immediately for a tour of ten days.

BURMESTER PLAYS GERMAN ANTHEM AT BERLIN CONCERT.

Violinist's Concert Interrupted By News of Antwerp's Fall—He Furnishes Patriotic Obligato to Singing of Audience—Nikisch Concert Has Flesch as Soloist—Busoni Gives a Bach Program.

Jenaerstr., 21,
Berlin, October 16, 1914.

Notwithstanding war times Burmester drew a large audience to the Philharmonie on Friday. Like Busoni and Scharwenka he also offered his services for his needy colleagues. He played to the accompaniment of the Philharmonic Orchestra, Bach's E major and the Mendelssohn concertos, both with supreme mastery. Numbers of his own arrangement of small classical pieces with piano accompaniment followed. These classical pieces have become great favorites throughout the fatherland, and not satisfied with the long program, the public demanded numerous encores of a like nature. Toward the end of the concert the news was telephoned to the Philharmonie that Antwerp had fallen. Burmester announced this to the audience and then played on his violin: "Deutschland, Deutschland über alles," the entire audience joining in. This is a favorite proceeding here now. After frequent recalls Burmester once more returned with his fiddle and began "Heil Dir im Siegerkranz," in which the audience again joined. The public was wild with enthusiasm.

Six Nikisch Concerts.

There are to be only six Nikisch concerts this winter instead of the usual ten. With the matinees this makes twelve performances. The program of the first concert consisted of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Beethoven's violin concerto, which was given a masterly rendition by Carl Flesch, and Brahms' fourth symphony, which has always been a favorite with Nikisch, and which was interpreted wonderfully. Flesch's reading of the concerto was finished to the last degree. His tone was rich, round, full and penetrating, and his attitude toward the composer was classical without being pedantic. Both Flesch and Nikisch received ovations.

Busoni's Bach Program.

Busoni's Bach program was of special interest, since it consisted chiefly of novelties for Berlin. All of the numbers performed were in Busoni's own arrangements and elaborations. The Goldberg variations, twenty of which Busoni has made use of, although they have generally been considered inappropriate for the concert hall, proved most effective under Busoni's magic fingers. The great pianist's transcription of the capriccio: "Die Abreise des vielgeliebten Bruders," a song of a postillion with variations, the original of which was written for the cembalo, proved to be most interesting, particularly the charming fugue on the post horn theme. But it requires a pianist with the wonderful tonal nuances of a Busoni in order to play these works effectively. The prelude, fugue and allegro in E flat, which is quite unknown, proved to be a pearl for Bach lovers. Busoni held his listeners spellbound throughout the program. The Singakademie was well filled, and a handsome sum must have been turned over to the Relief Fund for poor musicians.

JULIA CULP AND HER HUSBAND, ERICH MERTEN.
In front of Mme. Culp's villa at Zehlendorf, near Berlin.

Scharwenka's Concert.

Xaver Schwarkenka's concert given with the Blüthner Orchestra at Blüthner Hall on Tuesday evening, was for the same worthy purpose. Busoni conducted for his distinguished colleague, and never have I heard a more perfect ensemble; soloist and orchestra formed one homogeneous whole. Scharwenka seemed rejuvenated and played with a finish and a youthful fire that astonished his friends. He felt inspired because of the magnificent way in which Busoni supported him with the orchestra. Scharwenka played his first and fourth concertos. Busoni opened the program with a rousing performance of Weber's "Jubel" overture. At the opening bars of "Heil Dir im Siegerkranz," orchestra and audience stood up and the entire public joined in singing the national hymn. Busoni also figured on the program with his "Geharnischte Suite" for orchestra.

Julia Culp in Recital.

Julia Culp's recital, although not given for any of the war charities, was largely attended, thus proving the great drawing power of this unique lieder singer in Berlin, for to draw out a full house in these times, unless the appearance be for charity, is quite a different matter from doing so in times of peace. And this was Mme. Culp's third concert within a month. She was heard in a Brahms' program. She was in glorious voice and in splendid form musically and temperamentally also, so that her singing was an unalloyed pleasure. As a Brahms interpreter Julia Culp stands among lieder singers on a plane all by herself, and focuses on her work a rare combination of voice, method, musical feeling, intelligence and temperament. Songs of themselves not effective—the "Sapphische Ode," for instance—scored great successes as sang by her. Mme. Culp roused her audience to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

Arthur M. Abell.

KANSAS STANDARDIZATION FOR TEACHERS.

Wichita, Kan., November 11, 1914.

The move to standardize all private music teachers and music schools in the State of Kansas, so that an accredited teacher or school shall be eligible to issue credits to high school students for music study outside the school, has brought about the following outline, which was adopted by the State executive committee at its recent meeting in Wichita:

1. Accredited teachers must possess a certificate or diploma, issued by a music school of good standing, accepted and approved by the Kansas State Music Teachers' Association.

2. Or shall have the privilege of taking the examinations at any one of the approved music schools of the State, which shall have the power, as sub-examining committees, to examine candidates and submit the examination papers, and report to the executive committee of the State association for confirmation and approval.

Music Schools.

Accredited music schools shall have not less than three accredited teachers, one of whom must be accredited to each the theoretical branches; such schools must possess State charters and conform with the following:

(a) Must have a course in sight singing and ear training extending over not less than one year.

(b) Must have a course in harmony extending over not less than one year.

(c) Must have a course in musical history extending over not less than one year.

The course of study to be approved by the Kansas State Music Teachers' Association.

PIANO STANDARD (For schools as well as private teachers).
Bach inventions, suites and well tempered clavichord. Cramer studies, Clementi Gradus ad Parnassum, Czerny, op. 299 and op. 740, Chopin studies, or their equivalent. Sonatas by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, up to difficulty of op. 57. Representative works of Schubert, Schumann, Weber, etc., including a ballade or scherzo of Chopin, or the equivalent. Several works of modern composers. One of the standard concertos.

VOICE STANDARD (For schools as well as private teachers).
Breathing exercises, voice placement.
Studies: Concone, Lutgen, Marchesi, Bordogni, etc. (or their equivalent).
Repertoire: Songs and arias of old Italian masters.
Songs and ballads of American and English composers.
Songs by Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Rubinstein, Grieg, etc.
At least one complete oratorio solo part, and not less than six oratorio arias from standard works.
At least four arias from standard operas.
Must have studied sight singing and ear training, and be able to play simple accompaniments.

VIOLIN STANDARD (For schools as well as private teachers).
Exercises for left hand and bow technic. Scales and arpeggios through three octaves, all major and minor keys.
Studies:
Kreutzer, Fiorillo, Rode, etc.
Concertos by Viotti, De Beriot, Rode, etc.
Repertoire:
Selections by Wieniawski, Hubay, Sarasate, Vieuxtemps, etc.
Sonatas by Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Grieg, etc.
At least one year ensemble or orchestra experience.
One or more movements from one of the standard concertos.

THEORY OF MUSIC (For schools as well as private teachers).
Harmony: The subject of harmony complete.
History: Complete as outlined by standard authorities.
Sight Singing: Any one of the standard text books, supplemented by one of the standard theoretical works.

Graduates from accredited music schools holding diplomas dated after January 1, 1915, will not be required to pass examination for State credit. Well known and experienced teachers may be accredited by the State committee without examination. All private teachers, as well as all teachers in music schools, must file application blanks provided by the State executive committee.

These blanks cover a wide range of information, for the association and applicant must give names of schools, length of study in each, under what teachers, specialty subjects, course studies, and also inform the association as to the number of years the applicant has taught, how much time is devoted to teaching, rates of tuition, and submit two or more credential references (preferably from Kansas) that speak intelligently of the qualifications of the applicant.

The applicants will be required to answer fully all of the following questions in the department for which they desire to qualify:

PIANO—
State briefly what are in your estimation the main principles governing the following subjects and how you teach these subjects: (a) Technic; (b) Touch; (c) Phrasing; (d) Expression; (e) Pedal; (f) Rhythm; (g) Memorizing; (h) Practicing.

VOICE—
State briefly what are in your estimation the main principles governing the following subjects and how you teach these subjects: (a) Breath control; (b) Voice production; (c) Diction; (d) Phrasing; (e) How do you classify voices (viz: soprano, contralto, etc.) and by what means do you so distinguish them? (f) Give an outline of the work for an entirely new pupil of average ability, that might be covered in the first year of study.

VIOLIN—
State briefly what are in your estimation the main principles governing the following subjects and how you teach these subjects: (a) Left hand technic; (b) Bow technic; (c) Scales and arpeggios; (d) Shifting; (e) Chord playing—three or more tones simultaneously; (f) Attack; (g) Memorizing; (h) Practicing; (j) How do you conduct and organize ensemble classes.

THEORY OF MUSIC—
Give a brief outline of how you teach one or more of the following subjects: Harmony, History of Music, Sight Singing and Ear Training, Public School Music.
Note—The applicant must have some teaching experience.

This outline is given as the one passed by the executive board, and will no doubt be discussed at the meeting in December at Wichita. Many of the members at Wichita already have signified their intention to refuse to fill out the personal application blank. This can be done in Wichita, as the high school board has agreed to accept the local committee's approval of teachers (and is now doing so), irrespective of the State association's action in the matter. There promises to be no little contention and some friction in the matter. Some members of the association say that the executive committee has taken too much power in putting through a drastic standard and special requirements before submitting them to a general discussion before the general association. New York Press Praise for Tina Lerner.

Tina Lerner's New York recital in Aeolian Hall, Tuesday afternoon, November 3, aroused unusual enthusiasm. A few reviews from the New York daily press appear herewith:

It would be difficult to imagine a more straightforward, satisfying and skillful proceeding than the recital given by Tina Lerner, pianist, yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall. Her program, of rather heroic proportions, was generous and well selected and called forth applause which well might be called an ovation. Flowers so many that she could not carry them also attested to the appeal of this gifted Russian player.

A group of light pieces, including a Minuet and Rondo of Padre Martini, dating from the early eighteenth century, a Sgambati Gavotte and the Beethoven-Busoni "Ecossaises," were the first numbers. In these Miss Lerner demonstrated to the full her deliciously airy "legerete" and a most delicate pianissimo.

But her real triumph came in the tremendous Liszt B minor sonata, so seldom heard. Of this sonata, which, by the way, is not written in the accepted sonata form, but in one part, Wagner wrote Liszt, "The sonata is beyond all conception beautiful, great, lovely, deep and noble—sublime even as thyself."

That Miss Lerner fully was aware of the wonderful content of the work no one who sat spell-bound through its unusual length could doubt. The "unconventionally developed themes" were brought out with extraordinary clearness and with the best use of all the resources at the player's command. One felt, indeed, that it is "of astonishing unity and originality."

Apparently not at all feeling the strain of the sonata, Miss Lerner next played a Chopin group, which included the A flat Impromptu, the F minor Nocturne, three etudes, op. 25, Nos. 8, 6 and 9, and the Polonaise Fantasie, op. 61. The dainty "butterfly etude" had to be repeated.

A Rachmaninoff prelude in G minor, a humoresque by Tscherepnine and a scherzo by Balakireff completed the program.

Three encores—the "Campanella" etude of Liszt, the "Gnomen Reigen" etude, by the same composer, and another Chopin etude—were given before the diminutive pianist escaped to the artists' room, to be congratulated by scores of friends and admirers.—New York Press.

Mme. Tina Lerner gave her first piano recital of the season at Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. The feature of the occasion was her performance of the great B minor sonata of Liszt. Mme. Lerner played that singularly difficult composition with a technical accomplishment that was fairly colossal, with delicacy or with power as the mood demanded, with a feeling for its rhapsodic quality, at times with grandeur. . . . The audience, which was of good size, rewarded her performance with spontaneous applause and many recalls. On her program also were pieces by the Padre Martini, Giovanni Sgambati, Beethoven (as arranged by Busoni), Chopin, Rachmaninoff, Tscherepnine, and Balakireff. Her playing in general was of a kind to give keen pleasure, but one should point out especially her fascinating treatment of a minuetto by the Padre Martini and the wonderful tempo at which she took, and the wonderful smoothness with which she delivered, the troublesome thirds of the Chopin etude, op. 25, No. 6.—New York Globe.

Admirers of exceptional piano playing who attended Tina Lerner's recital yesterday afternoon were well repaid. . . .

There was a large audience and in it a plentiful number of professional pianists. Before an assemblage of this exacting character Miss Lerner had need of her fullest resources, and she, doubtless, was gratified to find them at her ready command.

Always a pianist whose attainments invited profound respect, this gifted European gave her hearers two Martini numbers, a Sgambati gavotte, the Beethoven-Busoni "Ecossaises," a Chopin group and three Russian bits of which the Rachmaninoff G minor prelude was the most pretentious.

But the Liszt B minor sonata was the work in which Miss Lerner appeared to her highest artistic advantage. The pianist's sound musicianship and well molded interpretativeness never seemed better than in this composition, where her variety of color, her expressive qualities and fluent technic were of an order that came only from an artist.—New York World.

. . . She has matured into an artist of the first rank, and yesterday she was a revelation to her audience.

Her program offered a wide variety, beginning with old and new Italian compositions, proceeding through Beethoven and Liszt to a splendid group of Chopin numbers, exquisitely played, and ending with the compositions of three Russians—Rachmaninoff, Tscherepnine and Balakireff—New York Evening Mail. Kansas City Season Opened.

Kansas City, Mo., October 23, 1914.

Rudolph Ganz and Alice Nielsen, in joint recital, opened the concert season yesterday at the Shubert Theatre. This was the first concert of Myrtle Irene Mitchell's series for this season. Mr. Ganz began the program by a masterful interpretation of the Bach-Busoni chaconne. No such performance of this spellbinding composition has been heard here since Busoni gave it first to this public some years ago. A subtle intimacy with all the rich and varied moods of this piece was obvious throughout. The whole performance was a decided satisfaction. The D major sonata by Haydn also proved a delight. These gems of classicism deserve a wider recognition from student, teacher and artist.

Miss Nielsen gave a great deal of pleasure to her home folks, as was evidenced by the spontaneous applause following each number. Particularly beautiful and impressive was she in "Un bel di," from "Madama Butterfly"; "Leaves and the Wind," by Leoni, and the "Fairy Pipers," by Brewer, which were given by an individual inimitable grace all her own.

ORGANISTS' RECITAL.

Kansas City's Association of Organists presented Clarence Eddy to a large and enthusiastic audience of organ music lovers on Tuesday evening. The aim of this organization is to foster a larger public appreciation for the great organ music. Mr. Eddy played with his usual rare ability and finish, a varied and interesting program. A great height was reached in the rendition of A. Walter Kramer's concert prelude, in D minor. Also the fugue in E flat, by Porpora, and "Melodie Plaintive," by Ferrata. excited keen interest and were splendidly interpreted by the distinguished organist.

NEW STRING QUARTET FORMED.

Local music lovers welcome another musical organization, called the Kansas City String Quartet. Henri Shostac, the new concertmaster of the Kansas City Symphony Orchestra, is the inspiration of this new asset to the musical life of Kansas City. Associated with him are Mrs. Henri Shostac, Hans Peterson and Alfred R. Buch. Mr. Shostac and his talented wife are among the new comers, who expect to make this their permanent home. They have been abroad eight years seeking the best expression of violin playing. Mr. Shostac was concertmaster of the Dresden Symphony Orchestra for six years.

Dan Beddoe Tributes.

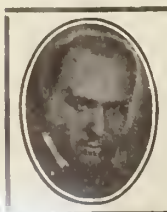
A few press opinions of Dan Beddoe's singing in "Elijah," Verdi's "Requiem," and "Aida" are given herewith:

"ELIJAH."

Mr. Beddoe, who has no rival in voice or style, was thrilling in the delivery of his opening aria. Each time he sang he evoked great applause.—New York Evening Mail.

Mr. Beddoe's beautiful voice being particularly effective.—New York Tribune.

Dan Beddoe, whose singing throughout the evening was beautiful, sincere and intelligent.—New York American.



"REQUIEM," VERDI.

There is much lovely music for the tenor soloist in this composition, and it was most agreeably sung last night by Dan Beddoe, one of the greatest of the oratorio singers.—Schenectady Gazette, Schenectady, N. Y.

"AIDA."

Mr. Beddoe gave the famous "Celeste Aida" at the opening of the opera with considerable success. The declamatory recitative with its martial trumpet calls (admirably played, by the way) was sufficiently vigorous, and the beautiful melody which follows was well managed. There were many moments in the score when the splendid quality of his voice made itself felt, notably in the fine quintet in which he bore his part nobly. At such times he caught the fire of the music and gave it adequate expression.—Nashua Telegraph.

THE CONSTRUCTION OF A CHORAL PROGRAM.

BY OTTO TORNEY SIMON, MUSICAL DIRECTOR,
The Motet Choral Society of Washington, D. C.

A musical program, well arranged, might be considered an intellectual scheme for presenting to an audience a dignified art.

In order to impress profoundly, it should neither fatigue through a colorless monotony, by a low mediocrity of material, or by its length. It should lead through a series of allied or contrasting emotions to a climax of the highest psychological interest, and then cease.

A great program arouses the intellect from its usual lethargy and indifference; it will change weariness and somnolence to an ever increasing interest and will quicken and freshen the slumbering appreciation for beauty as it touches the inner, sensitive fronds of the imagination. It reaches out with its quivering tentacles to the depths of the human heart.

This gripping super-language of music awakens an inner vision.

The mood of an audience presents many elements of conflict. The surface is rough and uneven and reveals facets in which are reflected the individual disposition, turbulent or opposing, negative or indifferent, gently receptive or passionate in immediate appreciation.

A great art will, first of all, obliterate this unevenness of superficial moods.

It will conquer opposition and create an eager receptiveness. It is as if many spurious metals were placed in a crucible and by some fine fusion were poured out in a glittering mass, the surface of which perfectly reflects a continuous and a greater art.

The mighty bulwarks of choral programs are those of the heroic oratorio school, and the form of the mass. The first still impresses by its nobility and ponderous weight. The mass, the requiem mass, grips human affection and interest by its gentle service for the dead, and by its welded texts of power and pathos. The words, "Requiem aeternam dona eis domine, et lux perpetua luceat eis" are of unfading beauty and consolation.

So, the B minor mass and the "Passion" of Bach, the "Missa Solemnis" of Beethoven, and "The Messiah" and "Israel" of Handel, remain the flamboyant beacons of the highest choral art. To these should be added the motets of spiritual significance.

Less inspirational works of a similar class should be, in this age, hardly tolerated. Texts of local significance, or a theology obsolete or impliable, no longer interest. We are not living in an age of narrow Calvinism. The devil and his tail have long since disappeared, and the cries of the damned no longer ring in our ears. One may still admire the great sweep of some of these choruses, and the facile and musical skill of their contrapuntal weavings. They are, however, like heroic armor of the past, fashioned from massive plates and clanking chains, archaic, and no longer serving the purpose for which they have been made.

To be avoided also on programs are the the dolorous cantatas of superficial workmanship and saccharine flavor, much encouraged by the clergy of the Protestant churches about the time of Easter.

The Church, as an organization, has encouraged good music. This cannot be said, however, of many of the clergy. As a class, with individual exceptions, they have, either from lack of greatness of vision, or from lack of culture or training, failed lamentably to recognize the spiritual significance and possibility of music as an art, and to use it as such in the service. Too frequently, with realization of their own spiritual impotence, they have had recourse to sensational types of music that are false and destructive. The clergy, with unusual opportunity for presenting and aiding a beautiful art, have been found wanting.

To be avoided further are the vapid programs of miscellaneous choruses, loosely strung together, those deceptive shallows of musical composition that debase the art and corrupt the public taste.

The combination, of humorous text with music should be eliminated on all programs. Greatness in art is founded on sorrow, and is never suggested by the fool or harlequin in cap and bells, dancing along the paths of superficiality and levity.

In contradistinction to the rugged school of choral music in which tonal sonority and breadth of rendition are the important features, there exists another, a more fragile and delicate art, in which delight is found in the finished and polished phrase.

Such an art suggests the aura rather than the object. It veils itself in atmosphere and lingers in the shadow, the early dawn and the starlight. It is shy, repressive, unobtrusive, far from vanity and ostentation, and evokes rather than compels the mood. Music of this description is the especial feature on the programs of the Motet Choral Society.

Such an art requires a definite technic.

It is a technic that prepares the necessary instrument and encourages a subjective quality of exquisite proportion and refinement. It suggests a scheme of color tints that corresponds to the delicate grays, blues and mauves of the painter's art.

Beauty becomes appealing through repose and repression.

The objective school, the dominant school of [illegible] Handel, would be typified more by the brilliant [illegible] reds, the purple, the deeper blues.

Such an art suggests power through action.

A program should not be confined to one tonal color. It should move in a proportionate scale of color and intensity. Equality and stability suggest monotony, as variety and motion will always stimulate the interest.

A program, broadly speaking, should progress from brilliancy to shadow, or from shadow to brilliancy.

It should, if possible, have a principal theme and a correlation of texts. The usual sources of inspiration in sacred texts are the words of the requiem mass and those texts associated with the great celebrations of the Christian Church, the Nativity, the Crucifixion, the Resurrection, the Redemption. Of the secular texts, the more important ones are those embodying the idealization of nature and of earthly love.

The material for such programs may be found in the choral music of many different schools and countries.

The judgment and selection of such a program will require spiritual discernment, combined with the knowledge and the finest taste of the musician.

On December 9, the Motet Choral Society will give the following program in Washington:

Two choruses of death—
Death on the Hills (from the Russian of Maikov).....Elgar
In Thy Loving Arms (Motet in five parts).....Franck
Two choruses of night—
Evening Scene (words by Coventry Patmore).....Elgar
Hail, O Moon (from the Kalevala, Finnish folksong)....Sibelius
Two choruses of morning—
The Dawn .....Matthews
Sunrise (from the Russian of Feodor Tiutchef).....Taneyef
Four choruses of Christmas—
Unto Us a Son Is Born (Messiah).....Handel
Three Kings Have Journeyed.....Cornelius
Heil'ge Nacht (German Christmas song arranged by Damrosch).
Hallelujah Chorus (Messiah).....Handel

New York Harpist Heard in Recital.

In the Indianapolis News, October 26, appeared the following, which tells of Mildred Dilling's appearance in recital in the Western city:

Miss Dilling opened the recital with the playing of a group of numbers that included a bouree and a prelude by Bach, a "Tambourin," by Rameau, all of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; a "Menuet d'Amour" of the eighteenth century, arranged by Massenet, and a "Chanson de Guillot Martin," of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Miss Dilling is not only a graceful figure at the instrument, but she understands all the intricacy of its mechanism, and she brings forth from its strings the most exquisite music in a multitude of tonal and technical effects such as only artist harp players can produce.

In the final group by Miss Dilling, the audience was so delighted with a patrouille by Hasselmans that a continued applause brought a repetition of the number. The playing of the Chopin prelude No. 20 brought out new beauties that the pianist can not give, and each composition showed some new possibility of both the instrument and the player. "Les Lollet," by Hasselmans; an arabesque, by Debussy, with the patrouille, were played with skill and style, and the group was concluded with an impromptu caprice, by Pierne, played by request. This, however, was not the end of the music, for the applause was so loud and long continued that in response she gave a "Spanish Patrol," by Tdeschen, that was exquisite.

FLORENCE HINKLE IS A MUCH ADMIRED SINGER.

Many Recital, Orchestral and Oratorio Engagements Attest the Popularity and Value of This Prominent American Soprano.

"You wish me to tell you something interesting about myself?"

Florence Hinkle, the soprano, was speaking to a MUSICAL COURIER representative.

"There is really very little of interest to tell about myself"—Miss Hinkle is exceedingly reticent. "My days are filled with work"—reflectively—"work with my accompanist at home or in study while en route.

"How do I manage this on the road? I simply try to visualize the page of music, to remember just how the printed page looks.

"For the past two years I have been coaching with Herbert Witherspoon"—the Metropolitan Opera basso—"and I am most enthusiastic about his work, most enthusiastic"—with special emphasis.

"There really is little time left me for social diversions, and I love opera, the theatre, and all other phases of social life," she resumed, without, however, giving other than an impression of complete enjoyment in her devotion to her work, and that she finds sufficient compensation for this giving of her best self to her art in the wonderful success which she enjoys wherever she appears.

"Wouldn't you like an operatic career?"

"When I hear opera I think I would, but the recital, concert and oratorio field quite satisfies me. I am a great admirer of Mme. Sembrich and Julia Culp."

The soprano came to New York only a few years ago—six, to be accurate—to take the place left vacant by Anita Rio at the West End Collegiate Church. She was then comparatively unknown, but concert and oratorio engagements came to her, and have continued to come, to such an extent that now it is a question if any singer can boast (only Miss Hinkle never boasts) of a more sincere and discriminating musical clientele throughout the United States.

This season alone she is to appear with this country's principal orchestras, except the New York Symphony, with which latter she sang last season. These include six appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, December 18 and 19 in Boston at the regular concerts; two with the Philadelphia Orchestra, one of these in Philadelphia in the regular series; two with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra in Toledo and Cincinnati, and with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in North Adams, Mass.

Miss Hinkle's Cincinnati success at the Cincinnati Festival last season brought about her engagement for the orchestral appearances.

Miss Hinkle left on Monday, November 9, for a three weeks' tour, which includes appearances in Battle Creek, Mich.; St. Louis, Chicago, Danville, Louisville, Ky.; Greenville, Toledo, Ohio; Vinton, Ia.; Minneapolis, with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra at the Beethoven Festival, an unusual honor. Miss Hinkle has appeared in Minneapolis often before, but never with orchestra. From Minneapolis she will go to Superior, Wis., and will then return to New York. All of this shows but one phase of the demand for her singing.

"But how can you keep up your church work, with all these other engagements?" the writer asked in the conversation above mentioned.

"Why not? I love my church work, and the people at the West End Collegiate Church have always been most kind to me." This with enthusiasm, for she was not now speaking of herself.

"No, I never appear in recital without feeling a bit nervous" (she was referring to her recent Aeolian Hall recital), "and I am greatly interested in the American composer. I do feel that every American singer should render American compositions."

That the writer has not overestimated the appreciation and admiration of the musical public for this versatile soprano, the numerous press tributes which have from time to time been reproduced in the MUSICAL COURIER substantiate.

Johannes Sembach With Metropolitan.

Johannes Sembach, the new German tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, arrived in New York last week, on board the steamship Duc d'Aosta. He is scheduled to make his American debut at the special Thanksgiving Day matinee in the title role of "Parsifal." Mr. Sembach is only about thirty years old, but despite his youth has already done excellent work on many of the large German stages, including the Royal Opera at Dresden, the Royal Opera of Berlin, the Imperial Royal Opera of Vienna, and the Bayreuth Festspielhaus.

A Pittsburgh Teacher's Good Fortune.

James Stephen Martin is a vocal teacher of Pittsburgh, Pa., who has won marked success as a pedagogue. Nearly fifty of his pupils are occupying church positions, many of which include the best choirs of Pittsburgh and surrounding cities. His pupils, whether singing in church or concert work, are accorded a prominent position by the press and the public. Great interest is evinced in his monthly recitals, his artist pupils' recitals and annual concerts.

In addition to his work as a teacher, Mr. Martin is the leader of the Pittsburgh Male Chorus of eighty voices, and has directed the Tuesday Musical Club of about sixty-five voices since its organization, twenty years ago. Mr. Martin is also the director of the choir at the Second Presbyterian Church.

"Are you a music lover?"

"Yes; I always dine at restaurants where there is no orchestra."

BALTIMORE CONCERTS.

213 Prospect Avenue, Roland Park,
Baltimore, Md., October 29, 1914.

The Melamet Opera Class gave its opening concert of this season Thursday night at Lehmann Hall, before a warmly enthusiastic audience. Four choruses were sung, with the usual aplomb and finish that characterizes the work of this organization. Solos were sung by Margaret Kennard and Ida Shaw, sopranos; Anna G. Baugher and Mrs. Henry Franklin, contraltos; Clarence R. Tucker, tenor, and R. Fuller Fleet, basso, all of whom may fitly be characterized as artist-pupils. Special mention may be made of Miss Baugher, whose rich and melodious voice, coupled with the finish of her work, made her singing a notable feature. The duet by Messrs. Pickering and Gerhold was very enjoyable, and the final quartet, by Misses Sauerwein and Shafer, and Messrs. Pickering and Cromer, was well sung. It was a concert which reflected much credit upon David S. Melamet, whose pupils compose the class. The delightful accompaniments of Mrs. Melamet made a fitting background for the songs. She is a true artist.

ROBERTA GLANVILLE IN RECITAL.

Roberta Glanville, soprano, gave her annual recital at the Woman's Club of Roland Park on Wednesday afternoon. Miss Glanville is a great favorite at the club and is always warmly received. Her accompanist is Frederick D. Weaver.

BALTIMORE NOTES.

The New York Symphony Orchestra gave a concert here on Tuesday night. Brahms' second symphony opened the program, followed by the Bruch G minor violin concerto, delightfully played by Efrem Zimbalist, the soloist of the occasion.

The November convention of the American Musical Fraternity, which was secured for Baltimore, at the last meeting, by Delegate August Hoen, has somehow slipped through our fingers and gone to Philadelphia. A vast amount of mystery surrounds the whole affair.

A Woman Composer's Activities.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's activities have been numerous since her return to Boston. This American composer has, in addition to her strictly professional labors, been honored at a number of social functions on which occasions her talents have been exploited to a considerable degree. She was the guest of honor at a luncheon given by the Professional Women's Club of Boston on November 12. After the luncheon she played several of her own compositions to the delight of her hostesses. Next week Mrs. Beach will be tendered a reception in Boston by the MacDowell Club and on December 16 she will give a concert of her own compositions at Steinert Hall, Boston, assisted by the Hoffmann String Quartet.

The composer has settled in Readville, Mass., for the winter and at the beginning of the new year she will undertake a concert tour that will take her to the Pacific Coast. Mrs. Beach has recently written two new songs for Mme. Schumann-Heink, a song for George Hamlin, and a song for a friend, Marcella Craft, which Miss Craft will sing for the first time on November 22 in San Francisco.

Wolle in Scranton.

Dr. J. Fred. Wolle, the organist, gave a recital at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Scranton, Pa., November 5. Regarding this recital the Scranton papers had this to say:

The possibilities of the superb new organ recently installed were never more cleverly revealed than last night under the magic touch of Dr. Wolle. . . . From a musical standpoint last night's concert was altogether delightful.—Scranton (Pa.) Daily News.

Dr. J. Fred Wolle, the famous exponent of Bach music, afforded pleasure with his sympathetic, inspiring and artistic work. From the opening number, a Bach prelude, followed by the exquisite "Little Post-Horn Air," to the closing duet, his playing was a delight.—Scranton (Pa.) Tribune-Republican.

Philharmonic Programs.

Julia Culp is to be the soloist at the New York Philharmonic concerts of Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, November 19 and 20. She will sing the "Lament of Ariadne," from "Arianna," by Claudio Monteverdi. The orchestral numbers will be the Bach suite in D major, Beethoven's fifth symphony, the "Bartered Bride" overture, and Hadley's tone poem, "Lucifer" (its first performance in New York).

There is to be a series of four Saturday evening Philharmonic concerts, at popular prices, on November 21, January 16, March 13 and March 28. The first one will be a Wagner program made up of favorite selections from six of the operas and music dramas. Alma Gluck will be the soloist at the second of the series.

PITTSBURGH NEWS OF INTEREST.

Pittsburgh, Pa., November 12, 1914.

Ever since October 1, Christine Miller, Pittsburgh's contralto, has been en route from Berlin. She is now in the United States, having arrived from abroad on Election Day.

Dr. Little's Conservatory of Music at Beaver, Pa., has opened a branch at the Schenley Hotel. Max Shapiro, formerly a member of the Pittsburgh Orchestra and last summer the concertmaster of the Festival Orchestra, will be the head of the violin department.

Under the direction of James Stephen Martin, the Pittsburgh Male Chorus gave a concert at Knoxville (Pittsburgh) on Thursday evening, October 22. The opening concert here will be given on the evening of December 4 at Carnegie Hall.

Marjorie Keil Benton, soprano soloist at the First Baptist Church, returned recently after a fourteen weeks' tour throughout Minnesota, Iowa and Missouri. During this time Miss Benton appeared at eighty-eight concerts.

A series of chamber music concerts will be given by the Saudek Ensemble during the season at the Twentieth Century Club.

A unique feature of the first recital this season at the Bissell Conservatory of Music, Marie H. Sprague, directress, was the singing of the national Japanese hymn by Mrs. Kei Takano, a pupil of that school.

During this season Dallmeyer Russell, the pianist and teacher, will play several attractive programs and also expects to introduce one and perhaps two new piano concertos to the Pittsburgh public.

Frank Brosky, director of the Brosky School of Music, formerly known as the Luigi von Kunits School of Music, and of which Mr. von Kunits was director, teaches the Sevcik method in his violin department. Mr. Brosky heads this department.

John Lawrence Rodrigues, one of Pittsburgh's most successful teachers, has many pupils now appearing in concert and opera throughout the country.

It is reported that the Pittsburgh Conservatory of Music, Beveridge Webster, director, has an unusually large registration list for this season.

Geraldine Damon, the well known vocal teacher, has opened a downtown studio at 431 Wood street. Miss Damon will divide her time between this and her studio in the Wallace Building.

William Stevenson has accepted the directorship of the vocal department of the Brosky School of Music.

Sue Harvard, who is now in Dresden, studying with Léon Rains, will remain abroad in spite of the unfortunate conditions prevailing in Europe. For this reason Miss Harvard will be obliged to cancel many engagements in the United States during the present season.

May Beegle, local manager of the Ellis series of concerts, announces that in addition to the recent appearance of Olive Fremstad and Pasquale Amato in joint recital (October 27), the following artists will be heard here: Julia Culp, lieder singer, and Harold Bauer, pianist, in joint recital on November 24; Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Elizabeth van Endert, soprano, in joint recital on January 12, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 27.

The Gamble Concert Party continues to meet with fine success. This past summer was one of the busiest the party has ever enjoyed, and their appearances brought about many re-engagements for next summer.

Many singers holding attractive church positions are the pupils of Frank Milton Hunter, the vocal teacher.

Rebecca Davidson, the young pianist, scored heavily recently when she played at the exposition. This was a re-engagement, as she appeared there last year.

May Marshall Cobb announces that she is under the management of May Beegle, the local manager.

It is understood that Lucille Miller is planning to continue her work in the concert field.

Hollis Edison Davenny is arranging some very interesting programs for the choir and chorus of the First Baptist Church, where he is the director of music.

Anne Griffiths, the instructor of voice, has an unusually large list of pupils this season.

One of the leading members of the casts of the Aborn Opera Company is Zoe Fulton, the contralto, and it is understood that she will be heard here again next summer. This re-engagement is due to her success in various roles with this company during the past summer.

William R. Gardner, the voice teacher, is now residing at Dormont, where he teaches a few hours each week.

It is understood that Richard Knotts will give a recital for some of his artist-pupils, the date to be announced later.

The Pittsburgh Ladies' Orchestra, of which Albert Leifeld is director, returned recently from a satisfactory tour in the Middle West.

Walter C. Earnest, tenor, is one of Pittsburgh's busiest musicians. In addition to his church work and his teaching, he is constantly being called upon to fill engagements in concert and recital. He is a great favorite throughout the Middle States.

Carl Bernthaler, conductor of the Bernthaler Festival Orchestra, announces a tour for that organization, the itinerary of which will be announced in a forthcoming issue.

Anthony Jawelak, the blind boy, is continuing to make excellent progress as a pianist under the guidance of Caspar P. Koch.

Martha Steele, dramatic soprano, who acts as her own manager, secured numerous engagements as a result of her business trip throughout Ohio, Michigan and Illinois

Rose Leader, who is the contralto soloist at the Shadyside Presbyterian Church, is a leading pupil of Frank Milton Hunter.

Grace Hall Riheldaffer, the soprano, has been on tour since October 1, and will remain away until December 10.

Jenny Dufau at Raleigh, N. C.

Jenny Dufau, prima donna of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, is meeting with success after success on her extended concert tour, thus showing that she belongs to that rare class of artists who are capable of transforming themselves in accordance with the exigencies arising on the operatic as well as the concert stage, and attaining in both a high degree of perfection.

Miss Dufau is now on a tour which, to judge from the success recorded by her so far, will make her one of the best-known and best-liked recitalists throughout the country.

The following note shows how she was received in Raleigh, North Carolina, a few days ago:

One of the most enthusiastic audiences, which has ever assemhled in St. Mary's Auditorium, greeted Jenny Dufau, the coloratura soprano of the Chicago-Philadelphia Grand Opera Company, at the opening concert of the Peace-St. Mary's series, Friday night. In a program which contained songs and arias from the seventeenth century down to the present day the singer held the audience enthralled, and was compelled to respond to five or six encores.

Miss Dufau appeared very much touched by the ovation tendered her hy the Peace-St. Mary girls, and after the older members of the audience had gone Miss Dufau was surrounded hy the girls, and she very graciously sang still another song for her youthful admirers. The old Italian air of "Paradise" ("Quel ruscelleto"), which opened the program, proved that Miss Dufau is a legato singer of high attainments. The voice is, by nature, a hrilliant, high coloratura, but Miss Dufau, hy the resources at her command, is ahle to color the quality and create actual "tone pictures" which add infinitely to her success in concert. It is rather amazing to find a soprano who can infuse such a wealth of variety into her tones and into her interpretation, hut anyone who heard Miss Dufau sing the rollicking cadenzas of Delihes' "Filles de Cadix," and almost in the next breath give utterance to so dignified and beautiful a reading of the haunting Solvejg song of Grieg, with its restrained and almost melancholy charm, must admit that she is a singer who must figure importantly in American concert affairs in the future. The "Wiegenlied" of Humperdinck, and the "Und Niemand hat's gesehn" of Loewe, proved that Miss Dufau's ability to sing these delicate little German songs with just the proper spirit, and her songs in English might be a good lesson for many American singers, so clear and crisp was the diction. Throughout Miss Dufau's recital there was a "sureness" and a refreshing freedom from effort and straining for effect, and the charming and unaffected personality of the artist had much to do with the undisputed success which was surely hers.

A word must he said for the exquisite accompaniments of Charles Lurvey, who plays with rare understanding. Those in charge of the Peace-St. Mary's artist course have reason to feel proud of their first concert of the season, for it was a success of the most emphatic sort.—Raleigh News and Observer, October 19, 1914.

Thanksgiving Program by Florian Pupils.

Agnes Florian, vocal instructor, whose studio is on State street in Brooklyn, N. Y., announces a Thanksgiving recital to be given shortly before that day by a number of students who are members of her private classes. These private classes are composed each of six singers, who, under the efficient guidance of Mme. Florian, develop tone production, interpretation, vocalization and sight reading. Owing to this novel plan, this recital will be awaited with interest.

Lennon Returns to Houston.

Emmet Lennon, tenor, has returned to Houston, Texas, where he will continue to give vocal instruction, specializing in preparing singers for church, concert and operatic work.

New York Press Estimate of Friedberg.

A consensus of the New York daily press opinion of Carl Friedberg's American debut recital in Carnegie Hall follow:

Another pianist of first rank was introduced to New Yorkers yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, when Carl Friedberg made his debut in this city before a representative audience of music lovers. There were no tumultuous demonstrations to record, no hysterical outbursts of enthusiasm, and it is quite likely that more than a few persons entirely failed to appreciate at their full value the musical qualities of the man.

But it would be far from true to say that the audience was cold and listless. Connoisseurs recognized in Friedberg a musician of fine sensibilities, of strong individuality, of poetic insight, and they enjoyed his playing all the more, as they showed in their applause because it did not fall into a conventional rut.

Friedberg is not prone to lay undue stress on detail. His principal aim is to expose clearly and eloquently the musical structure of the works he understands how to interpret, and in throwing essential points into prominence he is even willing at times to blur the background.

Evidently he reaches out to the loftiest goal, thoughtless of personal display, inspired solely by the passion to serve as an interpreter, and he brings to his work a remarkable sense of balance and proportion, a finely expressive and varied touch, the taste of a true artist, who scorns all clap-trap, and a very unusual amount of individuality. To listen, even if it must be semi-darkness, to a musician who not only plays the piano so well, but penetrates so deeply into the spirit of the composer, is a pleasure indeed. Among pianists who have visited America in recent years, Friedberg must count as one of the most interesting.—Press.

An exposition of poetic piano playing was given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall by Carl Friedberg.

Although his list of selections included works of such dignity as the Bach-Liszt fantasie and fugue in G minor, and a Beethoven sonata, it was in the Chopin and Brahms pieces that Mr. Friedberg's art was most attractive.

That he is an artist of high attainments and ideals, there can be no doubt. His touch was always absolutely precise and accurate, his tone pure and clear, with a singing cadence unutterly charming. He played four pieces by Chopin with a full appreciation of their romantic significance, while in the Brahms group he demonstrated an ability to interpret colorful, rhapsodic music that was commendable and gratifying.

His audience was of good size, and in response to insistent applause after the printed list had been exhausted, he added a Chopin etude and a valse in B flat by the same composer.—American.

Carl Friedberg, of Cologne, showed the way to pianistic newcomers yesterday by making a success of his American debut in Carnegie Hall. He did it seriously, like the serious-minded musician he seems, and made many friends among the audience.

In Cologne, where he is a professor of the conservatory, Mr. Friedberg is almost as highly regarded as a symphony orchestra conductor as he is as a pianist.

The program could not have been better constructed to provide a test for Mr. Friedberg. Beginning with the Bach-Liszt fantasie and fugue in G minor, it progressed to Beethoven's E major sonata and thence to the symphonic etudes of Schumann.

A Brahms group, including the G minor ballade and E flat major intermezzo, followed. Chopin was chosen for the closing, the G minor ballade, the C sharp minor valse and the polonaise in F sharp minor being the chief numbers.

A sympathetic singing touch and a fine legato were qualities quickly apparent. There was a mixture of scholar and poet in the pianist's interpretations, which made those of Chopin almost as well presented as those of Beethoven. If not the most interesting performer heard here in recent years, Mr. Friedberg is one whose attainments and unaffected methods command admiration.—The World.

Through a semi-gloom, artificially created in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, Carl Friedberg emerged into the ken of some few hundred New Yorkers as a pianoforte virtuoso; or better since he proved himself worthy of designation, as an artistic player upon the pianoforte. . . . He can give a pure and high pleasure by his playing. He reads his music aright, and he knows how to make his vehicle eloquent. He does not outrage it in an effort to astound, nor degrade it through a desire to make it contribute to mere "lascivious pleasings." He has a good opinion of the virility of Bach, Beethoven, Brahms and Chopin, these were the composers whom he undertook to interpret yesterday, and he knows that the three immortal B's do not always necessarily speak in the voice of the furor teutonicus, nor the Gallicised Pole, in the accents of the female boarding school. First of all, he knows the capacities of the pianoforte—its dynamic powers and their limitations—and the sensuous beauty of its voice. Euphony, clarity of utterance, nice gradation of dynamics marked the mechanical part of everything from the Bach-Liszt fantasie and fugue in C minor to the last of his Chopin pieces, the large intermediate steps being Beethoven's sonata in E major, op. 109, and Brahms' ballade in G minor; also a deep feeling for their emotional conceits as well as their aesthetic beauty.—Tribune.

There are many attractive qualities about the piano playing of Carl Friedberg, who made his first appearance in New York at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon; there is a feeling for tonal beauty and for tonal coloring, . . . a technic that gives him delicacy, clearness and independence of articulation, and a sensitive feeling for some of the finer nuances. . . . There are pianists who especially affect the pianissimo; they are usually wise enough to limit their repertoire accordingly. Beethoven's elegiac and introspective sonata in E major, op. 109, lends itself to the kind of treatment that Mr. Friedberg gave it, and his performance had much beauty. His playing of Liszt's arrangements of Bach's G minor organ prelude and fugue was clearly and soundly set forth. . . .

Mr. Friedberg played also three of the later piano pieces by Brahms and a group of Chopin numbers.—Times.

Mr. Friedberg started with Bach's G minor fantasie and fugue, with Liszt's dressings, and followed this with Beethoven's E major sonata, op. 109, which no one has yet decorated. Then came Schumann's etudes symphoniques, Brahms' G minor ballade, E flat intermezzo and E flat rhapsody, and a group of Chopin numbers, including the G minor ballade. This program was what the British might call "a tall order." . . . This pianist is an artist. . . .—Sun.

We have not had the pleasure in many years of making the acquaintance of a pianist of such amazing charm and gifts as yesterday, in the person of Carl Friedberg. German critics have heralded this artist, who has rapidly reached the very zenith of fame as a "poet of the piano," not without reason, as he proved yesterday when he gave his first recital in Carnegie Hall.

Assuredly he is a poet of the piano, and a decidedly lyric one at that. German temperament, a gentle deliberation, and occasional dreaminess, which, however, was entirely wholesome and musical in conception, characterized his interpretation, in which an exquisite sense of values, a splendid restraint and a noble simplicity were conspicuous.

Friedberg played in a darkened hall, "There shall be light when my star shines forth," but Friedberg's art has nothing in common with night, it is luminous with the light of poetry. . . . And what a gracious way of playing Bach, what an apostle for the popularization of the much feared master!

Beethoven sonata, op. 109, received an incomparably, poetic and significant interpretation. In the first movement a sweet seriousness alternated with a high light of joy; the second was instinct with whirling breathlessness; while into the last movement Friedberg infused the vision of the most exalted heights to which the human mind can attain.

Schumann's symphonic etudes, glowing in a blaze of splendid virtuosity, received a poetic embodiment in Friedberg's rendition which made of the long composition, which so easily appears pedantic and heavy, a thing of sheer joy.

He reached the highest pinnacle of his art, however, in playing the three compositions by Brahms. The ballade in G minor, op. 118, was played with overwhelming beauty; the exquisite intermezzo, op. 117, was phosphorescently bright, and the imposing rhapsody, op. 118, E flat major, created the impression of a blood red Northern light. I admit frankly that I have never heard these three pieces played with such towering majesty and beauty.

A group of Chopin compositions concluded the program. Friedberg played a ballade in G minor, an etude, the famous waltz in C sharp minor with fascinating polish and subtlety, infusing into them a dreamy wistfulness at times and then again an ascending glory.

The audience fell entirely under the charm of Friedberg's magnificent art, and accorded him a reception which, before the final number had been played, had become an ovation.—Staats-Zeitung.

We hear so much mediocre and commonplace music in our concert halls that it is delightful occasionally to hear an artist of really extraordinary merit, a past master of a resplendently perfect technic, who combines with a mature musical understanding an admirable feeling for style, who, furthermore, injects intelligence and art into every tone and who, last of all, uses all the splendid equipment merely as a means to an end in order to reveal to the sympathetic listener art's holy of holies; such an extraordinary artist, upon whom the divine fire has descended, is Carl Friedberg, who was heard at Carnegie Hall yesterday for the first time in New York. The artist headed his program with the fantasie and fugue in G minor by Bach-Liszt. In the rendition of the fantasie, in spite of the artist's delight in color, nothing was sacrificed in the way of concentration, and in his wonderful execution of the fugue, the phrasing of which was perfect, he attained a crystalline, overwhelming forcefulness. In the Beethoven sonata, op. 109, the artist had occasion to infuse his entire wealth of emotion. Dreamily beautiful was the adagio intermezzo, and an impassioned profundity informed the prestissimo with its sharply progressing basses and its stormily ascending theme, while the theme of the andante breathed a gentle brooding peace until the work closed in regions of delicate, dreamy beauty.

A heart and soul aflame with a sense of beauty were evidenced by the artist's plastic interpretation of the romantic material found in Schumann's symphonic etudes. A flood of tonal beauty, enriched by depth of sentiment, marked Friedberg's playing of the three compositions by Brahms, op. 117, 118 and 119. Full of fascination was the Chopin ballade in G minor, deeply poetic the etudes, op. 10, No. 4, and full of glittering magnificance the polonaise in F sharp minor by the same composer.

The enthusiastically demanded encores were Chopin's etude in G flat major and Chopin's valse in A flat.—Deutsches Journal.

. . . In the course of a group of Brahms numbers the personality of Carl Friedberg asserted itself more and more strongly, until in the concluding Chopin numbers, the completeness of his interpretative genius was manifested beyond the shadow of a doubt. . . . In his large grasp of all that is best in the literature of the pianoforte, Carl Friedberg made good his claim to greatness. And by his choice of representative and familiar compositions he successfully challenged comparison with the most renowned of his contemporaries.—Evening Mail.

. . . In the Beethoven and Brahms numbers, he was at his best, playing them with sympathetic insight and loving attention to details. From the intellectual point of view his playing was all that could be desired.—Evening Post. (Advertisement.)

Albert Spalding's New York Encomiums.

Albert Spalding, the American violinist, won sincere admiration from conservative New York critics in his recent metropolitan recital at Carnegie Hall. The following reviews from the New York daily press tell the story:

The chief event of musical interest yesterday was the appearance of Albert Spalding at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Spalding is an American, and there are, therefore, those who will insist that he deserves special consideration in order that we may show our patriotism and our courage. At his recital yesterday he proved himself an artist of fine sensibilities, a musician of insight and understanding, a virtuoso who has no reason to fear comparison with any of the younger Europeans.

In Porpora's sonata in G, in the Bach adagio and fugue in G minor, and in Mozart's concerto in D major, he showed yesterday his delight in and understanding of the classic style. His bowing was broad and unaffected, his tone round and warm. Technically his playing was faultless. In the group of lighter pieces at the end of the program, two of them by himself and one Edwin Grasse's whimsically delicate "Waves at Play," he displayed a really delicious grace, and the audience rewarded him by its insistent demands for encores.—Tribune, October 30, 1914.

Albert Spalding, one of the foremost American violinists, gave a recital in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It was his first appearance here in two years, and without airs he gave a large audience an enjoyable entertainment.

Everything about the recital had an air of refinement. His playing had dignity, and he played at all times in tune and with due regard to the execution of the minutest details.

The program began with Porpora's sonata in G, which was followed by Bach's adagio and fugue in G minor for violin unaccompanied. It is extremely difficult to play unaccompanied numbers so that they are interesting to any one but a professional violinist, but Mr. Spalding succeeded well.

Mr. Spalding's reposeful, accurate style is particularly well suited to works of a quiet, dignified nature. The andante cantabile movement was especially enjoyable.—Herald, October 30, 1914.

Mr. Spalding is much in earnest; he has made that evident in his public performances from the beginning, and his attitude toward the public has always been one of unostentatious dignity and seriousness, with no thought of personal display and with no yielding to the temptations that beset the virtuoso.

Such an artist as he, is one to be reckoned with seriously, and is a credit to American art.

He played yesterday a sonata by Porpora, a fine specimen of the eighteenth century school, with the simplicity and directness that it calls for, with finished style and with breadth in his conception of it.

In Bach's unaccompanied sonata in G minor, his playing was an admirable piece of work, and still better in Mozart's D major concerto, which followed, and in which he attained much of the charm, the urbane geniality and grace that are of the essence of the music.—Times, October 30, 1914.

He gave evidence yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall of powers of interpretation that were masterly. Not only has he become an exemplary technician, but he also expresses himself with both eloquence and noble style.

His opening numbers consisted of works by the older writers—Porpora, Bach and Mozart. In these he revealed his highest qualities as a musician.—American, October 30, 1914.

Albert Spalding, an American violinist, who has steadily grown in favor, gave the first of his recitals this season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon after a tour in Europe. That he purposes to sustain the high level on which his concerts have always stood was proved by the character of his program.

Mr. Spalding is an artist who commands respect. He pursues the beautiful and seriously studies his art. He keeps good music before his hearers. As in the instance of Mr. Grasse's composition, he knows how to pay a graceful tribute to a local performer on the violin.

In respect to dignity, little is wanting in the playing of Mr. Spalding. His tone is good and his technic showed the result of continued hard work. There are both taste and intelligence in his performances. Mr. Spalding plays like a gentleman and a scholar.—Sun, October 30, 1914.

Albert Spalding, American violinist, gave a recital in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The occasion was in the nature of a "welcome home," for since he was last heard here he has been displaying his talents on many European concert platforms.

From time to time reports have come across the water of the remarkable success the American player was meeting abroad.

Mr. Spalding yesterday justified his return to his home concert field. His art has plainly broadened and he has grown in musicianship. His reading of Mozart's D major concerto especially gave his listeners much pleasure. In the main he caught the Mozartian spirit. The andante movement was done beautifully.

Throughout, the player's intonation was of the finest, and he performed his task in a dignified and sincere manner.—World, October 30, 1914.

Albert Spalding is always welcome, and he came with his much traveled violin to Carnegie Hall, even in the afternoon. Imagine a slim, youthful fellow of artistic outline and modest bearing, standing in the half lights of our somewhat obscure and gloomy shrine of music. He looks native and is a gentleman. Such is Albert Spalding.

It is pleasant, however, to think that it is possible, as Mr. Spalding has proved over and over again that one can cultivate the violin to an extraordinary degree of proficiency without cultivating an appearance strongly suggestive of a too recent escape from an ethnological museum. Few reviews of a violin recital exceed the temptation of referring to "double stopping" and "passage work." The first phrase suggests the remote dialect of automobilism, the second would seem to be a department of domestic architecture. They are vile phrases, both of them. But we have no doubt Mr. Spalding has mastered both of them. In three classic pieces by Porpora, Bach and Mozart he showed purity, strength and sweetness of style, as well as substance of tone. As a rule, Mr. Spalding is rather persuasive than astounding. His playing does not cudgel and club you to the ground. It reaches your heart and your intelligence, if you are supplied with that contraband of war.—Telegraph, October 30, 1914.

It has been an interesting thing to watch the steady and sound growth of Albert Spalding from youthful promise to artistic maturity, a growth which will continue, as it does invariably in the case of real artists, as long as they live.

Admirers of Mr. Spalding had the opportunity yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall to enjoy the deepening and ripening of his art. His rhythmic sense has always been fine, but he has now developed a fire which has not been his heretofore, and a warmth of tone which is nearly always a late development in the Anglo-Saxon.

His program was not too long and was well balanced, being divided about evenly between the old and the new. He played Fritz Kreisler's "Liebesfreud" as an encore. All violinists love Fritz Kreisler, and the greater they are themselves the more they love him. Mr. Spalding's performance of Kreisler's enchanting work was truly inspired and was an honor to his great colleague. The tragic contrast between the fate of Kreisler, as possible food for cannon, and his own fortunate position seemed to have burned into his soul. Another truly beautiful piece of work was his tender playing of the exquisite slow melody from Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" suite, also as an encore.

Mr. Spalding's sane and balanced performance of Porpora's sonata in G, his very interesting reading of the enormously difficult adagio and fugue in G minor by Bach for violin alone, and his crystalline playing of the Mozart concerto in D major were thoroughly enjoyable. . . .

Mr. Spalding's performance was admirable. His double stopped harmonies could not have been improved on, and though the "Campanella" is obviously a show piece, he played it with its musical side uppermost in his mind. The two other numbers of the group were Edwin Grasse's charming "Waves at Play," which Mr. Spalding repeated in answer to much applause, and a wild mazurek by Dvorák, which the artist played with much dash. The excellent accompanist, André Benoist, furnished sympathetic support throughout the program.—Evening Post, October 30, 1914.

The American violinist, very slender and well groomed, did honor to his Italian masters by starting with a Porpora sonata, then a fugue of Bach. He showed fine tone in a concerto of Mozart, which carried the classic airs to a degree of intimacy too rarefied for a great hall.—Evening Sun, October 30, 1914.

When Mr. Spalding played here last, two seasons ago, he was already recognized as an accomplished performer, an artist of serious and high ideals. His playing yesterday showed that in the interval it has broadened and deepened.—Globe and Commercial Advertiser, October 30, 1914.

Albert Spalding's new violin—new only in the sense of his recent acquisition of the instrument—seemed to lend a warmer tone than usual to this young American artist's playing. It is a genuine Guarnerius del Gesu violin, made in 1735.

Mr. Spalding was particularly happy in his playing of Mozart's exquisite concerto in D major.—Evening Telegram, October 30, 1914.

Albert Spalding both played and interpreted yesterday afternoon, in Carnegie Hall, putting soul and beauty in the "Campanella" movement, in Mozart's concerto in D major. And throughout his program he played with very real interpretation. He has his own individual style, which is that of a man playing on a superb instrument, recently acquired. He showed dignity and sincerity. He played two of his own compositions, a speaking prelude, which made a deep impression at once, and "Nostalgie," which is arranged against an individually harmonic background, for the piano. There is a plaintive and beautiful melody, which enters into the fabric of "Nostalgie" after the unrest of the first movement passes. This was also interesting.

The tone of Spalding yesterday was full and brilliant. His heavy numbers were the Porpora sonata in G and Bach's adagio and fugue in G minor for violin alone, and the Mozart concerto in D major, which the violinist played lucidly and in the rondo charmingly. The andante cantabile was given with true Mozartian depth.—Brooklyn Daily Eagle, October 30, 1914.

I remember distinctly the first appearance of Albert Spalding. A sympathetic young man of unmistakable talent and serious artistic earnestness. The young man returned later, further matured and awakened, but who, at that time, could have predicted the Spalding of today would indeed have been called a prophet. Mr. Spalding is a virtuoso of the noblest kind, an artist of the most spiritual strivings and attainments, a musician with the loftiest ideals, and who has fully reached them. His tone is extraordinarily large, full, powerful and sweet, his bowing perfect and varied, his technic simply stupendous, without, however, intruding itself into the artistic line. His sense of rhythm is excellent, and a fine intuitive feeling for style hovers over his entire performance so as to combine in producing the happiest results. The old time sonata in G by Porpora he sang with the most sublime refinement, and in the madly difficult adagio and fugue by Bach he brought forward great nobility of style and the most perfect command over technical difficulties. Then with lovely tone quality he arose to the Olympian heights Mozart so well deserves, by playing the Salsburg master's delicate and spirit uplifting concerto in D. His technical mastery he showed in Edwin Grasse's "Waves at Play," a graceful bagatelle in chromatic runs, that one seldom will hear played so cleanly, smoothly and delicately.

His own prelude and "Nostalgie" are dainty trifles, and his arrangement of Paganini's "La Campanella" is made with the most intimate knowledge of the intricacies of the violin. By the quantity of encores the good sized audience assembled in Carnegie Hall demanded of the artist, was shown to what extent he had entered their hearts. Mr. André Benoist shone as a masterly accompanist at the piano. Spalding possesses a never ending source of enjoyment in his recently acquired Guarnerius violin of the year 1735, which is said to cost no less than $15,000, and is a twin instrument to the Paganini violin preserved as a relic in the Museum of Genoa. Will some day Spalding's instrument be honored that way?—New York Staatszeitung, Sunday, November 1, 1914.

Constance Purdy Interested in Benefit.

Constance Purdy, contralto, has been largely instrumental in organizing a concert for the benefit of the American Ambulance Hospital in Paris, to be given at the Hotel Plaza, Friday afternoon, November 20. The invitation cards are accompanied by a long list of patronesses well known in the New York social world and by printed matter explaining the nature of this undertaking. The American Ambulance Hospital has been organized as an auxiliary to the existing American hospital in Paris. It is entirely American in character with American surgeons and nurses in charge. It has been pronounced by eminent surgeons to be of the highest type of a military hospital in Europe.

On October 19 the amount collected in this country amounted to $87,075.06. This has been cabled direct to Paris, where local subscription from Americans amount to about $120,000. It is estimated that a total of $500,000 must be raised.

Miss Purdy's eminent artistic and social position fits her unusually well for this work, to which she has been able to give her time in spite of her usual activity. On November 7 she gave a talk at the Radcliffe Club on personal experiences in Russia during the revolution of 1905, bringing out the contrast between the disorganization in Moscow at that time and the national unity of today. On November 22 she is to sing for a Lithuanian audience in Brooklyn. December 12 and 16 she will sing with the Russian Bayan Quartet, the latter date being at Columbia University. After Christmas she is to give a Russian program at Harvard University, and early in December she will sing a Russian program at the Cosmopolitan Club, New York, for the Union Settlement Music School. January 13 she is booked by the Schubert Club of St. Paul for a Russian program.

Katharine Goodson with Royal Philharmonic.

The Royal Philharmonic Society of London, also the other London orchestras, have announced their usual season. At the third concert on December 10 Katharine Goodson will appear as soloist, Safonoff conducting. This will be the pianist's last appearance before she sails for America, where she is due to open her season with her first recital at Carnegie Hall, New York, on January 2. She will remain in America till the end of April.

Christine Miller "Delighted."

From battle scarred Europe Christine Miller, the contralto, has come, and, like a former President of the United States, she is assuring everybody that she is "delighted" to be home again.

Miss Miller arrived on the steamship Potsdam in New York just six months after she had left for her annual summer holiday abroad. Her plan was to pass much time climbing the Alps, for Miss Miller is one of the few women who belong to the Alpine Club.

The mountain climbing diversion was going on apace and pictures of the charming singer and her alpenstock were being duly made, and letters were coming to the United States telling of her adventures. Then came the war.

Miss Miller watched the mobilization of the mountaineers in the village where she happened to be when war was declared. After some weeks she made her way slowly to Berlin. She was amply supplied with travelers' money orders, which she was able to cash at all times throughout Germany. According to the singer, the high cost of living cry was not heard in the Kaiser's capital, nor did the war raise the price of either food or clothes.

Once in Berlin, Miss Miller found concerts taking place just as on her prior visit a year ago. Nikisch was conducting the Berlin Philharmonic and Leo Slezak was giving a series of song recitals. Other notables, including Carl Flesch, the violinist, were appearing in concerts, and there was no sign of mourning in Germany's greatest city, although every one knew that countless homes had been invaded by the fate of war. Music was filling a new place in Berlin—consolation to wives and mothers who knew the terrible reality of war.

CHRISTINE MILLER (IN FRONT) AND A GROUP OF FRIENDS IN BERLIN.

CHRISTINE MILLER (SEATED AT RIGHT) IN A BERLIN PARK.

Miss Miller had some difficulty booking her passage with the Holland-American Line, as she was without a passport. She was born in Scotland, but inasmuch as her family came to America when she was a child the question of birth never seemed to matter; but in war times it matters where one is born. Ambassador Gerard finally arranged the matter of the passport and America's contralto secured passage on the Potsdam weeks ahead, but the Potsdam was seized by the English and after a time was released. While waiting, Miss Miller visited other cities beside Rotterdam, her sailing port, namely, Amsterdam, The Hague, Scheveningen and Utrecht.

Arriving in New York, three days late, she had little time to herself. An accompanist to run over her programs met her at the McAlpin Hotel at 9 o'clock, an hour after the ship docked. At 2.45 in the afternoon she took the twenty hour train of the Pennsylvania line for Chicago, where the Colorado flyer of the Burlington route was held for her, so that she might keep her opening recital date at Knox College, Galesburg, Ill. A wire from Knox College says Miss Miller was a tremendous success, and a similar telegram from Jackson, Mich., tells of another ovation for this popular songstress in that city, so it may be safely said that Christine Miller has opened her recital season with her usual splendid success.

Ida Gardner Under Anderson Management.

A new arrival in the New York concert field is Ida Gardner, contralto, who has spent several years in Europe studying with Lloyd D'Aubigne, the Paris teacher. Such roles as Amneris, Azucena, Dalila, Carmen, Orpheo, etc., were thoroughly mastered, and as a result many offers were received, including one from the Imperial Opera, Vienna. As in many other cases the war abruptly changed Miss Gardner's plans. She returned immediately to America and sang for Walter Anderson, who arranged for her management in the concert and oratorio field, thereby continuing the line of work started before going to Europe. Nature has endowed Miss Gardner with a voice of unusual beauty, a charm of personality and an appearance that immediately finds favor with her audience.

The few engagements that the contralto has already filled have more than substantiated her claim to the title of artist, and the bookings already closed, a list of which is appended, indicate that the season is to be a good one for this capital singer: October 6, Schenectady; October 9, Amsterdam; November 1, Hackensack; November 8, Arlington, "Holy City"; November 12, Jersey City; December 22, Brooklyn, "Messiah"; January 14, Pittsfield;

IDA GARDNER.

February 11, Cleveland; February 14, Wichita Symphony Orchestra; February 15, Wichita Recital; February 17, Kansas City; February 19, Chicago.

Engagements for William Wheeler.

Foster & Foster, musical managers of New York, have secured the following engagements for William Wheeler, tenor:

November 17, Waterbury, Conn., Westover School; December 7, Hasbrouck Heights, N. J., "The Rose Maiden"; January 5, Pittsburgh, Pa.; January 6, Flushing L. I.; February 3, Smith College, Northampton, Mass.; March 4, Syracuse University, "St. Paul"; March 10, Cambridge, Mass.; March 11, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.; March 12, Williams College, Williamstown, Mass.; March 15, Yale University, New Haven, Conn.; March 19, Princeton University, Princeton, N. J.

It may be easily seen that Mr. Wheeler is a general favorite at the leading institutions of learning in this country, where his work is conceded to be of great educational value as well as to give pleasure.

Additional dates will be announced in these columns from time to time.

"How do you like your new music master?"

"He is a very nice, polite young man. When I made a mistake yesterday he said: 'Pray, mademoiselle, why do you take so much pains to improve upon Beethoven?'"—Paris Figaro.

Salvatore Giordano's Career.

Salvatore Giordano, the tenor, who scored so marked a success at the Maine Music Festival this year, has had an interesting career. He made his debut as Don José in "Carmen" at the San Carlos Opera House, Naples, in December, 1906, and met with such immediate favor that the opera directors of Rome, Palermo, Milan and Turin offered him season engagements. He had the good fortune to win from these contracts with Berlin, Paris, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Warsaw, Lodz, Odessa (where he was reengaged three times), Constantinople (where he appeared by the request of the Sultan, who bestowed decorations upon him). Mr. Giordano has been fortunate in being a friend of Enrico Caruso, who has frequently given him excellent advice and valuable hints, of which Mr. Giordano is careful to make use. Among the standard operas which are included in his repertoire are "Tosca," "Rigoletto," "Manon," "Faust," "Traviata," "Carmen," "Barber of Seville," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Pagliacci," "Boheme," "Don Pasquale" and many others in which he has appeared in Europe. His concert repertoire includes, besides operatic arias, the best known lyric songs of the French and Italian schools. Mr. Giordano was a member of Constantino's company and appeared with great success in Cuba and New Orleans.

MARCELLA CRAFT AND SALVATORE GIORDANO AT PORTLAND, ME.
These artists appeared at the 1914 Maine Music Festival.

Samples of the headings of the daily newspaper comments on his singing in those American cities where he has appeared follow:

Giordano sensation at last night's festival. . . . Handsome young Italian electrified the audience with superb singing.—Portland (Me.) Daily Press.

Second festival night a triumph for Giordano. Audience went wild over magnificent voice of young Italian tenor.—Bangor Daily Commercial.

Triumphs for great Giordano. Lewiston entertained by the great Italian tenor.—Lewiston Evening Journal.

That Mr. Giordano has a splendid voice the following notices attest:

From the moment he made his appearance on the scene, he established himself firmly in the good graces of the select public of our San Carlos.

A perfectly ideal Don Jose, as soldier first, and then as the smuggler, he produced subtle and dramatic effects of extraordinary power. His singing, his exquisite art, his passionate accents, the beautiful quality of his voice enraptured the audience and kept it spellbound throughout the performance.—Naples (Il Mattino), December 8, 1906.

Salvatore Giordano always scores triumphs, and last night's performance of "Tosca" was nothing but a confirmation of these. He simply is Mario Cavaradossi. Delightful singer, endowed with a voice which is clear, limpid and caressing; splendid actor, whose aristocratic bearing makes him the dominant figure on the stage—he has everything in his favor—he is perfect.—Milan (Corriere della Sera), January 17, 1908.

For in Chevalier Salvatore Giordano, the pupil and probable successor of Caruso, Director Chapman presented the most remarkable tenor who has ever appeared at the Bangor Festival. Giordano established his supremacy. Review the tenors of festival history from the silvery-voiced Evan Williams down, and memory fails to recall his equal.—Bangor Daily News, October 12, 1912.

A singer of marvelous sweetness and tremendous dramatic force. There are many who predict for Giordano a wonderful future and who declare he is the logical successor of Caruso. Already Giordano is a very great artist, perhaps the greatest tenor the director has ever brought to a Maine Music Festival.—Bangor Daily Commercial, October 12, 1912.

Chev. Giordano was the sensation of Tuesday evening's festival, this handsome young Italian with his tones of honeyed sweetness quite electrifying the audience with his superb singing. It was a Giordano night, truly, balconies, floor and platform, waiting in their efforts to hear the most of his glorious voice.—Portland Daily Press, October 16, 1912.

It is evident that he has carried musical Portland by storm. The charm of his wonderful tenor, of such rich quality, and softly caressing tones, and vibrant power, is enhanced by the charm of his personality.—Daily Eastern Argus, October 17, 1912.

Giordano, of the handsome stage presence, the glorious voice and the magnificent personality, captivated the Lewiston audience as he captivates audiences wherever he goes.—Lewiston, Maine, December 12, 1912.

Although an Italian, Mr. Giordano has deep admiration for the citizens of this republic and for everything American. He never allows an opportunity to express this opinion to pass by, as at the Maine Festival, when the closing number consisted of national airs, and when Mr. Giordano joined in the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner" with all the verve and delight of a native born American.

The accompanying picture of Marcella Craft, soprano, and Mr. Giordano was "snapped" while they were engaged in earnest conversation on the steps of the City Hall at Portland, Me., where the Maine Festival concerts in Portland were held, and at which both were soloists.

Klibansky Opera School Established.

Sergei Klibansky announces the establishment of an Operatic School, believing that his project will appeal to students all the more now that the Century Opera Company has given up for the present its plan for such a school. This fact constitutes one of the chief reasons for his starting the school, in which students of other teachers may enter. He will make the tuition fee very moderate, allowing those of limited means to prepare for an operatic career. It is expected that several performances of acts from various operas will be given during the season. Emphasis is placed on the fact that this school is entirely independent of vocal study under Mr. Klibansky. Anyone wishing any sort of operatic preparation will be welcomed. Victor Maurel's former coach has been engaged.

Mr. Klibansky's qualifications for this enterprise include several years as conductor of the opera classes at the Stern Conservatory, Berlin, Germany, and at the Institute of Musical Art, New York.

Several of the Klibansky artist-pupils have recently appeared, in part as follows: Newton Soper has been engaged as alto soloist at St. Andrew's Church, Yonkers, N. Y. Jean Cooper and Arabel Marfield sang with great success at a concert in Buffalo, N. Y. Joseph H. Morrison has been engaged to sing the tenor part in the quartet in the production of "Life" at the Manhattan Opera House, New York. Norma Weber sang with success at a concert in Bridgeport, Conn., November 4. She received fine notices in the Bridgeport Morning Telegram and Standard. Jean Cooper sang with great success at the recital given by Manuel Quiroga at the Shubert Theatre, New York, October 30. Lalla Bright Cannon sang at a concert under the direction of the People's Institute, November 6.

Mr. Klibansky gave the first of his pupils' recitals this season, November 16, in the new Chickering Hall, New York.

Tuesday Salon Announcement.

Mrs. Ansom D. Bramhall announces the opening of the Tuesday Salon, to take place in the grand ballroom of Sherry's, New York, on Tuesday afternoon, December 1, at 3 p. m. The artists who will appear at the first musicale are Mabel Garrison, soprano, of the Metropolitan Opera Company; George Dostal, tenor; Lucile Orrell, cellist; Manfred Malkin, pianist; Emil J. Polak, accompanist. Among the artists who will be heard later in the season are Frances Alda, soprano; Margaret Keyes, contralto; Marie Rappold, soprano; Louis Siegel, violinist, and others.

A special unique feature of the salon is the seating of the guests around small tables. After the program is rendered tea is served, thus insuring both comfort and privacy.

Vida Llewellyn Plays.

After many European appearances which established her reputation abroad as one of the gifted young women pianists of the day, Vida Llewellyn effected her New York debut last Saturday afternoon, November 14, at Aeolian Hall, and played a program consisting of the Bach-Tausig toccata and fugue in D minor, Beethoven's andante in F, Brahms' B minor capriccio, intermezzo (op. 117, No. 2), Schumann's "Carnival," Richard Strauss' "Stimmungsbilder," a met of three pieces, Hugo Kaun's intermezzo, op. 93, No. 5, and "Waldesgespräche," op. 78, No. 4, and Emil Sauer's "Echo de Vienne."

Miss Llewellyn showed independence and originality in the makeup of her program, for not only did it include no Beethoven sonata, no Chopin group, and no Liszt representation, but also it brought forward Strauss and Kaun in their not too familiar guise as piano writers, and gave us one of the very brilliant and melodious Sauer numbers, which figure all too rarely in the repertoire of pianists who seek a substitute for the Liszt rhapsodies and "Blue Danube" transcriptions as a program conclusion.

Tall and graceful, Miss Llewellyn's attractive presence is made even more welcome by unaffected stage deportment. She treats her art with dignity and seriousness. There is quiet confidence but no cocksureness in her bearing.

Her performance of the Bach music was direct, clear, musical, even though the artist palpably was exceedingly nervous. She had full control of herself, however, in the Beethoven andante, and delivered it with authority, refined sentiment, and much grace in its lighter measures.

Schumann's "Carnival" is not a surface composition in spite of its festive name, and Miss Llewellyn knew how to find its varied poetical and musical meanings. She encompassed its technical difficulties easily and in the mood transitions from gay to grave, from sentimental to dramatic proved that she regards the keyboard not merely as the source of pleasing sounds, but also as an eloquent interpretative medium.

In the Strauss and Kaun pieces, as well as in Schumann and Brahms, Miss Llewellyn's tone showed itself to be voluminous and flexible. The closing number gave full range to the player's fleetness of finger and lightness of wrist, and she made the work a most effective windup to a concert which the audience enjoyed unceasingly, to judge by the applause that rewarded Miss Llewellyn's efforts all afternoon.

Alfreda Beatty, Lyric Soprano.

Alfreda Beatty, lyric soprano, who has been listed recently with Antonia Sawyer and who is now available for concert and recital, has just returned from Europe after a number of years of serious study. She possesses everything which should make for success, a beautiful voice thoroughly trained, musicianship, and above all things, an unusually attractive and appealing personality.

Miss Beatty is a Philadelphian by birth and began her musical study with the violin. She was a student of Darlington Seminary, West Chester, Pa., from which she was graduated in voice and piano. While there she sang in several churches, and at many social affairs. She studied piano with Ellis Clark Hammann, the Philadelphia teacher. She appeared also a number of times as Flora in "The Lost Prince," an opera by Phillip Goepp, whose name is well known to the musical world for his compositions and also for his explanatory notes on symphonic works.

Just before leaving for Europe, Miss Beatty gave a recital at Magnolia, Mass. After spending several months in travel abroad, she settled in Berlin, where she studied for five years with Etelka Gerster, Louis Bachner and Frank King Clark. She sang at various social affairs and also at an important musicalc given by the Baroness von Schilling at her home in Breslau, at which many important personages were present. Miss Beatty was to make her regular professional European debut this season, everything having been arranged for her to appear at Breslau. She also had a number of engagements for various parts of Germany as well as England, but like many others, her European career was cut short by the war. It is safe to predict a satisfactory career for this brilliant young soprano.

Zoellner Quartet Bookings.

The Zoellner Quartet will appear in a Boston recital on the evening of December 3, at Steinert Hall. It will play the "Romantische Serenade," op. 25, J. Brandts-Buys; quartet, op. 18, No. 2, Beethoven; quartet in D, Gustav Samazeuilk.

This is said to mark the first performance of the Samazeuilk work in America. Mr. Samazeuilk is a native of Bordeaux, but now lives in Paris. Aside from his fast growing distinction as a composer, he is also music critic for the Republique Francaise, Paris.

On January 1, the Zoellners will play again in Boston for the Harvard Association.

Before the quartet fill these Boston engagements, they are to play in Quebec and Montreal, Can., November 25 and 26. The novelty at these Canadian recitals will be the "Romantische Serenade," op. 25, by J. Brandts-Buys.

Lucy Gates in New York.

Lucy Gates, the coloratura soprano, with four years of grand opera experience in Berlin and Cassel to her credit, is now in New York. She was on her way back to Cassel to complete the final two years of her contract there when she was caught in London and could not get back to Germany, and therefore returned to America.

Copies of the cablegram and telegram asking Miss Gates to return to the Cassel Opera on a provisional half salary are given herewith:

[Cablegram.]
From Vlissingen, Germany.

Lucy Gates, 64 West 127th Street, New York:

Bylandt requests immediate return. Opera opened. Provisional salary for all reduced to three thousand six hundred. Cable us your departure. ZEELAND.

[Telegram from Washington, following cable from Frankfurt, Germany.]

Emma Lucy Gates, 64 West 127th Street, New York:

Consul Frankfurt cables Cassel Opera Company will reopen and you are expected back. J. D. VAN WAGONER, Secretary Senator Smoot.

Miss Gates preferred, however, not to return, choosing to try her lot in America, firmly believing, as she tersely states, that "there is always room for those who can do."

Twelve years ago Miss Gates went to Germany to study piano. She then discovered that she had a voice and returned to New York to study for concert work, as her parents objected seriously to her considering an operatic career. It was not long before she was able to overcome parental objection, as she herself told the writer:

"My parents found that conditions had changed in regard to women in the last fifty years, as they have changed all over the world in business for women, and that there was no reason why a girl properly chaperoned and with strong enough character should not work in opera as well as in business or politics. Finally with the entire consent of my family I returned to Germany with my brother to prepare for opera, for Mme. Sembrich had advised me that Germany was the only country where a girl could get operatic experience under satisfactory conditions. I was studying with Corelli there."

Miss Gates, from the standpoint of a successful coloratura soprano, speaks of how formerly coloratura was introduced into vocal scores with a purpose.

"Today," she affirms, "coloratura is introduced more to show off the voice than anything else." The coloratura of Mozart and Verdi can be produced as effectively as the cadenza of a violin; it should and can be done with soul."

In regard to her immediate future Miss Gates, who, by the way, is a young woman of an exceedingly interesting and convincing personality, attractively combining the breeziness of her native Salt Lake City with the additional culture which comes from intimate contact with life in the Eastern United States and with European ideas and ideals, told the writer:

"My plan is to work here in America, in New York, and prepare for future concert and recital programs until the operatic field opens up to me again."

"Are you pro-German?"

"I used to be until my wife forced me to take her to all the Wagner operas."

Granberry Piano School Schedule.

The following is a schedule of lectures, concerts and recitals which are being given at the Granberry Piano School of New York and Brooklyn, during the month of November:

Wednesday, November 4, at 10.30 o'clock, Methods-Lecture, "Rhythm" (continued), Mr. Granberry.

Saturday, November 7, at 11 o'clock, History of Music, Dr. Elsenheimer.

Saturday, November 7, at 12 o'clock, Musical Analysis, "The Sixth Chord," Part I, Mr. Granberry.

Wednesday, November 11, at 10.30 o'clock, Methods-Lecture, "The Art of Fingering Easy Pieces," Mr. Granberry.

Saturday, November 14, at 11 o'clock, Interpretation Lecture-Recital, Dr. Elsenheimer, with this program: Prelude and fugue in D major, from "Well-tempered Clavichord," Bach; sonata in E minor, op. 90, Beethoven; "Children's Corner," Debussy.

Saturday, November 14, at 12 o'clock, History of Music, Dr. Elsenheimer.

Wednesday, November 25, at 10.30 o'clock, Methods-Lecture, "Elementary Hand Culture," Mr. Granberry.

Saturday, November 21, at 11 o'clock, History of Music, Dr. Elsenheimer.

Saturday, November 21, at 12 o'clock, private recital in the lecture room of the school.

Wednesday, November 25, at 10.30 o'clock, Methods-Lecture, "Formation of the Major and Minor Scales," Mr. Granberry.

Saturday, November 28, at 11 o'clock, History of Music, Dr. Elsenheimer.

Saturday, November 28, at 12 o'clock, Musical Analysis, "The Neapolitan Sixth Chord," Part II, Mr. Granberry.

Director George Folsom Granberry promises an equal number of interesting events for the remainder of the season.

Houston Treble Clef Club Concert.

November 5 ushered in the first concert of one of Houston's best singing clubs. The ladies, under the able direction of Julien Paul Blitz, have made rapid progress in ensemble singing. Two of their best efforts were "Stars of the Summer Night" and "Fly, Singing Bird, Fly!" Both are by Elgar, and each number was repeated as an encore.

A very attractive cello quartet was well played by Julien Blitz, Patricio Gutierrez, William Hess and Otto Miller. Sam T. Swinford, one of the best local accompanists, gave perfect support. Mr. Gutierrez also proved himself a fine accompanist in the solo singing of Arturo Lugaro, who gave the prologue from "Pagliacci," a Neapolitan folksong, "Funiculi, Funicula," and Largo al Factotum" from "The Barber of Seville."

The concert on the whole was excellent, and the audience was both interesting and large. Mr. Lugaro made a big hit. Mr. Blitz and Mr. Swinordf also came in for their share of the honors. EMMET LENNON.

LOS ANGELES DEDICATES TRINITY AUDITORIUM.

Brilliant Concert Marks Opening of New Hall—People's Orchestra Revived—Other Happenings.

1110 West Washington Street,
Los Angeles, Cal., October 24, 1914.

Wednesday evening, October 21, was a gala night for the music lovers of Los Angeles, as it marked the opening of the new Trinity Auditorium, and served to open the season for the Philharmonic Courses with a recital by Olive Fremstad. The evening was an unqualified success in every particular. The new auditorium is the equal if not the superior of the old, and the beauty of the room and a certain intimacy about it, make it even more desirable as a recital or chamber concert hall. The performer is brought closer to the audience and the acoustics seem faultless.

Mme. Fremstad was in magnificent voice, and the program was an unalloyed joy from every standpoint. Manager L. E. Behymer deserves the thanks of every music lover for providing so great a treat. An integral part of the successful evening were the accompaniments of George F. W. Bruhns. Of the matchless program it is hard to speak in particular, but the group of folk songs was perhaps in many ways the most remarkable, because it is so rare to find a dramatic artist with the utter simplicity and faultless art required properly to interpret a genuine folk song.

The audience that filled the house augurs well for the success of the local musical season.

LEBEGOTT REVIVES THE PEOPLE'S ORCHESTRA.

Eduardo Lebegott has again gathered together an orchestra for the purpose of giving popular concerts. It will be called the Lebegott Orchestra and is the successor to the old People's Orchestra. His opening concert occurred on Sunday, October 18, in the Temple Auditorium to a very good audience. Mr. Lebegott is endeavoring to supply good music at a nominal price, and hundreds of season tickets already have been sold at $2.50 for the season of ten concerts, which will be given every other Sunday.

Robert Alter, the cellist, is manager of the new enterprise, and many of the most prominent local musicians are represented on the musical committee and directorate. Considering some confusion attendant upon the opening concert, the program presented was remarkably good. The principal number was the C minor concerto of Beethoven, beautifully played by M. Raoul Laparra, who also conducted the overture to his opera "La Habanera." This opera was first presented in 1908 at the Opera Comique, Paris, and has been given successfully in many of the large music centers of Europe, also in Boston.

The Festival Chorus assisted in the "Missa Solemnis," of Beethoven, the "Kyria Eleison" being given. They also appeared in the closing numbers, the song and chorus of the vaqueros from "Natoma," by Victor Herbert, and the waltz from "Faust."

THE BECKERS RETURN TO THE CONCERT PLATFORM.

It will be of much interest to the public to learn that Mr. and Mrs. Thilo Becker again will appear in concert this season, after an absence of some time. They will appear with the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra at the Beethoven Festival, and will also give two recitals.

IN SAN DIEGO.

Mrs. Gertrude Ross and Grace Widney Mabee gave an interesting program before the Music Teachers' Association of San Diego, October 19. JANE CATHERWOOD.

Rubinstein Club's First Musicale.

On Saturday afternoon, November 21, in the Grand Ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, will be given the first musicale of the twenty-eighth season of the Rubinstein Club, Mrs. William Rogers Chapman, president. The artists will be Alice Sovereign, contralto; Cuyler Black, tenor, and Albert Spalding, violinist.

Alexander Bloch's Busy Season.

Alexander Bloch, the talented young violinist, played at the Red Cross Relief Fund concert at Bloomfield, N. J., on November 9. Thursday, November 12, he played for the assembly at the Ethical Culture School, New York. Today, November 18, he is to play at a big Belgian Relief Fund concert at Kingston, Canada.

George Hamlin's Recital.

George Hamlin, the American tenor, will give a song recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, Wednesday afternoon, December 9.

Adele Krueger Assists War Sufferers.

Adele Krueger, the soprano, sang at the special concerts given at Carnegie Hall, New York, October 27 and 28, by the New York Staats-Zeitung, for the benefit of the German Red Cross Society. Immense audiences attended both concerts, and much enthusiasm was shown for the singing of Mme. Krueger. Her numbers were "Morning Hymn," by Henschel; "Wenn es der König wär," by Schumann; "Neue Liebe," by Rubinstein; "Zueignung," by Richard Strauss, and "Heimweh," by Hugo Wolf.

Saturday evening, November 14, Mme. Krueger and the Bruchhausen Trio gave a concert at the Parish House of the German Lutheran Evangelical Church, at Stapleton, Staten Island, for the benefit of the German and Austrian war sufferers in America. The receipts of this concert will be distributed among the German and Austrian seamen, whom the war has deprived of earning a livelihood.

Other concerts in which Mme. Krueger has been heard this autumn, included one given by St. Peter's Church, Lexington avenue and Fifty-fourth street, New York, October 29, and another by the German Club, of Staten Island, on November 4. "Im Herbst," by Franz; "Der Spielman," by Hernberger; "Wiegenlied," by Grieg, and "Neue Liebe," by Rubinstein, comprised one group sung on this occasion.

November 25, Mme. Kruegcr is to be the soloist at the concert of the Arion Society, of Jersey City; November 27 she will assist at the concert in aid of St. Mark's Hospital, to take place at the Waldorf-Astoria.

The concert at Stapleton on November 14 was arranged by Mme. Krueger. Besides singing and working up the interest in the affair, the singer succeded in securing a number of generous contributions of money and clothing for the men kept in idleness by the silent vessels in the docks of New York harbor.

Mrs. Phillips-Jenkins' Operatic Pupils.

Among thosc Philadelphia teachers, whose pupils have met with marked success in opera, Mrs. Phillips-Jenkins may be classed. Among these pupils may be mentioned Vivienne Segal, who, in the role of Carmen in the recent production of the opera of that name by the Philadelphia Operatic Society, made a deep impression; Adele Hassan, soprano, who was the Frasquita of the same performance; Kathryn McGinley, soprano, who appeared as Saffi in the "Gipsy Baron" in 1914 and as Arline in "The Bohemian Girl" in 1913; Barbara Schaefer, contralto, as Nancy in "Martha"; Helma Fritz, who was the Frasquita in the 1911 production of "Carmen"; Alice Glassmire, who was heard as Micaela in "Carmen," and Edith Rice, who appeared in 1908 as Marguerite in "Faust."

Miss Schaeffer has been engaged by Andreas Dippel for his opera company this season. Miss Rice, who is now Mrs. Silence, is one of the most prominent teachers of singing in the South, and is president of the Melody Club, of Norfolk, Va.

Meridian Conservatory Faculty Recital.

A faculty recital will be given at the Meridian Auditorium, Meridian, Miss., November 28. Dr. Marvin Beeson, violinist, who returned recently after four years of study in Europe, will appear. Also Dr. Lord, organist, who came from England in August. Liszt's polonaise in E major will be played by Miss Ridgell and Ellen Siddall will sing the Micaela aria from "Carmen."

Montreal, Canada, is trying to start a symphony orchestra.—Exchange.

C. A. Ellis, of Boston, is in receipt of a cable from Fritz Kreisler to the effect that the violinist sailed November 14 from Rotterdam on the steamship Rotterdam, which is due at New York, November 23.

The scheme of Oscar Hammerstein to juxtapose grand opera with moving pictures passed away quietly at his Lexington Avenue Opera House last week, when that edifice announced its temporary closing. Next, Oscar!

About $75,000 paid in by the Boston Opera subscribers of this season will be refunded by Eben D. Jordan, of that city, the founder of the organization. In all, the subscription for 1914-1915 promised to be $300,000.

Patti's recent concert at Albert Hall, London, for the benefit of the Red Cross, resulted in large receipts and a wonderful tribute of affection for the singer on the part of the huge audience. Both the King and Queen were present and joined in the demonstration.

Who said war? What with the Metropolitan Opera in action, the Stock Exchange to open soon, the improvement in the cotton situation, and the reawakened optimism of our entire nation, the European conflict, even while it distresses this country, no longer has the power to cripple its ambition or to impede its progress.

To judge by the list of those who occupied boxes at the Metropolitan Opera opening last Monday evening, the closing of the stock exchange and the recent business uncertainty in this country seem to have had no effect on the expenditure available for the favorite pastime of fashionable folk, to see and be seen at the Opera. No falling off in receipts is expected this season at the Metropolitan.

After his arrival in Chicago last week Cleofonte Campanini called on the daily papers of that city and informed them that he is preparing his plans for an operatic season there in 1915-1916. He hopes, he said, that the Chicago Opera will lengthen its present ten week series to twelve weeks, and omit all traveling, as the large deficit last spring was contracted entirely while the company was on tour.

A correspondent writes: "I read with interest what you published last week about the Tribune critic and his cavalier remarks on the subject of musical 'small fry.' I have an idea that when he said 'small fry' he meant American players, singers, and composers. What do you think?" The truth is that we have more important matters to think about than what the Tribune critic means, but we should not be surprised if our correspondent were right.

A practical suggestion has been made in London by Hermann Klein, the well known vocal pedagogue and critic (formerly a dweller in New York), whereby some of the distress of the English singers and orchestral players might be alleviated in part. Mr. Klein's plan is that a joint season of English opera be given by the Covent Garden syndicate and Sir Joseph Beecham, at Covent Garden. As Mr. Klein observes: "Such a season would give work to a very large number of artists and other employees, and as all would probably be willing to accept very moderate rates of pay, there is no reason why at the cheap prices which would thereby be rendered possible it should not be well supported." London Truth supports Mr. Klein's suggestion heartily and says: "In Berlin, it may be noted, the opera season is continuing despite the war just as usual. If there, why not here?" Apropos, the London Philharmonic Society is proceeding with its regular concerts, but is paying its members greatly reduced salaries on the understanding that the deficiency is made up as far as possible by a bonus out of the funds available at the end of the season. Truth adds the interesting information that during both the Waterloo and Crimean campaigns "the Philharmonic Society kept its flag flying."

St. Louis is in the throes of grand opera, for last week the San Carlo Opera Company opened its season there under the management of the St. Louis Grand Opera Committee. The occasion is reported to have been successful in every way and the performances following the premiere drew crowds as large as that which attended the opening night. The season is to last two weeks and includes "Rigoletto," "Traviata," "Tales of Hoffmann," "Carmen," "Lucia," "Martha," "Cavalleria," "I Pagliacci," "Aida," "Barber of Seville," "Masked Ball," "Trovatore."

Reports have trickled into this country that Willem Mengelberg, the Amsterdam conductor, is not dead, as announced some weeks ago, but is recovering from the serious results of an accidental fall. In these days it is difficult to count with certainty upon any kind of cable service, and as the MUSICAL COURIER despatch to Amsterdam regarding the Mengelberg matter remains unanswered, there is no way to determine whether the previous information regarding the conductor was true or not. As soon as definite news concerning Mengelberg comes out of Amsterdam, the MUSICAL COURIER will no doubt be the first American newspaper to have it. At the present moment there seems to be no reason to doubt that Mengelberg at least was badly injured.

After the recent "American Concert" by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which took place on the evening of Monday, November 2, George Hamlin was so impressed with the response of the public to the cause of native music that he offered a prize of $200 for a grand aria for tenor and orchestra. The composer must be American, that is, a citizen of this country; the text must be an original English text, not a translation; and the composition must be of such dimensions that it is distinctly removed from the song class and unmistakably in aria form. It is Mr. Hamlin's intention to sing the work for the first time at the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's first "American Concert" in the fall of 1915. The composition should be submitted to Glenn Dillard Gunn, 421 Fine Arts Building, Chicago, not later than June 1, 1915.

Some day somebody or other will establish definitely whether or not the Brahms piano concerto in D minor really deserves a permanent place in the literature of the piano. First performed in public in 1859 (by the composer, in Hanover), fifty-five years later, in 1914, music critics still are busy trying to establish the exact place the D minor concerto ought to occupy. Some of the authorities tell us that the piece is noble, inspired; others insist that it is barren, lacking in ideas. Pianists as a rule dislike this much discussed Brahms composition, Harold Bauer being the only one who appears to be willing to give it frequent public hearing. He played it here in masterful fashion last week, and the listeners applauded heartily, but while we know that they were enthusiastic about the pianist, considerable doubt must exist as to the degree of affection felt by them for the concerto. Fifty-five years constitutes a long test for a composition. It is safe to say that the much discussed Brahms piece hardly will become better liked as time goes on, and certainly never popular.

HUMOR IN MUSIC.

Composers sometimes write humoresques, or humoresks, or indicate that a certain work is to be played "with humor."

Strictly speaking, music cannot express humor or wit. No doubt the expression "with humor" helps the performer to play with lightness, and with spirit, and to make his performance pleasing to his hearers. But it is inconceivable that any performer could make an audience roar with laughter or even smile at the humor of a musical passage. If there are smiles, they are smiles of pleasure. We smile when a baby laughs, but our smile is not because of the humor or wit of the baby. It is a sympathetic smile of pleasure only. The nearest approach to humor are the grotesque sounds and odd phrases to be found here and there in orchestral works—such as the low bassoon note in Haydn's "Creation," the dialogue between the clarinet and bassoon in Beethoven's eighth symphony, Mendelssohn's "donkey effects" in "Midsummer Night's Dream," the oboe imitation of chanticleer in Saint-Saëns' "Dance Macabre," the shrill caprices of the clarinet in Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel."

If some readers insist that these passages express genuine musical humor we will not dispute the question with them. The fact remains, nevertheless, that humor in music is a very exceptional quality, even if it is present at all.

Wit and humor are founded on logic. A mind that is devoid of logic is devoid of humor, we are told by writers who profess to understand the working of the human mind. It is certain that neither wit nor logic is a marked characteristic of the feminine mind in literature. With the absence of wit we find the absence of convincing logic in feminine writers as a class. It is therefore not improbable that the absence of the logical faculty in a man also implies a lack of wit.

But how can music be convincingly logical? What could that wittiest of all authors, Voltaire, express in music? If he had the musical genius of a Beethoven he could express no more humor in music than Beethoven has expressed. In other words, his wit and his logic would have to be read between the lines, because the lines themselves are unable to express them. In our opinion Beethoven's eighth symphony passage is not actually humorous in itself, though it suggests that Beethoven possessed a real sense of humor which he might have expressed clearly through another medium, such as literature or painting.

Music is supreme among the arts in the expression of emotion. The scientific side of music is far more like mathematics than like logic. Music must perforce seek to express that which it is capable of expressing better than any other art can express. There are certain sentiments which are common to poetry, music and painting. Painting can express not only comedy but the most ludicrous scenes. Poetry can relate history and be humorous, comic, logical, serious, sentimental, heroic, tragic, sublime.

But music has an emotional appeal beyond all other arts. It can express pleasure, cheerfulness, gaiety, longing, earnestness and other states of feeling. But it cannot portray broad comedy, or history, or be logical, or humorous except in a very restricted way.

A composer can express humor in music only about to the same extent that a poet can express beautiful sound by means of words. The words suggest beautiful objects or glowing fancies, but are actually beautiful in sound only in a secondary degree. In the same way, humor is a secondary quality in music.

A COMPLIMENT.

Of Frederick Stock's C minor symphony, Ferruccio Busoni said recently: "I have heard no other contemporary symphonic work that contains more novel ideas or greater profundity of thought. I had planned to produce the symphony this season under my direction at Bologna and Milan."

"ATMOSPHERE" ANALYZED.

At last an American musician who has won success both here and abroad comes out plainly in favor of musical and artistic atmosphere. In the following interview, which appeared on November 1 in the Duluth News Tribune, Oscar Seagle gives his views, and these views are so filled with ordinary common sense that they are here quoted in full. Mr. Seagle says:

"The desired musical supremacy which has been claimed for America is now achievable owing to the deplorable state of Europe; a condition that has driven both American and foreign musicians to these shores, and has forced the return of hundreds of American students. If the presence of scores of teachers, and thousands of students, together with the quantity of concerts make for musical supremacy, then the title is won, but there is an important factor too often overlooked. It is not the quality of the concerts, nor the ability of the American teacher, nor is it the capacity of the students. It is the attitude of the students, which, unfortunately, so faithfully reflects the attitude of the public.

"Of course, that thing called artistic atmosphere is at present smashed beyond hope of immediate recovery in Europe, therefore America will have to supply all that is available this year. It is almost tragic that artistic atmosphere cannot be manufactured and delivered by the short order method, for then America would be able to supply instantly what is necessary to place her emphatically to the fore.

"As long as the average American holds music as only a woman's work, just so long will we fail to attain the desired end. This view works an injustice to woman, man and music. By thrusting music from the vital activities of life, and regarding it only as a decorative art to be toyed with by women, one of the most wholesome and refining influences of modern times is denied its place. It is a man's profession, a man with the reddest of blood, too, but the average man would as soon see his son learn to embroider, as to study music. He looks upon the great musicians as freaks, and is quite willing to hear any famous freak once, never twice.

"Until there comes into the American home the realization that there are a number of worth while things in this life that money cannot solve, we will not have much musical atmosphere, therefore we cannot achieve musical supremacy. To attain this spirit, and to place our imprint upon art, in this, the year of our greatest opportunity, we must be honest with ourselves, we must refuse to pose, and refuse to permit those near us to pose."

MUSICAL GUIDING.

The English composer, Percy Grainger, has followed the custom—originated, if we are not mistaken, by the late Edward MacDowell—of writing the time and expression marks in his compositions in English instead of in the customary Italian; only Grainger is much more ambitious than was MacDowell and occasionally gives us quite lengthy explanatory essays which, truth to tell, sound more ridiculous than practicable.

We offer below a few little suggestions in this line, calculated to be so distinctly expressed that no artist can fail exactly to interpret the composer's wishes if he faithfully follows them out, and, in our unselfish way, we place them without reserve at the service of Mr. Grainger or of any other composer who may care to use them:

For a dramatic passage in an orchestral work with much strings, tremolando; "nervously; suggesting the movements of wine-jelly which has just been turned out of the mold onto a dish."

Andante con moto sentimento; "in the manner of topping-off with fresh pumpkin pie, which has been preceded in the course of a long dinner by more other food than really necessary."

For a passage to be played on the violin entirely in harmonics; "with tone suggestive of biting into a lemon."

Poco a poco rall. e dim.; "like a two-ounce lump of butter deposited in the mathematical center of a luke-warm six-inch frying pan."

Et cetera ad libitum.

THOROUGH VOCAL ART.

Among the abiding joys of a New York musical season is the singing of Johanna Gadski, who not only shines each winter as one of the leading exponents of the big soprano roles in the German and Italian repertoire at the Metropolitan, but also gives an annual recital or two here and interprets for us the masterpieces of classical and modern song composers in such masterful fashion as to have won a place among the greatest lied interpreters known to the public and critics of this city.

At Carnegie Hall last Wednesday afternoon, November 11, a tremendous attendance which overflowed onto the stage, where many extra seats had to be placed, testified to the fact that New York's music loving public concurs in the opinion set down in the previous paragraph about the nature and importance of Mme. Gadski's vocal art. Such enthusiasm rarely has been experienced here as that showered upon the popular artist, who is in a sense a product of New York, because it was in our town that she scored her first significant successes and it was at the Metropolitan that she began that larger career which was destined to carry her fame into every corner of the globe where the singing art is practised and patronized.

Mme Gadski never has sung better in our concert halls than last Wednesday, her voice sounding fresh and full and her resources in the departments of tonal modulation and text interpretation appearing to be practically limitless. It has become customary to say that her long operatic experience stands her in good stead when it comes to exploiting dramatic moments in her singing of songs, but such a criticism does not quite do Mme. Gadski justice, for she is as effective in the purely musical moments of a lied as in its "program," and displays a wealth of nuance and tonal application which as a rule are not in the regular equipment of an operatic performer. Rather Mme. Gadski relies not at all upon the technic she has acquired on the boards, but calls to her aid the results of the thorough studies made by her in the realm of lieder singing and the now wide experience enjoyed by her in that field.

Finer exposition of deep sentiment, suiting of vocal color to the various moods required, and adaptability of the mechanical technics of the voice could hardly be conceived than the artist exhibited in her opening group, Schumann's "Widmung," "Stille Thränen," "Wenn ich früh in den Garden geh,'" "Mondnacht" and "Frühlingsnacht." Schubert was represented by "Der Neugierige," "Litanei," "Who Is Sylvia?" "Nachtstück" and "Hark, Hark, the Lark!" Here, too, Mme. Gadski touched the well-springs of feeling in heart stirring manner, and yet in the gayer episodes she moved the lighter fancies of her audience irresistibly when certain passages of "Who Is Sylvia?" and "Hark, Hark, the Lark," called for qualities of archness and even humor.

Franz's "Für Musik" was a flawless piece of lieder singing. His less known "Willkommen mein Wald" and the familiar "Es hat die Rose sich beklagt" also had appealing interpretations. One of the grandiose readings was that of Brahms' "Von Ewiger Liebe," delivered with intense emotion and remarkable musical understanding. The same composer's "Wiegenlied" and "Meine Liebe ist grün" formed a trio of irresistible attraction. Wolf's "In dem Schatten deiner Locken," Mendelssohn's "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges" and Strauss' "Die Nacht" and "Ständchen" completed a program of unusual strength and one that constituted a glorious reminder of the inestimable debt under which Germany has placed the rest of the world by supplying it with the greatest song composers and the greatest songs.

Mme. Gadski received a typical ovation consisting of vociferous applause, mountains of flowers and encores galore. She truly is what the Germans call "an artist by the grace of God."

ON ADVERTISING.

Two hundred and four years ago Joseph Addison, a famous essayist, poet and dramatist, wrote an article on "Advertising," which was published in "The Tatler" on Thursday, September 14, 1710.

We intend to supplement that article with another on the same subject, even though we fail to reach the Addisonian literary level.

Addison begins by saying:

"It is my custom, in a dearth of news, to entertain myself with those collections of advertisements that appear at the end of all our public prints."

A little farther on he reflects that: "An advertisement from Piccadilly goes down to posterity with an article from Madrid, and John Bartlett of Goodman's-fields is celebrated in the same paper with the Emperor of Germany."

In the middle of the article we are told: "The great art in writing advertisements is the finding out a proper method to catch the reader's eye, without which a good thing may pass over unobserved."

The sum and substance of the article are: (a) advertisements are read, (b) an advertisement has a more enduring value when it appears among important articles, (c) the advertisements must have something in them to catch the reader's eye.

Let us see if Addison was right. John McCormack, Leonard Borwick and Paul Dufault recently advertised in the MUSICAL COURIER. Their advertisements were read and criticized in Australia, which happy land is about as far away from New York as the spherical formation of the earth will permit. We assume that those advertisements were also read in several localities nearer home.

Modesty forbids us to say much about the value of the editorials, which are intended to give weight and importance to the newspaper in which our readers are invited to advertise. If our editorials, paragraphs and world-wide concert and opera reports were of no value they would not be so frequently reprinted by other newspapers of all kinds.

John McCormack, Leonard Borwick and Paul Dufault sent us a number of criticisms clipped from the newspapers of Australia which we deemed sufficiently attractive for the eyes of our readers. It is evident that the reprinted criticisms were read, because we have found a comment on them in the Theatre Magazine of Sydney, Australia. But the writer of that comment seems to be under the impression that it is not quite the right thing to do for musical artists to let the world know what they are doing. He imported that idea from England, if he is not an Englishman himself.

Australia, of all the colonies of the British Empire, is the most English in manners and customs. Canada has a large French population and is a very near neighbor of the United States. South Africa has a powerful Dutch population. India, of course, had a civilization of its own while England was still being referred to by Horace and Catullus as the "horrible and remote Britain." But Australia has no powerful neighbor and no mixed population. It is English to a degree unknown outside of England itself. Knowing this, we are able intelligently to judge the Australian who wrote in the Sydney Theatre Magazine that "John McCormack, Leonard Borwick and Paul Dufault are among the recent artists in this country who are publishing Australian criticisms on their own appearances in the MUSICAL COURIER (New York) with 'advt.' at the end, denoting that they are paid at so much per inch."

The rousing reception given to our sailors during the recent visit of the American fleet to Australia makes us believe that the Australians have friendly feelings for us. We can hardly believe that the critic was sneering either at us or at the three artists who, with a great many celebrated artists of all lands, advertise in the MUSICAL COURIER. It is just possible that our Antipodean fellow journalist was expressing his satisfaction in finding that famous artists considered Australian criticisms important enough to reprint in America at considerable expense.

But our impression is that the Australian critic looks with an English eye upon advertising and thinks it beneath the dignity of a musical artist, or any other professional man. If he has such an idea in his head we counsel him to expel it, for it is erroneous.

In our opinion English professional men are just as pleased as anybody else to get their names into the newspapers. But to be strictly correct and in good form, many English and other professionals often seem to think that the notice in the paper must be put in by some one else and not be paid for.

We confess that it takes a subtler intellect than we possess to understand why it is improper for an artist to collect his free notices and then pay another paper to reprint some of them. We have written columns of free notices and reviews of concerts by John McCormack, Leonard Borwick and Paul Dufault. Would it be contrary to the laws of professional ethics for those artists to take our free notices to the editor of the Sydney Theatre Magazine and say: "Will you reprint these for us? We are glad that the MUSICAL COURIER speaks so well of us, but of course we cannot expect you to keep your paper running by reprinting foreign notices without being paid for doing so."

Strange as it may seem to some of our English and Australian friends, we believe that it would be wrong not to pay a newspaper to advertise us. We are not at all in accord with the ancient Spartan doctrine that it is right to steal but wrong to be found out.

We have met musicians who think it is undignified to advertise at all. They consider it too commercial and altogether unprofessional. We feel certain that they have hardly given this matter any serious thought. They are evidently governed by their feelings..

They maintain that an artist should become known through his work and by what other people say about him, but that it is unprofessional to pay a newspaper to help make known quickly that which otherwise could only be known slowly. If the London Times gave Leonard Borwick a paragraph in praise of his recital in the Queen's Hall no one would deem it unprofessional on the part of the pianist to buy a copy of the Times and send it to America or Australia. If it was right to buy one copy, it would be right to buy a thousand. And after he had bought a thousand copies, marked them and mailed them, how much would he have spent on advertising himself? Far more in actual money than it would have cost to pay the MUSICAL COURIER to reprint the Times paragraph. In addition, the valuable time of a great artist would be wasted in a work that any boy can do. Moreover, the thousand copies of the Times would not reach anywhere near as many readers as the reprint in the MUSICAL COURIER would.

And, finally, if it is improper for an artist to pay a newspaper to reprint what other newspapers have said about him, why is it right and proper for the same artist to spend, or cause to be spent, hundreds of dollars in the newspapers and for posters inviting the public to come and hear him play or sing at a certain concert hall on a given date? What about that very commercial and mercenary and unprofessional price per ticket at the end of the advertisement?

Let us be logical rather than sentimental in this matter. Let us recognize that it would be utterly foolish for an artist not to give publicity to his forthcoming recital, and about as equally foolish not to let the solicited public know what the artist had to offer in return for the money the public was requested to spend. Either advertise the artist and advertise the concert, or do not advertise the artist and do not advertise the concert.

It is necessary to take into consideration the customs of the country in which the advertising is done. The public of our time is accustomed to the advertising of everything. It is in no sense of the word unprofessional for an artist to advertise in America. Our judges, clergymen, statesmen, even our Secretary of State, advertise when they are to appear before the general public. We are a practical people. We think it far more unprofessional to give a recital to a handful of auditors than to a crowded auditorium. And if the reprinting of honest and unpurchased praise from a foreign newspaper is going to help fill the concert room, we think it is the only right thing to do for an artist who has his reputation as a public attraction to consider.

If there are aristocratic amateurs and dilettanti who consider it more dignified to achieve doubtful artistic success in empty concert rooms than it is to advertise as the great artists, including Beethoven, have done, we hope we have said nothing to disturb their pleasant dream.

But so long as John McCormack, Leonard Borwick, Paul Dufault and a host of other famous artists of international renown continue to use the columns of the MUSICAL COURIER for advertising purposes we shall go on our way, unmindful of the well meant but injudicious jibe of our Sydney critic on the far shore of the broad Pacific.

A NEW VIOLINIST.

When Arrigo Serato is referred to as a "new" violinist in these columns, the adjective applies specifically to New York's hearing of him, for MUSICAL COURIER's chroniclers from abroad have been telling the American public in these pages year in and year out how important a role Serato plays in the concert halls of Europe, where he is recognized as one of the leading exponents of the violin and its best music.

Last Sunday afternoon, November 15, the visitor made his local debut at the Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall, and played the Beethoven concerto in such fashion as to confirm amply all the good reports which had preceded his landing upon these shores. Serato is a player who strives for big effects on his instrument and achieves them brilliantly, without loss of artistic balance, without sensationalism, and without sacrificing the composer in order to superimpose the Serato personality. However, he regards his art as a dignified expression of his own musical feelings, and therefore gives the listener the impression that the performance never degenerates into merely mechanical reproduction or loses its vitality in the attempt to become objective. A glowing musical temperament, a warm, vibrant tone of large volume and much color variety, and the impressive degree of technical skill which all modern fiddlers of the first rank possess, stamp Serato as a notable addition to the eminent artists by whom New York has been wooed and conquered. Superb musicianship marked every measure of his rendering of the Beethoven concerto and his reverential attitude toward it differed materially from that of certain players who when they perform Beethoven appear to be doing him a favor. The quiet majesty of the first movement, the lofty sentiment of the second, and the bubbling humor of the finale had in Serato an exponent who understood the music perfectly and felt it sympathetically. He was received by the audience with every sign of respect and admiration.

The orchestra gave an uncommonly suave account of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and Grieg's "Elegiac Melodies," and put color, cleverness and dash into Weber's "Oberon" overture, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" and three excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

"How badly hurt by the war Switzerland is, though a neutral country," says Henry T. Finck in the New York Evening Post, "is indicated by the fact that the Zurich theatres are open for a season of two months only, while those of Bern and Basle remain closed."

LANGUAGE AND SONG.

When a violin is first put into the hands of a boy he will hold the instrument in any position that feels most natural and comfortable to the condition of his muscles and nerves.

If the boy could be given the special development of a violinist without ever touching a violin it is not unreasonable to believe that as soon as the instrument was given him he would find no trouble in holding it the correct way. It is not uncomfortable for a great violinist to hold his instrument correctly. Nor does a great pianist find anything unnatural in holding his hands over the keyboard in a way that no beginner ever happens to adopt. We hardly think that these statements will be contradicted. Yet there may be those who maybe will not altogether agree with us when we say that the difficulties which the tongue has in pronouncing the words of a foreign language are mostly muscular.

Let us imagine, for instance, that the languages on our earth are spoken by the tongue, that the languages on the moon are spoken by the teeth, and that the languages on Mars are spoken by the neck. It is probable that an inhabitant of Mars would find the languages of the moon absolutely unpronounceable, because it is impossible to make the neck do the work of the teeth. Of course, this example is exaggerated, but it is not as absurd as it may seem. In principle it is exactly what happens when we attempt to speak a foreign language with the muscles and nerves that are accustomed only to the sound formations of our own language, whatever that may be.

We know that all Germans speak English with a German accent, that all Frenchmen speak it with a French accent, and that all Italians speak it with an Italian accent.

By no possible chance would a Frenchman happen to speak English with a German or Italian accent. Nor would an Englishman ever happen to speak German with a French accent. Why? The only reasonable answer is that each language requires the special use of certain muscles and a special placing of each sound. This well known foreign accent is due entirely to the attempt to pronounce one language with the set of muscles and positions required for another language. Any one who has watched a child develop and has heard it struggle to pronounce words it understands but cannot quite utter, will be able to grasp the troubles we all have when we try to pronounce words which require a muscular control we have not yet developed.

It is a common expression that "only children can learn to speak a language without a foreign accent." We may say that only children can learn to hold a violin correctly and acquire a command of the keyboard. But we believe that, if properly taught, an adult could learn to pronounce foreign words without that distressing blemish we call a foreign accent. The trouble is that we will not abandon our familiar muscles and mouth formation when we try to speak a foreign accent. If, in order to speak French correctly, it was necessary to hold our knife in our left hand and our fork in our right, we should find that most of us, who are accustomed to hold our knife in our right hand and our fork in our left, would still go on trying to pronounce French with our knife and fork in their accustomed places, because at first we felt the other way to be awkward.

We try to pick up the sound by ear, forgetting, or unconscious that if we formed our mouth and tongue positions correctly the right sound would take care of itself. For instance, it is useless to try to pronounce the sound, Ah, if we drop our jaw and protrude our lips in the form of O. We are obliged to say Awe or oo. In the same way, we pronounce foreign words with a foreign accent simply because we form our mouth and lips incorrectly to produce the sound we have in mind.

If we could have the right muscles and the correct positions given us by an instructor, we would have no difficulty in getting the right accent. But our natural inclination to use our own familiar mouth formation and lip and tongue muscles is the reason why we do not get over our foreign accent, no matter how well we may understand the words we use.

The importance of this to singers lies in the fact that those languages which are naturally nearest the best mouth formation and tone placing of good singing are the easiest to sing in; and those who are accustomed to those languages are more natural singers than are those whose mother tongue requires sounds that can only be made by mouth positions undesirable in good singing tone production.

Needless to say, the Italian language is nearest to the singing language. It might not be wrong to say that a good way to learn to sing is first to learn Italian pronunciation. Italians speak with the mouth well open, with voice placed where it is resonant, and with plenty of breath pressure. In England it is considered bad manners to make so much noise in conversation as the Italians habitually make. More than two centuries ago Milton complained about the English manner of speaking being "too close and inward." Milton thought it was due to the cold and damp climate. We are not concerned with the cause, however, but with the fact. It is certain that a native of England does not naturally acquire as good a singing mouth as the native of Italy gets from his language.

The American method of speaking, though it may not be as pleasant to hear as the English method, is usually considered to be better for singing purposes. We need not dwell on this matter long, for neither the English mouthy sound nor the American nasal twang rid the English language of its many consonants and thin vowels. We do not for a moment imply that the English language cannot be musical in song; for the English language contains all the Italian vowels. But the English language also contains sounds that are not at all, or not so much, in evidence in the Italian language. An Italian composer may set any Italian sound to any music. An English composer must exercise some judgment in placing certain sounds in exceptional places. Campbell has written two lines that would sound like a combined flock of geese and an escape of steam if sung by a large chorus:

"Life's a burning, boundless waste,
Where bliss's stream we seldom taste."

"Bliss's stream" contains nine consonants, with four "esses" in a row. Could such a line be constructed in Italian?

German outclasses English as a language of consonants. But no one can deny the sonorous sound of German vowels.

Singers whose mother tongue is English may find it advantageous to acquire an Italian manner of controlling the lips and tongue and in placing the sound. And when they have that method firmly fixed so that they pronounced as naturally as an Italian, they may then carefully learn how to form the additional sounds required by the English language with as little disturbance as possible of the acquired Italian method. We are not attempting to give singing lessons or to interfere in any way with the methods of experts in voice training. Our object is merely to point out that (a) it is impossible to pronounce a foreign language correctly without the correct mouth formation; (b) that language is best for singing which gives the most correct mouth formation for singing.

We have used the term, mouth formation, in a slipshod way; but we trust it will be understood to mean the position of the lips and tongue during the emission of vocal sound.

METROPOLITAN OPERA OPENS.

Particular interest attached this year to the formal premiere of the Metropolitan Opera House, which took place Monday evening, November 16, because of the fact that most of the singers had to be freed through all sorts of resourceful manipulation from the countries now at war in Europe. Giulio Gatti-Casazza accomplished the liberations quietly and effectively, and to him must be extended the thanks of the opera executives and opera patrons of this city.

Verdi's thin and aged "The Masked Ball" was the opening attraction, and with Caruso as Riccardo, Frieda Hempel as Oscar, Emmy Destinn as Amelia, Margarete Matzenauer as Ulrica, Pasquale Amato as Renato, Andrea de Segurola as Samuel, and Leon Rothier as Tom, the performance reflected extreme brilliancy in the singing and acting, all of the principals revealing those familiar qualities which have made their possessors so popular and established their high artistic qualities so firmly. Arturo Toscanini conducted the orchestra and gave renewed demonstration of his kindling temperament, remarkable musical grasp and amazing baton mastery. No one but Toscanini is able to infuse into the faded Verdi score so much life and glowing color as were in evidence last Monday. He is the operatic revivifier, par excellence.

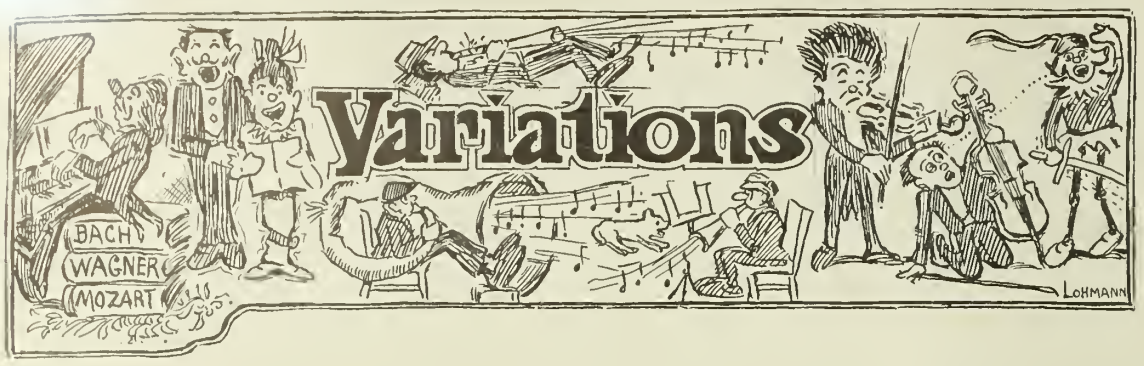
All the vocalists were in good voice and palpably under the influence of the general excellent spirits which prevailed at the Metropolitan premiere. The customary large and representative audience, gathered from the best fashion, business and professional circles, filled the boxes and stalls. Musicians, as in former years, were conspicuously absent.

The balance of this week will present "Lohengrin" on Wednesday, "Carmen" on Thursday, "Rosenkavalier" on Friday, "Boheme" on Saturday afternoon and "Aida" on Saturday evening.

TORONTO CONCERTS CANCELLED.

Our Chicago office reports that the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto has cancelled the concerts which the Chicago Symphony Orchestra was to give in the Canadian city next February. One of the reasons given for the cancellation was that the Chicago band contains Austrian and German members who are not naturalized American citizens. Certain Chicago circles appear to have taken umbrage at the action of the Canadians, but nevertheless the latter are acting well within their rights and according to the dictates of reason and of the rules of war. To an Englishman a German is a German, whether he be a musketeer or a musician, and no one can blame John Bull for refusing to let the enemy pass his borders. C'est la guerre. Those German musicians in this country who wish to be considered Americans should lose no time in becoming naturalized.

VERSATILE BOSTON.



From the New York Herald of November 13, 1914, is this telegraphic communication:

NEGRO SONGS ARE BARRED FROM BOSTON'S PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Boston, Mass., Thursday.—The old plantation songs, "My Old Kentucky Home," "Oh, Susannah," "Massa's in de Cold, Cold Ground," are insults to the negro race, according to speakers who appeared today at a hearing before the school committee, and a book of forty songs containing them was ordered withdrawn from the public schools.

We offer this without comment, except quietly to recall to ourselves that Boston was the city whose white citizens were "insulted" by the presence of Macmonnie's beautiful "Bacchante" in the courtyard of the Public Library.

The only German atrocities so far established as existant are the street bands which the fatherland so cruelly has sent all over the world.

War in Music.

"There is no sign of spiritual elevation, or even of spiritual degradation, in Strauss' music," remarks John F. Runciman in the London Saturday Review; "no sign of anything save a Prussian determination to be first to dominate, to be a world conqueror in the realm of music. The emotions are wholly factitious. But the technical efficiency, superefficiency, of the man is astounding. The masterly counterpoint, the brilliant orchestration, the hardness and the lack of a touch of fine feeling, the utter barrenness—all these might be, and I think are, manifestations and results of the working of the Prussian spirit. . . . 'The poetic' (heaven help us!) idea of the 'Heldenleben' is Prussian; with true Prussian self assertiveness he makes himself the hero in the battle, with its rub-a-dub-dub, he 'hacks his way through,' and he triumphantly overcomes the 'contemptible little army' of his foes—those who liked not the symphonic poems—whom he depicts as aimlessly squeaking and gibbering. . . . There is truth in music and when we apply the touchstone we find the music of Strauss is a lie, and the composer the helpless victim of the Prussian fallacy."

All this is very fine, John, and very powerful, and very well put, but we feel it our duty to remind you of the disconcerting fact that Richard Strauss was born, raised and educated in Munich, that he imbibed his early musical ideas there as a composer and conductor, and comes of an old Munich family. Also, John, Munich is in Bavaria, and not in Prussia. And it is a well known fact that the Bavarians have for many years been notoriously anti-Prussian.

Hitt's So, However.

DEAR SIR—In the "Variations" of November 11, you published this sentence: "At the 'Lilac Domino,' Andreas Dippel's opera comique venture, a baritone named Douthitt holds a high note for thirty-five seconds." My office boy, upon reading this statement, immediately said, "I Douthitt." Yours truly, ALLEGRO.

A Wild Pitch.

H. O. Osgood typewrites that the article in the MUSICAL COURIER for November 4, entitled "Fixed Pitch," brought to his mind something told him a few years ago by the veteran Vienna piano teacher, Prof. Theodor Leschetizky. "The Professor was a member of the Vienna Congress of 1887, which finally settled upon the international pitch as we know it at the present day," says Mr. Osgood, "and personally he is one of those musicians who has what we call absolute pitch, but his absolute pitch was founded on the old and higher pitch, now superseded by the international. He told me that to this day his sense of pitch never has succeeded in readjusting itself automatically, and that when he hears a piece in any key, he has to calculate mentally the difference between the old pitch and the present pitch before he can be sure in what key the composition actually stands."

Pre-Pliocene.

Musical Canada asks: "What, one wonders, is the oldest musical anecdote?" It is the one about Orpheus, who when asked whether he had seen a certain slighting reference in the Olympian Bugle about his lyre playing, replied disdainfully: "I never read what the critics write concerning me and my performances."

Why They Failed.

An Amsterdam, N. Y., paper ventures this: "Perhaps the fact that Beethoven first won distinction as a violin player accounts for the unusual feeling in his music." What feeling music theirs might have been if only Bach, Chopin, Schubert, Schumann and Brahms also had been proficient on the violin.

Relative Music.

In Daniel Gregory Mason's program notes of the New York Symphony Orchestra concerts one read about the Bantock "Pierrot" overture: "It opens with a short introduction on a theme for bassoon and plucked strings, a first cousin of the main theme of Dukas' 'L'Apprenti Sorcier.'" That puts in prospect wide possibilities for the extension of the limited terminology in musical criticism. It is possible, now, by using Mr. Mason's method, to determine which of Liszt's themes are father-in-law to Richard Wagner's and grandfather to Siegfried Wagner's, and what part of their subject matter the Young French composers appropriated from Uncle Debussy. Brahms' finale in the C minor symphony, according to the same genealogical system, is derived from Pa Beethoven's "Ninth." Strauss' themes, difficult to trace as to parentage, could be hinted at as illegitimate in origin, and the modern Russian music of course must be called the poor relation of Chopin and Liszt, with Rubinstein as the wet nurse.

Kingly Confidence.

From London Truth, October 28, 1914: "During his recent stay at York Cottage his majesty (King George) was out partridge shooting each day for a few hours, and heavy bags were obtained, as it is a very good year for birds in Norfolk."

Tango or War?

"All the world's a stage," quoted a thespian the other day to the manager of an unsuccessful production. "It must be," growled the one addressed, "for I don't see any audiences."

Burial Service.

Speaking of stage matters, when an author is whipping his out-of-town piece into shape for the New York premiere, could it be said that he is administering the last writes?

Handy Andy.

And continuing to discourse on theatrical affairs, Rennold Wolf says in his glittering Morning Telegraph column: "Another play being groomed for early production is 'The Passing of Hans Dippel.'" It could not be "The Passing of Andreas Dippel" for that gentleman is with us always; he has become an institution and a popular one.

Out-and-Indoor Sport.

Symphonic Word.

Wherever one's sympathy may happen to lie, there probably is a unanimous opinion that it does not matter which of the Allies shoots to pieces the word Vierwaldstättersee-salonschraubendampferkonkurrenzgesellschaftsbureauvorsteherbezeugniss. Bruckner would have loved to set that word to music.

Good Stuff.

"Fall In" is the best modern European war song we have come across so far, even if it is useful only for the moment, as its purpose is to encourage recruiting in England. Sir Frederic Cowen wrote the music and the words are by Harold Begbie. The third verse of the song runs like this:

How will you fare, sonny, how will you fare,
In the far off winter night,
When you sit by the fire in an old man's chair,
And your neighbors talk of the fight?
Will you slink away, as it were from a blow,
Your old head shamed and bent?
Or say "I was not with the first to go,
But I went, thank God, I went."

When Women Talk War.

"If ever the Germans capture Dunkirk, the rest of England had better be careful."

"Why, you goose, Dunkirk isn't in England; it's in Scotland."

"Of course it is. How stupid of me. I don't understand, though, how the Germans got into Scotland."

"They took the soldiers over in submarines by the northern route."

"What's the latest news from Verdun?"

"I haven't been following the campaign in Servia at all. It's a foregone conclusion that a little country like Servia can't hold out against Russia very long."

"How many troops has Russia?"

"Oh, about forty million."

"Have the Austrians decided to give up their attack on Przemysl?"

"Long ago, my dear. You see, they had the Meuse in their rear, and the fire from the English warships was too severe, so their position became untenable and they fell back on their intrenchments near Warsaw."

"What are the French doing?"

"They have just captured Vosges, a very important strategic center in Germany."

"I thought Vosges is in Belgium."

"You are right; it is. I got it mixed up with Ypres."

"Aren't those German guns remarkable?"

'Phenomenal! And to think that they're only fifteen inches high."

"Soissons is putting up a stiff fight."

"He has to. Don't you know what his object is?"

"No."

"To push on to Cracow and effect a juncture with Joffre."

"Isn't it wonderful to be able to follow the whole war scheme so thoroughly?"

"Marvelous!"

Summa Summarum.

Ethel Leginska's playing of the twenty-four Chopin studies at her recital last Monday, starts the reflection that any one competent to manage the two dozen finger breakers is able to play anything in the entire piano literature.

Music with Meals.

"In Berlin they are serving five cent dinners and two cent suppers to poor musicians," said a returned traveler to an American composer the other day. "What are the chances of America's going to war?" asked the music maker hopefully.

To Be Said Quickly.

Commuter's Joy.

"As nervous as a commuter during the last act of 'Meistersinger,'" a simile quoted by the Evening Mail, hits home with the suburban section of our opera goers.

"Hoch!"

Leo Slezak, the tenor, writes from his home in Austria as follows: "Dear Messrs. Haensel & Jones: When I was in America last year I attended a dinner given in honor of one of the officers of the United States navy. At the dinner one of the U. S. naval officers arose and said, 'My country; may it always be right, but right or wrong, my country.' That is the way I feel now. My country is at war. The Emperor has showered me with honors in times of peace. I will honor my Emperor by staying here. I have repeatedly volunteered to go to the front, but have not yet been accepted. But I want the Emperor to know that I am willing and prepared to go. It would be pleasant to be in America singing in concert. I love to sing and I love America. But my duty is here in my Fatherland. So again I say, 'My country; may it always be right, but right or wrong, my country.' Please explain to all my friends. They will understand. I cannot come to America this season. (Signed) LEO SLEZAK."

Us and Goethe.

Goethe considered the libretto of "The Magic Flute" to be ridiculous. So do we. However, we do not think it much ridiculouser than the librettos of "Gioconda" and "Parsifal." LEONARD LIEBLING.

Waghalter a Soldier.

Ignatz Waghalter, conductor of the Deutsches Opernhaus (Charlottenburg-Berlin), who was a Russian subject who the war broke out, has become a naturalized German citizen, and upon offering his services to the cause of that country was accepted for military duty in the Elizabeth Guards Grenadier Regiment of Charlottenburg. As that troop will remain in Charlottenburg for the present, Waghalter is in a position to keep on conducting, even if intermittently, at the Deutsches Opernhaus.

Boston Praises Serato.

Arrigo Serato, the Italian violinist, who is just entering upon his initial American tour, effected his debut in this country before a Boston audience on Sunday afternoon, November 8. The success of Serato on that occasion is shown in the appended notices culled from the daily papers:

"Mr. Serato appeared at 'the concert for the people' yesterday afternoon, and justified the report that preceded him. He is a matured technician with his instrument, using his skill for well emphasized display, when his music asks nothing else, and subordinating it to music that in turn bids such subordination. His tone is warm, elastic and ingratiating. He plays with understanding of his music and with discriminating taste as to its voice and its style. He has due sense of the rounding of phrase into phrase, of the sustaining of a long and songful line. He plays with just and sincere feeling. His hearers listened with pleasure yesterday."—Boston Transcript.

"A large audience in the Boston Theatre yesterday afternoon greeted Mr. Serato, who then played for the first time in this country. The occasion was the second of the concerts of the people under the auspices of the Boston Music School Settlement.

"Yesterday afternoon Mr. Serato played Vitali's 'Ciaccona'; the romance and finale concerto, by Wieniawski; Schumann's 'Abendlied,' and Sarasate's 'Zigeunerweisen,' also small pieces in response to unusually hearty and prolonged applause. He is a well trained violinist. His tone is even and agreeable, sufficiently virile in sturdy passages, mellow in song, sympathetic throughout.

"His technical proficiency was fully adequate to the requirements of the composition, his sense of phrasing is sound and musical."—Boston Herald.

"Mr. Arrigo Serato, Italian violinist, played for the first time in America. Mr. Serato did not disappoint the anticipations of his audience, anxious to hear him on account of the reports which had preceded his appearance. Mr. Serato is indeed a violinist of parts. He is more than a technically proficient entertaining performer. He played serious music and made it intelligible and inspiring to a large gathering of untrained hearers. He has maturity and individuality of style and will undoubtedly be heard again in this city in the near future. He played Wieniawski's violin concerto in D minor, Bach's sonata in E minor, and shorter compositions by Bruch, Schumann, Vieuxtemps."—Boston Post.

"Arrigo Serato, the Italian violinist, gave a brilliant concert yesterday afternoon in the Boston Theatre. . . . It was a crowd drawn from the clientele that practically filled the large theatre yesterday, and Mr. Serato offered an abundance of just what they wanted—music of a varied type, but of the choicest and with the artistic sense evident in rendition; for a great number of the auditors were there to catch, if possible, the elusive secrets of art, the 'how' of the violinist.

"Mr. Serato played a Ciacona by Vitali and romance and finale by Wieniawski, 'Abendlied,' by Schumann, and 'Zigeunerweisen,' by Sarasate, a collection that gives fiddlers of any degree of skill an abundance of the problems and nuances that make up the charm of art for the executant and redolent of melody for the merely 'interested' who can listen to music and who in a musical school gathering make a serious task of listening.

"It was the violinist's first appearance in America, though he is acclaimed in Italy as its leading artist on the instrument. He has indeed an exquisite tone, and artist's vision, though still young, and a manual competency that places him, in this regard at least on a par with Kreisler and Elman."—Boston Globe.

"The outstanding quality of Mr. Serato's playing of the violin is his tremendous honesty. His preparations for the work of an artist has been arduous and faithful; he has learned the best traditions, and he has been well schooled in the serious business of interpreting music before an audience. So high a regard has he apparently for the value of a thoughtful, sober and dignified rendering as proclaiming the work of the true artist that he will shy at any temptation to indulge in sentimentality, even with the hope of making an impression on his first audience in a strange land.

"Hearty applause greeted Mr. Serato as he appeared on the stage for his first number, and still heartier handclapping rewarded his first effort. The audience as cordial and discriminating as an artist could wish, by the way—thoroughly approved of the new violinist, and demanded and got two extra numbers."—Christian Science Monitor.

Althouse in "Rosenkavalier."

Paul Althouse, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will make his first appearance in opera this season on Friday evening, November 20, in the leading tenor role of "Der Rosenkavalier." Mr. Althouse has just returned from a successful concert tour under the direction of Haensel & Jones.

Miss Kerns is the soloist at St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, and as such has won a host of admirers for herself and her art.

Harold Henry Critiques.

Harold Henry's recent piano recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, won much favorable criticism for the playing of the Chicago pianist from the local daily press. Excerpts follow:

Harold Henry is a young artist to whom was given last year, without any preliminary heralding, a splendid success. Yesterday he had the satisfaction of seeing Aeolian Hall thickly filled with a very receptive and grateful public. Mr. Henry has command over a firm touch, at will soft and then again forceful, and over an honest, at times eminently brilliant, technic. . . . Much in his playing bespeaks an exalted soul and a commanding intelligence. . . . He played pieces by Brahms, Schubert, Chopin, and especially Chopin, with much feeling, and a sense for the fitting, Chopin with poetry also.—Statts Zeitung, October 30, 1914.

Harold Henry, a pianist, who played for the first time in New York a year ago, gave a recital yesterday afternoon, in Aeolian Hall, that indicated how well founded was the favorable impression left by his first appearance. . . . His program demanded an intelligence and an appreciation of certain things that are outside the conventional pianistic repertoire. . . . There should be special praise for his sympathetic playing of Franck's piece, which caught and transmitted much of its beauty.—Times, October 30, 1914.

He found favor last winter, and it was assured that he would be heard again. . . . Mr. Henry played the Franck composition excellently. In this he put forth the best resources of his art, which has grown since last season in firmness and in the scope of its tone color. There were genuinely beautiful moments of technic and tone in the Franck music, as in the arpeggiated passage for crossed hands; but there was appreciation also.—Sun, October 30, 1914.

The American pianist, Harold Henry, who has heretofore earned praise in this town, and who is a great favorite in the West, was heard again by an appreciative audience yesterday afternoon at Aeolian Hall. His program could not have been more varied. . . . He worked up the Cesar Franck piece to a fine climax in the final fugue. . . . The Schumann sonata (op. 22) and the Chopin fantasie were enjoyable from start to finish. . . . Good taste is one of the rare qualities for which this pianist is conspicuous.—Evening Post, October 30, 1914.

Harold Henry is an artist who evokes from his hearer not only respect for his accomplishments, but who absolutely captivates him as a result of his manifold endowments. He has command over a sovereign technic.—Morgen Journal, October 30, 1914.

The Schumann sonata, op. 22, and the Cesar Franck prelude, choral and fugue, together were his "piece de resistance," and as such were happily chosen. Plain, musicianly handling of the Schumann sonata made every bar of it worth while, and the way in which Henry played the satisfying Franck music called up memories of Harold Bauer's interpretation of it. Press, October 30, 1914.

It was worth while for piano students to hear his Schumann sonata and resounding Cesar Franck prelude, choral and fugue.—Evening Sun, October 30, 1914.

He displayed the same unfailing technic, delicate touch and singing tone shown on his first appearance.—World, October 30, 1914.

Certainly the program was distinctive, dropping entirely out of the frame of the conventional piano repertoire and placing powerful demands upon his talent, as concerns technic as well as interpretation. But Mr. Henry was ripe for his task. Especially the Cesar Franck prelude, choral and fugue found in the artist an interpretation full of understanding, as he knows how to take the listener into the idea world of the composer.—Revue, October 31, 1914.

A delightfully unconventional section of the program was devoted to a group of modern composers and their outdoor impressions. It was at this point that the performer became the poet at the piano and especially charmed his hearers.—Telegram, October 30, 1914.

Von Stein Academy Results.

The students' public recital record (during October, 1914) of the Von Stein Academy of Music in Los Angeles was an unusual one. The full list follows: "Fantasie-Impromptu," C sharp minor (Chopin), "Perpetuum Mobile" (Weber), "Rondo á Capriccioso" (Mendelssohn), "Liebestraume" (Liszt), played by Dorsey Whittington; "Shadow Dance" (MacDowell), rondo, D major (Mozart), mazurka, B flat (Chopin), played by Hazel Yoho; "Allegro di molto" (Bach), "Cradle Song" (Gottschalk), etude, B flat (Heller), played by Fay Savage; "Polish Dance" (Scharwenka), "Humoreske" (Friml), "Romanze" (Grünfeld), played by Laura Tallman; "Solfeggio" (Bach), "Etude Melodique" (Rogers), "Humoreske" (Dvorák), played by Ramona Baker; "En Automne" (Moszkowski), "Blue Danube" paraphrase (Schulz-Evler), etude, G sharp minor (Chopin), played by Loretta Payson; prelude, B flat minor (Chopin), "Variations Serieuses" (Mendelssohn), variations, F major (Tschaikowsky), sonata, D major (Beethoven), concerto, D minor (cadenza Reinecke), (Mozart), played by Reta Mitchell; "Symphonie Pathétique" (arranged for eight hands, for two pianos), (Tschaikowsky), played by Loretta Payson, Reta Mitchell, Louise Carroll and Hazel Hammerton; overture, "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn), played by Hazel Yoho, Laura Tallman, Felice Anchell and Dorsey Whittington; "Akademische Fest" overture (Brahms), played by Anna Bernhardt, Laura Tallman, Ramona Baker and Felice Anchell; for violin, "Serenade" (Pierné), "Cavatina" (Bohm), played by Roderic Loring; "Barcarolle" (Sitt), concerto (De Beriot), played by Alois Hellauer; "Adagio Pathétique" (Godard), played by Frances Sprague; and "Cantilene" (Borowsky), played by Rose Rappaport.

CHICAGO CONCERTS AND RECITALS ARE NUMEROUS.

Season Is Well Under Way—Apollo Club Will Sing "The Messiah" at Christmas Time—Symphony Program and General Mention

Chicago, Ill., November 14, 1914.

The Sunday afternoon concerts brought forth Helen Ware, violinist, and Marie Edwards, pianist, in joint recital at the Blackstone Theatre; Carol Robinson, pianist, at the Fine Arts Theatre, and Rosa Olitzka, contralto, and Ludwig Schmidt, violinist, at the Illinois Theatre.

Mme. Olitzka and Mr. Schmidt attracted a very large audience to the Illinois Theatre, which was practically filled with friends and admirers of those two artists. Mme. Olitzka's annual Chicago recitals are always well patronized and this shows the high esteem in which she is held in her own locality. Her program was well balanced and rendered with distinction by the popular contralto, who, though hampered with a cold, sang with fine style and gave a splendid account of herself. Encores were numerous and the singer was the recipient of several floral tributes. Mr. Schmidt shared with the contralto in the success of the afternoon. He is a well schooled violinist, equipped with an excellent technic, and the possessor of much emotionalism and temperament. His readings were classical, and he pleased his hearers and won many plaudits after his various groups. The affair was under the management of F. Wight Neumann.

At the Fine Arts Theatre, Carol Robinson, a Chicago pianist, showed the result of good training in an interesting program, which was listened to by a very large gathering. Miss Robinson has been taught by Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler and now acts as assistant to her mentor. Her technic is excellent, her readings poetic and romantic, and if at times her dynamic powers seemed somewhat weak, what was missing in virility was gained in beauty of tone. She was enthusiastically received and richly deserved her success.

Helen Ware and Marie Edwards in Joint Recital.

At the Blackstone Theatre, Helen Ware and Marie Edwards were heard in the Akos von Buttykay sonata in A minor, which on this occasion had its first hearing in Chicago. The recitalists gave of their best, yet the sonata impressed but moderately, and it has little to recommend it to other performers. Miss Edwards was heard also in her first group, which was made up of the Rosenbloom scherzo, three MacDowell numbers and the Widor "Kermesse Carillonnante." Miss Edwards, who is a local pianist, gave a good account of herself in those selections. Miss Ware was heard for the purpose of this review in the Dvorák ballade, Brahms-Joachim Hungarian dances and Kramer's "Chant Negre." This group consisted also of the Saenger Scotch pastorale and "Tambourin Chinois" of Kreisler. The young violinist played her selections with that fine degree of understanding and musicianship always expected from this gifted artist.

Maurice Rosenfeld Objects.

The following letter was received at this office from Maurice Rosenfeld, the music critic of the Chicago Examiner:

My Dear Friend René—I found it rather strange that in the article reproducing expressions of the criticisms of Harold Bauer, reprinted in the Musical Courier of the last issue, you quoted from my column and did not mention my name.

I should think that after eight years' service as musical editor of the Examiner, you might have remembered it as well as that of two other critics whose names were mentioned.

With kind regards, yours sincerely,
(Signed) Maurice Rosenfeld.

Mr. Rosenfeld is right. He knows the value of advertising and his name should have been mentioned in the Musical Courier. It is mentioned herewith: Maurice Rosenfeld.

Music League Presents Artists in Concert.

The first concert of the season under the auspices of the Music League of America took place in the charming crystal ball room of the Blackstone Hotel on Monday morning, November 9—an ideal setting for intimate concert work such as the program brought forth. The Trio de Lutece, consisting of George Barrere, flutist; Paul Kefer, cellist, and Salvatore de Stefano, assisted by Anita Rio, soprano, furnished the numbers. In both their ensemble work and solos the trio proved one of merit. Mr. Kefer, the cellist, evidently thought that the people of Chicago had no knowledge of music and his solos were by Massenet and Glazounow, instead of Lalo and Saint-Saëns as inscribed on the program. It might be a good idea for Eastern artists to announce changes of this sort, for even though we live a thousand miles from New York, there are some few people here who have musical knowledge, intelligence and these like to be informed when changes are made. Mr. Kefer's playing was mediocre. Mme. Rio gave a most artistic rendition of the recitative and aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue." She has a voice of beautiful quality and sings with warmth and feeling. Marx Oberndorfer furnished the artistic accompaniments.

Amateur Musical Club's Annual Concert.

The annual concert for extension work of the Amateur Musical Club was given in Orchestra Hall Monday afternoon, November 9, before a large and enthusiastic audience. The soloists were Charles W. Clark, baritone, and Amy Emerson Neill, violinist. Mr. Clark was acclaimed by his admirers on this occasion and deservedly so, as his voice never sounded better than on Monday afternoon. The French songs were delivered with excellent effect and style. His interpretation is always remarkable, and the German group, too, was delivered with that authority and art for which Mr. Clark is noted. The last group was devoted to English songs, among them the "Pilgrimage," by Arthur Dunham. This was heard on the program of American composers last week and impressed more favorably on second hearing, probably because it was well sung by Mr. Clark. The audience was lavish with applause, and after each group the popular baritone was obliged to give an encore.

Karleton Hackett and Mabel Sharp Herdien Before Arche Club.

Mabel Sharp Herdien, soprano, illustrated Karleton Hackett's operatic lecture last Friday afternoon at the Arche Club. Mrs. Herdien sang beautifully and was warmly applauded.

Vida Llewellyn's Chicago Program.

One week from this Sunday afternoon at 3.30 Vida Llewellyn will give a piano recital at the Fine Arts Theatre, under the management of Carl D. Kinsey. Miss Llewellyn is a native of Chicago and acquired her musical education here until recent years, when she went to Europe. Miss Llewellyn has had a number of appearances abroad and is to give a New York recital this week.

Herbert Miller Sings at Germania Theatre.

Herbert Miller, baritone, gave a song recital at the Germania Theatre, Monday evening, November 9, before a large and enthusiastic audience. Mr. Miller's program was perhaps lugubrious, yet he kept away from all the hackneyed songs so often heard on the concert platform. The program began with the Bach recitative and aria, "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus," which showed the singer at his best. The second group, made up of the Brahms "Vier Ernste Gesänge," was beautifully given and won for the recitalist the full approval of his hearers. The third group consisted of Grieg's "Der Jager" and "Zur Johannisnacht," Erich J. Wolff's "Ich bein eine Harfe" and "Der Steinklopfer," and was concluded with a masterly rendition of the Richard Strauss "Fruhlingsfeier." Mr. Miller was just as happy with his French group, made up of the d'Indy "Lied Maritime," "Le Temps des Lilas" by Cahusson, Ravel's "Sainte" and Duparc's "La Vague et la Cloche."

The last group, comprising English songs, was devoted largely to two local composers, John A. Carpenter, whose "Don't Ceare" and "May, the Maiden," can be compared with the best selections inscribed on the program. Both numbers were accorded a rousing reception and were beautifully interpreted by the recitalist. The "Think No More, Lad," by Lulu Jones Downing, was encored. The "Scorned Love" by Kurt Schindler and "Rhapsodie" by Campbell-Tipton were the other offerings.

Mr. Miller is seldom heard in Chicago in recitals, but on each occasion great development in his art is to be registered. He was in fine fettle and his interpretation of each song was especially excellent. His diction of English, French and German was all that could be desired.

Sinai Orchestral Concert Season Opens.

The first concert, third season, of the Sinai Orchestral Concerts was given on Sunday evening, November 15, at Sinai Temple, under the direction of Arthur Dunham, conductor. Rose Lutiger Gannon, contralto, was the soloist. Beside directing the orchestra Mr. Dunham played the Wolstenholme organ finale in B flat and Mrs. Gannon's selections were the aria "O Mia Fernando" from Donizetti's "La Favorita" and Dunham's "The Pilgrimage."

Apollo Club Will Sing "The Messiah."

One thousand singers will be on the Auditorium stage at Christmas time for the customary two performances of Handel's "Messiah" by the Apollo Musical Club, Harrison M. Wild, conductor. The club's regular chorus of 300 will be augmented by 700. The extra singers are old members of the club invited back for this occasion and members of leading church choirs throughout the city and suburbs. The dates are Friday night, December 25, and Sunday afternoon, December 27. It is expected that this year's performance of "The Messiah" will be the most notable in the history of Chicago and the West. Rehearsals are now being held.

Annual Faculty Concert of Walter Spry School.

The Walter Spry Music School will give its annual faculty concert on Sunday afternoon, November 29, at 3.30 o'clock, in the Fine Arts Theatre. The program will be performed by the following members of the faculty: Minnie Fish-Griffin, soprano; Hugo Kortschak, violinist, and James Whittaker, pianist.

Alexander Lehmann Announces Violin Recital.

Alexander Lehmann, violin teacher, announces a recital by his pupils on Sunday afternoon, November 29, at Recital Hall. Among the numbers inscribed on the program is the Felix Borowski "Adoration," which will be played by violins in unison by Messrs. Lehmann, Kaumeyer, Crispin, Mandl, Shaver, Higdon and Hugo Kortschak and the Misses Raymond and Frankel. Another interesting number will be Alexander Lehmann's own trio, which will be played by the composer, assisted by Wotan Zoellner, violinist, and Mrs. Albert Zoellner, pianist. Wotan Zoellner, who is an advanced pupil in the Lehmann class, is only seven years old, and besides playing with her teacher, she will be heard in a solo in the Mazurka by Mlynarski. Some twelve other students will be heard in solo numbers.

Alma Gluck Coming to Chicago.

Alma Gluck will make her only appearance in recital in Chicago at Orchestral Hall, Sunday afternoon, November 29, under the direction of F. Wight Neumann.

Musical Arts Quartet.

The Mary Wood Chase School of Musical Arts issued invitations for a recital given by the Musical Arts Quartet, which rendered the Haydn piano trio in G minor, the Mozart piano quartet in G minor, and the Beethoven string trio in E flat. This event occurred today, Saturday afternoon, November 14, in the Caxton Club Rooms of the Fine Arts Building. Mary Wood Chase, pianist, heads the quartet.

Bergey Chicago Opera School.

On Sunday, November 8, at the Bergey Chicago Opera School in the Fine Arts Building, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore S. Bergey presented Mae McMinn, soprano; Leslie Voigtmann, tenor, and Irving Engle, pianist, in an operatic recital. The statement should be two recitals instead of one, the crowd was so great that it became necessary to repeat the entire program the second time, one audience waiting patiently in the reception room and hallways of the Fine Arts Building until the first audience was dismissed.

Those attending the Bergey recitals usually desire an invitation for each succeeding recital, until the attendance has become so large that in the future admission can be had only by special invitation ticket. Miss McMinn and Mr. Voigtmann gave an entire scene from "Traviata," besides solos including the "Bell Song," from "Lakme," and arias from "Otello," "Lucia," "Rigoletto" and "Tosca." Mr. Voigtmann has developed into an operatic tenor and shows the result of careful training and devotion to study. Miss McMinn sings the coloratura roles with ease, trills and high F's floating out with more freedom than most sopranos sing A and B flats.

In the piano department of the Bergey studios, Irving Engle has become one of the favorites, his playing of the Schumann "Carneval," five Chopin etudes, etude by Rubinstein, Rachmaninoff "Prelude," and Liszt's "Nightingale" were given with unfailing memory, splendid interpretation and good technic.

American Conservatory.

The American Conservatory of Music gave a recital by advanced piano pupils of Kurt Wanieck, voice pupils of Charles La Berge and O. E. Robinson and violin pupils of Herbert Butler, at Kimball Hall Saturday afternoon, November 14. Mr. Wanieck played the orchestral parts on the second piano and Mabel Stapleton acted as accompanist. Next Saturday, November 21, the recital will be given by Earl Blair, pianist, and Charles La Berge, vocalist.

Della Thal's Pupils in Recital.

Della Thal will present several of her pupils in a piano recital at the Little Theatre next Monday evening, November 23. Those who will participate in the rendition of the program are Minnie Corwin Houghton, Helen Friedman, Selma Kahn, Florence Pinckney Knowlton, Frances Gutwillig and Dora Heyman. Miss Thal will preside at the second piano.

Gerville-Reache and Spalding to Open Tiffin Musicales.

The fourth season of Tiffin musicales, which are to be given this year in the Gold Ballroom of the Congress Hotel, under the management of Eleanore Fisher-Talbot, will be opened by Jeanne Gerville-Reache, contralto, and Albert Spalding, violinist, on Monday morning, November 30.

Jennette Loudon in Joint Recital.

M. Jennette Loudon, pianist, and Howard van Sweringen, tenor, will be heard in joint recital Sunday afternoon, November 15, in Studio 612, Fine Arts Building.

Fabbrini Soloist at Autumn Music Festival.

Last Friday evening, November 13, at the Auditorium Hotel, South Parlor, a concert was given under the auspices of the autumn musical festival of the Chapter of the A. P. E. O. This college organization, which numbers over 25,000 members, received Giuseppe Fabbrini, the Italian pianist, now head of the piano department at the Minneapolis School of Music, most cordially. Mr. Fabbrini who, on this occasion, made his debut in Chicago, was heard in a group by Chopin, the Brahms intermezzo in E flat minor, Debussy's "Gardens in the Rain," Martucci's scherzo and Rubinstein's staccato etude, in all of which he disclosed a facile technic, rare beauty of tone, and his readings were clear and interesting, which presaged well for future hearings in this city.

Frank Gittelson Makes Debut With Symphony Orchestra.

Frank Gittelson made his first appearance in Chicago in the Brahms concerto for violin and scored a huge success at the hands of the habitues of the weekly Chicago Symphony Orchestra concerts. The orchestra, under the masterly baton of Frederick Stock, played the Tschaikowsky fourth symphony, Debussy's "Gigues," which had on this occasion its first hearing here, and the overture to Chabrier's opera "Gwendoline."

Hubbard in Chicago.

Havrah Hubbard, for many years critic on the Chicago Tribune and for the last few years engaged as lecturer for several opera companies, was seen in Chicago last Friday. Mr. Hubbard was on his way to Moline, Ill., where he gave a recital before the Woman's Musical Club.

A Guardanini Presented to Sokoloff.

A Jean Baptista Guardanini has been presented to Nikolai Sokoloff by Mrs. J. B. Casserly and the Misses Cudahy, of Chicago. This is said to be one of the finest specimens of that great master's work and was secured from a famous collection belonging to a famous French estate. Sokoloff delights in bringing out all the rich luscious tone of the instrument to its fullest capacity. On this violin he is to play the "Poeme" of Chausson, the afternoon of November 20, at Aeolian Hall, New York.

Zatella Martin's Latest Achievement.

Zatella Martin, the young American coloratura soprano, a pupil of Delia M. Valeri, of New York, has recently appeared in Gallarate, Italy, in Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," winning much praise.

Miss Martin is the Michigan girl who came to New York to study with Mme. Valeri at the advice of Alessandro Bonci, the famous tenor, who had heard her sing in Detroit, Mich. Miss Martin afterward made a tour of the United States as an assistant soprano to Signor Bonci, arousing everywhere the admiration of the music lovers by the beauty of her voice, as well as for the excellence of her method.

She left for Italy a little over one year ago and has been singing there in concerts and in opera. The readers of the Musical Courier will, no doubt, remember her successful appearance at the Carlo Felice of Genoa, one of the leading Italian operatic stages, where she sang the Page to the Riccardo of Bonci in Verdi's "Masked Ball," receiving the full approval of one of the most exacting operatic audiences.

She appeared recently as Norina in Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" at the Teatro Condominio of Gallarate, a town which is only a few miles from Milan. Being in the vicinity of Milan many musical agents went there to hear the young soprano, who had a veritable triumph. She sang the opera on six different evenings and in every one several hundred people were turned away. As is the habit in Italy she was given an "evening of honor," and on that evening, besides "Don Pasquale," she sang the great aria from "La Sonnambula," by Bellini, ending it with a beautiful E flat that aroused the greatest enthusiasm.

In the audience were several artists and theatrical people, among them Allessandro Bonci, who went expressly to Gallarate from Loreto to witness the fresh success of his protegée. It is merely a matter of justice to her teacher, Delia M. Valeri, of 1748 Broadway, New York, to remark here that Miss Martin studied exclusively in America under her tuition. Herewith is added an interesting notice published by one of the leading newspapers in Gallarate:

The announcement that the operatic company that is now performing at the Teatro Condominio would give a performance of "Don Pasquale" in honor of Zatella Martin, the young soprano, who has been so warmly received here, completely filled the theatre and many people were turned away for lack of space.

Miss Martin displayed, as usual, a beautiful voice, trained in an excellent school. Her interpretation of Norina was magnificent in every way; in truth, so good as to deserve all the applause of the enthusiastic audience. Between the second and the third act, Miss Martin sang the great aria from Bellini's "La Sonnambula," delighting the audience, which, spellbound, listened to her faultless rendition, which was ended by a very pure and ringing E flat. Miss Martin had numerous curtain calls and was presented with many flowers and valuable gifts by some of her admirers and by the manager of the company.—La Cronaca Prealpina.

Bispham Under Shipman Management.

David Bispham is again under the exclusive management of Frederic Shipman, of Chicago. It will be remembered that Mr. Bispham was under Mr. Shipman's management two years ago, when the baritone made an extensive tour through the United States and Canada, also that Mr. Shipman arranged for Mr. Bispham's Australian tour.

Mr. Shipman has already booked a tour for Mr. Bispham, which will include the United States, and he is likewise negotiating for another Australian tour for the baritone.

It was Mr. Shipman who managed Mme. Melba's United States and Canadian tour a few years ago.

Philip Spooner Is Busy.

At the Lyceum Theatre, on Forty-sixth street, New York, last Friday afternoon, November 13, Philip Spooner, the American tenor, was one of the soloists who appeared at the concert arranged for the benefit of the Red Cross fund. His singing won for him loud applause.

Mr. Spooner was also one of the soloists last Tuesday at the opening concert of the series of four programs given at the Wanamaker store, Broadway and Ninth street, New York.

Philharmonic Brooklyn Dates.

Alma Gluck, soprano; Julia Culp, mezzo-soprano; Efrem Zimbalist, violinist; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, and David Sapirstein, pianist, are to be the soloists wth the Philharmonic Society of New York, Josef Stransky, conductor, at its five Brooklyn concerts this season. These will be given on the Sunday afternoons of November 22, December 13, January 17, February 14, and March 14.

Middleton's Grand Opera Debut.

Arthur Middleton, the American basso, will make his debut in grand opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, this Wednesday evening, November 18, in "Lohengrin."

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA PLAYS OLD CLASSICS.

Fifth Pair of Concerts Present Robust and Colorful Program—General News From Quaker City.

Philadelphia, Pa., November 15, 1914.

The robust colorful zest in life in the expression of which the musical fathers were so adept permeated the entire program offered by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra at the fifth concert of the current season in the Academy of Music last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. To this general effect Beethoven's eighth symphony, the first this year, was probably the chief contributor, though Handel and Bach also were potent weavers of the spell.

The simple, pointed "It Is Finished," from "St. John's Passion," was Louise Homer's first contribution to the program. She followed with "My Heart Ever Faithful," and the aria "Ministrii di Baal," from Meyerbeer's "Il Profeto."

Stokowski presented as the first number on the program Handel's overture to "Arminius" for the first time at these concerts. It is strong and simple, reminiscent of Haydn, but with all its strength and its well wrought fugue, the work was stupid. This statement is not inspired by lack of sympathy with an art work of another age, but by the mediocrity of its main materials. Even Stokowski's excellent rendering was without avail.

Neither the genius of the leader nor the welded sympathies and technic of his orchestra were wasted, however, on Beethoven's eighth symphony. It was the chief factor in this highly diverting and healthful concert. Its simple purposes and whimsical turns were strongly brought out. But it was "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns' first symphonic poem, which brought out the real genius of the organization. The subtle motives and flowing melodies of this dissertation upon "the strength of weakness" were read in a fashion which makes ridiculous the efforts of proponents of program music to find action in its every phrase. Johan Svendsen's lively "Carnival in Paris" closed this amiable concert.

RECITALS AND NOTES.

What with recitals by Alma Gluck, David Bispham and Frank Gittelson, and a special concert by the Philadelphia Orchestra, music-loving Philadelphia could make no complaint as to dearth of events of real interest this week. Gittelson appeared at the Academy of Music on Tuesday evening; and Gluck and Bispham attracted large audiences to the Academy of Music and Witherspoon Hall, respectively, on Wednesday evening. In view of the acclaim which has greeted Gittelson's every appearance since his return to this country, of the widely known attainments of beautiful, American-trained Alma Gluck, and of the large capacity of Bispham, discussion of the performances of these artists would be superfluous. It is sufficient to say that their reception was as enthusiastic as their work was meritorious.

Miss Gluck was compelled to add many encores to her original program of twenty-one songs, and though it would be difficult to distinguish between her offerings on the ground of execution, her audience probably found greatest pleasure in her interpretation of "Bohemian Cradle Song," Smetana; "Before My Window," Rachmaninoff; "Frühlingslied," Rubinstein; Little Russia Folksongs," Zimbalist; "Song of the Shepherd Lehl," Rimsky-Korsakoff. Miss Gluck sang the Rimsky-Korsakoff number with pronounced success at her recent concert with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Vladimir Shaievitch was at the piano.

With the assistance of Ellis Clark Hammann as accompanist, Frank Gittelson was able to bring out, in the intimate concert room, phases of his art which his local appearance with the orchestra had not revealed. His program included: Concerto, E minor, Pietro Nardini (cadenza by Frank Gittelson); "Chaconne," for violin alone, Johann Sebastian Bach; three characteristic national dances: Slav, in A major, Antonin Dvorák; Spanish, in D major, P. Sarasate; Hungarian, in A major, Johannes Brahms; concerto, B minor, A. d'Ambrosio.

David Bispham appeared, assisted by Harry M. Gilbert, under the auspices of the University Extension Society. As on the occasion of his every visit here for many seasons this master of dramatic song was enthusiastically greeted by a "capacity" audience. He partly duplicates his all-American concert of last season by giving the second portion of his program over to the following composers: Prologue from "The Atonement of Pan" (Jos. D. Redding), Henry Hadley; "Song of the Flint," from "The Cave Man" (Chas. K. Field), Wm. J. McCoy; "An Exhortation (Alex. Rogers), Will Marion Cook; "A Hundred Years Ago" (John Bennett), Neal McCay; "Danny Deever" (Kipling), Walter Damrosch.

Before an audience of more than 5,000 residents of the northeastern section of the city, the Philadelphia Orchestra gave a special concert in the Stetson Auditorium this week with Mabella Addison, Herman Sandby and A. Torrello as soloists.

Virginia Snyder, piano; Clarence Cox, violin; and Anthony Liuzzi, cello, all of the Gilbert R. Combs South Broad street conservatory, gave an interesting sonata recital in the conservatory concert hall this week. The Nardini sonata in D and the Raff work, op. 128, No. 3, were the principal numbers. A somewhat lighter tinge was added to the program by Eduard Schuett's "Fairy Tales."

Horatio Connell, the Philadelphia baritone, will sing Wolf-Ferrari's "The New Life," with the Choral Society at the Academy of Music on November 19. Henry Gordon Thunder will wield the baton. Mr. Connell's distinguished interpretation of this work at its performance here last spring is well remembered as one of the most important events of the season. That the public expects it to be duplicated next week is evidenced by the big advance sale reported by the management.

Next week's concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra will be one of the most important of the current season. After an absence from the concert stage of more than three years Mme. Leopold Stokowski, probably better known to the concert goer as Olga Samaroff, will make her reappearance and play the Tschaikowsky concerto. In this appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Mme. Stokowski opens a concert tour, the first since her marriage to the brilliant young conductor three years ago, which will take her almost from coast to coast. She is to give a recital in this city on November 17. Other solo appearances are planned for New York, Boston and Chicago.

ARTHUR HERSCHMANN BARITONE

What the Critics Said:
(Aeolian Hall, Recital, November 11th)

MAX SMITH, New York Press, November 12:
Though suffering from a severe attack of catarrh, which impaired the resonance of his voice, he succeeded in arousing the admiration of his listeners through the intelligence, taste and feeling he displayed in interpreting a program that had more than ordinary interest.

HENRY T. FINK, The Evening Post, November 12:
A voice of light timbre and facile technic; Handel's "Furibondo" gave him an excellent opportunity to exhibit these qualities.

H. E. KREHBIEL, Tribune, November 12:
Mr. Herschmann has musical taste, musical intelligence and musical feeling; an agreeable quality of voice and a considerable degree of volubility. He showed excellent taste in the choice of songs and artistic intelligence in phrasing.

W. J. HENDERSON, New York Sun, November 12:
A voice possessing an ingratiating quality; in "Furibondo" he showed command of florid delivery.

W. B. CHASE, The Evening Sun, November 12.
Since Blanche Marchesi, no artist has brought a bigger surprise than Arthur Herschmann. Sincerity and sentiment together seized and held an audience quite unprepared for the conquest he made in four languages. Herschmann is the Oliver Twist of the New York season for he left his hearers asking for more. The new baritone ended a day's surprise in New York to salvos of applause.

SIGMUND SPAETH, The Evening Mail, November 12:
In spite of a program that contained few familiar numbers, Mr. Herschmann won a real success; he has a voice so well trained and so intelligently employed as to be quite capable of artistic interpretation.

NEW YORK AMERICAN, November 12:
Herschmann's song recital pleased; he possesses a voice of unusual depth and power and there was dramatic fervor and virility in Schubert's "Doppelgänger."

NEW YORK TELEGRAM, November 12:
An admirably balanced program.

BROOKLYN EAGLE, November 12:
"Doppelgänger" and "Muensohn" were impressive; "Träume" well done; "Furibondo" fluently given; "Psyche" excellent; the "Zasa" aria effective and sprightly.

TIMES, November 12:
He showed a voice of unquestionable sentiment and intelligence.

SYLVESTER RAWLINGS, N. Y. Evening World, Nov. 12:
Arthur Herschmann gave a recital last night that made one sit up and take notice. He has remarkable musical intelligence and sensibility; his voice has qualities that command respect and admiration.

MR. HALPERSEN, N. Y. Staats-Zeitung, November 13:
It is not saying too much to state that his efforts were very enjoyable, and obtained in spite of his having been in bad condition of voice, by his incisive intelligence, mental culture and a characteristic getting at the nature of the song.

Arthur Shattuck's American Tour.

After an absence of two years Arthur Shattuck, the American pianist, will return to his native land this season for a tour under the direction of Haensel & Jones. Shattuck is at present in England, where he is giving a series of recitals, having left his home in Paris some weeks after the commencement of the European war.

Shattuck will arrive in America about the middle of December, in order that he may pass the Christmas holidays with his mother at Neenah, Wis.

On January 15 and 16 he will be the soloist with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in Chicago, and also he is to be the soloist with the Minneapolis Orchestra three times. At Detroit he will be the soloist with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. Some of the other Shattuck engagements include recitals at the Lawrence Conservatory, Appleton, Wis.; Fond du Lac, Oshkosh, Wausau, Milwaukee, St. Mary's Hall, Faribault, Minn.; Carlton College, Northfield, Minn.; St. Louis, Jacksonville, Ill.; Drake University, Des Moines, Ia.; Milwaukee (return date), Chicago.

Later in the season Shattuck will go to the Pacific Coast, where he has a number of engagements.

Ellis Clark Hammann, Accompanist.

Ellis Clark Hammann appeared as the accompanist for Frank Gittelson, the violinist, when the latter was heard in recital in Boston on November 6, and in Philadelphia, November 10. He will also serve in that capacity when the young violinist appears in New York on November 23. Mr. Gittelson is to be congratulated upon his choice of an accompanist, for Mr. Hammann is an artist "par excellence," and his name on a program is sure to mean added enjoyment. Among his other November dates may be mentioned an appearance at Aeolian Hall, New York, with Horatio Connell, the baritone, November 4; at a musicale in Germantown, Pa., November 19; and with Nicholas Douty, Hermann Sandby and Edna Baugher at the Bellevue-Stratford, Philadelphia, November 27.

Serato's Initial New York Recital.

The first New York recital of Arrigo Serato, the Italian violinist, will be given at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday afternoon, November 25, at 3 o'clock.

MARIE HOOVER ELLIS

Scores Success as Soloist with Russian Symphony Orchestra

Marie Hoover Ellis is the soloist on tour with the Russian Symphony Orchestra and is meeting everywhere with much success as the appended notices will demonstrate:

Students of the piano and music lovers generally are still talking today of the wonderful interpretation of Grieg's A minor concerto given by Marie Hoover Ellis at the concert Saturday night. Mrs. Ellis is the piano soloist with the Russian Symphony Orchestra. She was a pianist of unusual gifts when she went to Vienna several years ago for study with Leschetizky, and the development of her art has been very marked. Her technic is flawless and her poetic interpretation was a revelation of new beauties in the composition.—Cedar Rapids Republican, Nov. 2, 1914.

The soloist of the evening was Marie Hoover Ellis, pianist, of Chicago. She played the Grieg A minor concerto and proved to be an artist of worth. Her tone is beautiful, sweet and singing, and aids materially from an interpretive standpoint. Her technic is big and she plays with a sympathie seriousness that establishes confidence at once.—Cedar Rapids Gazette, Nov. 3, 1914.

Marie Hoover Ellis, as soloist with the Russian Symphony Orchestra, played the Grieg A minor concerto with a facile technic, rare beauty of tone, finish and musical conception. She has had extensive study with the famous old master, Leschetizky.—Mount Vernon Hawk-Eye, Nov. 5, 1914.

Incidents of Schumann-Heink's Recent Tour.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, on October 4, just following her appearance at the Peace Gathering in Chicago, left for a four weeks' concert tour under the management of the Redpath Musical Bureau. Her first dates were in Iowa. From thence she went into Kansas and Nebraska, and later back into Illinois and Ohio. Everywhere she was greeted with great crowds and a hearty welcome, showing that her popularity with the American people is ever increasing. At Rockford, Ill., the people lined the streets for nearly a block. The accompanying photograph shows them waiting in the rain to buy tickets. This picture, in so far as the crowds are concerned, might have been duplicated in Peoria, Elgin, Springfield, Omaha, Des Moines and in the majority of places she visited. The attendance at her concerts was seldom under 2,000, and from this the number ranged to 4,000, while in Omaha it reached 5,000.

The enthusiasm with which the audiences received the great contralto was also a little short of remarkable. Hundreds came forward to greet her at the close of every concert and she was showered with beautiful roses and other cut flowers.

Incidentally, some striking new instances illustrating the great contralto's kindness of heart are recorded here for the first time. A pretty incident showing Schumann-Heink's love for children took place at Springfield, Ill. Soon after the announcement of the opening of the ticket sale for the Schumann-Heink concert, the local Redpath manager received an order by mail from A. H. Rankin, cashier of the Sagamon Loan and Trust Company, of Springfield, for three seats, specifying that they should be where his eight year old daughter could see and hear well. On the night of the concert the little girl with her parents was on hand early and full of expectation. In putting her dolly to sleep she had practised some of the same lullabies which she had heard the great contralto sing that night. She drank in with delight every note of the program. When the concert was over she ran up to the stage and told Mme. Schumann-Heink how much she had enjoyed it all. The great singer grasped the little girl in her arms, hugged and kissed her, and, taking the beautiful and expensive basket of flowers which had been sent to the stage in the evening, she insisted on the child taking every one of them.

In Lima, Ohio, where Mme. Schumann-Heink appeared on the program, there is a woman who has long been an invalid. In fact, she has not been outside her home in twelve years. When the contralto heard of this woman and of how she would have appreciated being able to attend the concert, she asked to be taken to her home. There alone with the invalid she sang three songs and once again brought sunshine to those less fortunate than herself, as she has done so often before.

Of interest also, in connection with these incidents showing the singer's big heart, was the appreciative introduction which she was given by Mrs. Chandler Starr, president of the Mendelssohn Musical Club, of Rockford, Ill. In presenting her to an audience which crowded the big hall to the doors, Mrs. Starr said that Mme. Schumann-Heink was beloved not alone because she was a great artist, but because she was the mother of a large family and a lover of home.

Everywhere Mme. Schumann-Heink went, there seemed to be an appreciation of her great personality, her love of home and her pleasure at singing for all the people rather than to a select audience.

The party on this tour consisted of Mme. Schumann-Heink; Edward MacNamara, baritone; Katharine Hoffmann, accompanist; Roxor Schumann, manager. Over part of the tour Harry P. Harrison, manager of the Redpath Bureau, Chicago, accompanied the party. The program rendered on this tour was as follows: Sextus (W. A. Mozart), "St. Paul" aria (F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy), arioso, from "Prophet" (G. Meyerbeer), Mme. Schumann-Heink; prologue from "Pagliacci" (Leoncavallo), Ed. MacNamara; "Du bist die Ruh'," "Heidenroeslein," "Der Wanderer" (Franz Schubert), "Wiegenlied" (J. Brahms), "Heimweh" (Hugo Wolf), "Liebesfeier" (Felix Weingartner), "Bolero" (Luigi Arditi), Mme. Schumann-Heink; "Two Grenadiers" (Rob. Schumann), "Red, Red Rose" (R. S. Hastings), "The Ould Plaid Shawl" (B. Haynes), Mr. MacNamara; "Dawn in the Desert" (Gertrude Ross), "Nile" (Leroux), "Good Morning, Sue" (Delibes), "Irish Folksong" (Arthur Foote), "His Lullaby" (C. J. Bond), "A Child's Prayer" (J. Harold), Mme. Schumann-Heink.

Century Sunday Concert.

A fair sized audience heard the last Sunday night concert of the present season at the Century Opera House, New York, on November 15. The feature of the evening was the singing by Gustaf Bergman of two songs by Marion Bauer, with the composer at the piano. These were "A Little Lane" and "Only of Thee and Me," the latter having been heard for the first time on November 9, when it was sung by Marie Morrisey in her Aeolian Hall recital. So marked was Mr. Bergman's success in these that he added another by the same composer as an encore.

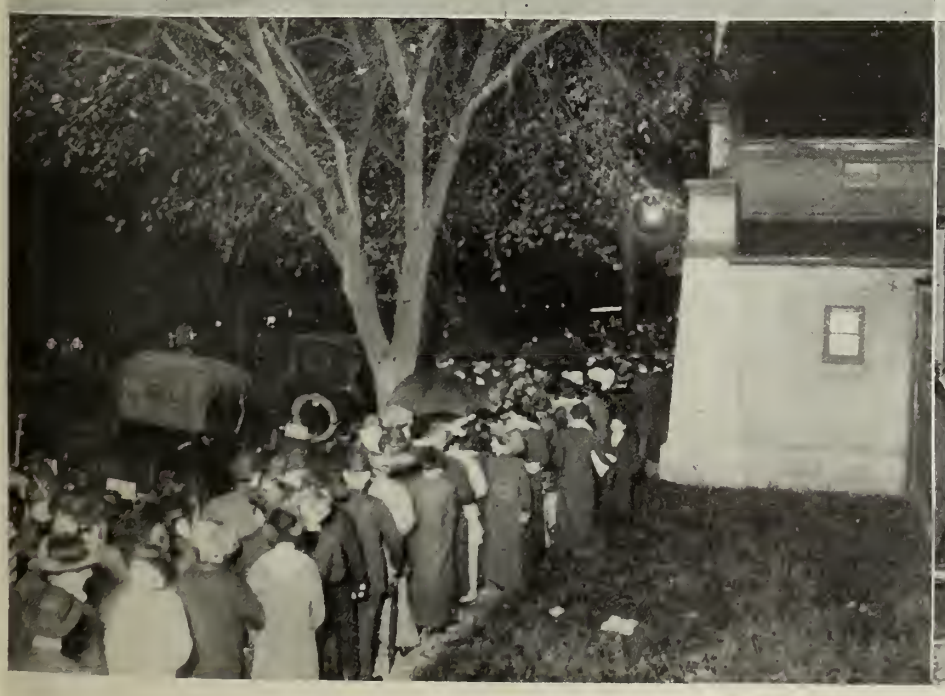
Because of the indisposition of Louis Kreidler, who was to have sung the "Drinking Song" from "Hamlet," Thomas Chalmers took his place on the program, with the "Mirror Song" from "The Tales of Hoffmann." Graham Marr made an excellent impression with "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade," and Lois Ewell was forced to repeat the waltz song from "Babette."

Augusta Lenska gave the Mother's aria from "Le Prophete," and Bettina Freeman the "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," in English.

A cello solo by a member of the orchestra, Vladimir Dubinsky, was a pleasant diversion. He gave two encores. The orchestral numbers included "Fackeltanz," Meyerbeer; the "Blue Danube," Strauss; "Jubel" overture, Weber; Boccherini's minuet, Martucci's nocturne, and Ochs' variations on a German song, imitating the way it might have been composed by ten different composers. The conductors were Josef Pasternack and Hugo Riesenfeld.

Oscar Gareissen's Studio Lecture.

Oscar Gareissen gave an interesting lecture on "What Is Breath?" at his New York studio, 64 East Thirty-fourth street, Saturday morning, November 14.



Mr. Gareissen treated this subject in a scholarly manner, briefly reviewing the physiological side and following this by touching upon the spiritual significance of the term. He referred in brief to the mystic's broad conception of its meaning, to the Biblical significance, and to the Hindu system of breathing.

CINCINNATI ORCHESTRA PRESENTS A NEW WORK

Von Dohnanyi Suite for Orchestra Splendidly Treated by Dr. Kunwald and His Players —Carl Friedberg Makes Fine Impression as Soloist with Orchestra.

Cincinnati, Ohio, November 6, 1914.

The second symphony concert which took place this afternoon in Emery Auditorium offered a welcome novelty and also served to introduce Carl Friedberg, who made his first appearance here as soloist with the orchestra.

Instead of the "Akademische Fest Overture" of Brahms, which was previously announced as the opening number for the second concert, Dr. Kunwald elected to play at this time a work new to Cincinnati, the suite for orchestra, op. 19, by Ernst von Dohnanyi, the same with which the Minneapolis orchestra opened its season last week, that occasion being its first presentation in America.

Of this suite it may be said no more delightful work of its class ever has been heard here, and Dr. Kunwald will be hard pressed to surpass it this season notwithstanding the many interesting novelties he brought home from abroad.

Beginning with an andante con variazione, the four movements present wide contrasts of style, all orchestrally rich in color and marked by individuality. The scherzo is thoroughly German in treatment, and opposed to this is a wonderfully beautiful romance, in which various orchestral instruments are given an opportunity for brief solos against a background of plucked strings The final movement, a rondo, is imbued with Spanish atmosphere through a generous use of castanets and a strongly marked dance rhythm. The orchestra did splendid work in this number and shared with Dr. Kunwald in the applause.

Carl Friedberg played the Brahms piano concerto in B flat, a work of symphonic proportions, in a masterly manner. In his presentation of this concerto he established himself as a serious artist whose virtuosity is secondary to his spiritual force and intellectual power. The second symphony of Schumann was given a notable reading, the verve and fire of the scherzo bringing into high relief the beauty and tenderness of the adagio, the whole ending in a brilliant finale. The program was repeated on Saturday night.

LATER CINCINNATI NEWS.

Cincinnati, Ohio, November 12, 1914.

The symphony concerts this week will present Edmund Burke, the Irish baritone, who made such a splendid impression here last year at the Melba-Kubelik concert, as soloist. The orchestral part of the program opens with Wagner's "Columbus" overture, a work almost unknown to local audiences despite the popularity of its composer in Cincinnati. The Handel concerto grosso, No. 7, will be the novelty of the program, with Dr. Kunwald at the piano. The symphony will be the Brahms No. 1 in C minor.

At a recent meeting of the orchestra board it was decided to continue the policy of the past in regard to soloists, permitting one encore only, providing the assisting artist is willing to give an encore at all. Orchestras in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Chicago have abolished encores entirely, as tending to mar the artistic unity of the program, but the board of the Cincinnati Orchestra has decided to permit one.

Dr. Kunwald has about perfected a highly interesting program for the first popular concert, which will be given November 25 in Music Hall. Many of the lighter and more easily understood compositions are interspersed with several of the well known classics as a foundation. In addition there will be a novelty, played for the first time by the Cincinnati Orchestra, a clever arrangement for violin and cello, "Pas des Fiancée," from Glazounow's "Scenes de Ballet," in which Emil Heermann and Julius Sturm, both popular favorites, will share honors. The soloist will be a singer, selected from a number of applicants to be heard today.

The orchestral numbers include Schubert's "Marche Militaire," orchestrated by Dr. Kunwald; the "Egmont" overture, Beethoven; the ballet music from Moszkowski's opera, "Boabdil;" the "Tannhäuser" overture, Wagner; first Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt, and the "Blue Danube" waltz, by Strauss.

SCHUMANN-HEINK IN RECITAL.

An audience of generous proportions greeted Mme. Schumann-Heink on the occasion of her appearance here in a song recital last Sunday afternoon, in Emery Auditorium. The celebrated artist sang a number of well known songs, several German ballads, and three arias from "Samson and Delilah." Her gift of always carrying her audience with her was never more in evidence than in the broadly humorous German folksongs, which elicited hearty laughter and applause. Brahms' "Sappische Ode," "Wiegenlied" and "Ständchen" showed her exquisite art at its best.

COLLEGE OF MUSIC STRING QUARTET.

The College of Music String Quartet appeared in the third of the subscription events at the Odeon on Tuesday night. The players—Johannes Miersch, first violin; William Knox, second violin; Walter Werner, viola, and Ignatz Argiewicz, cellist—were assisted by Adele Westfield, pianist. The Beethoven string quartet in G major and the Haydn string quartet in G major were given with delightful unity and musicianly insight. The superb playing of Miss Westfield in the Saint-Saëns trio in F major added much to its natural beauty. The concert was a rare treat, appreciated by the many music lovers present, as well as the general public.

A BUFFALO ORGAN RECITAL.

Karl Otto Staps, of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, presented a program of delightful variety, and also one which served to disclose his brilliant command of organ technic, in Buffalo, N. Y., on October 25. This was the first of the series of free organ concerts to be given this season under the auspices of the Civic League of Buffalo, in Elmwood Hall, on the Pan-American organ. The large hall was crowded with an enthusiastic audience, which followed the program with great interest. His program included: Concert overture, C minor, by Hollins; Beethoven's minuet in G; "Chanson de Soir," by Matthews; nocturne, A flat, Stoughton; toccata et fugue, D minor, Bach. The second part included such numbers as scenes from "Sigurd Jorsalfar," by Grieg; Handel's "Largo," Lemare's "Caprice Orientale," and scherzo from fifth sonata, by Guilmant.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL MUSICAL SERVICES.

On last Sunday evening was inaugurated the series of musical services for this season at St. Paul's Cathedral, Seventh and Plum streets, when the choir of boys and men sang Spohr's "God Thou Art Great" in a finished manner. The choir had the assistance of the following soloists: Mrs. William A. Evans, contralto; Helen Portune, soprano; John A. Hoffmann, tenor; Albert Schnicke, bass, who sang their parts with finished artistry.

May Porter Will Direct Program.

May Porter, Mus. Bac., will have charge of the program to be given before the Association of Alumnæ of the University of Pennsylvania and their friends in Houston Hall, Philadelphia, on November 21. The Apollo Quartet, of Philadelphia, will be the solo attraction. This quartet consists of Emily Stokes Hagar, soprano; Marie Stone Langston, contralto; Henry Gurney, tenor, and David Griffin, baritone. William Silvano Thunder will be the accompanist.

Mildred Potter Sings in St. Paul.

At the opening concert of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Emil Oberhoffer, director, in St. Paul, on November 5, the soloist was Mildred Potter, the New York contralto. That Miss Potter met with deserved success will be seen from a glance through these reviews of that performance by the Minneapolis and St. Paul press:

The soloist was Mildred Potter, formerly of St. Paul, who has deservedly reached a position in the musical world second to no other contralto. Miss Potter was in splendid voice and received an ovation.—Caryl B. Storrs, in the Minneapolis Tribune.

The soloist was Mildred Potter, a former St. Paul girl. . . . Miss Potter was in excellent voice and sang with sound and pleasing artistry.—Victor Nilsson, in the Minneapolis Journal.

The program itself last evening was one of the standard forms—Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, Sibelius, Liszt and "Rienzi" overture. The latter was a prelude to its great contralto aria and Miss Potter, whose home coming was a festival event. For St. Paul can well be proud of its glorious musical daughter in Mildred Potter.—Harold Gale, in the Minneapolis Daily News.

Miss Potter's voice is rich and sonorous, its range large and its registers beautifully blended. She sings with admirable freedom and good breath control. Her intonation is at all times true and her style vibrant with fine emotional quality, tempered by lofty intelligence.—T. McClure Bellows, in St. Paul Pioneer Press.

Hers is a true contralto voice—warm, rich, deep and full, with a wide range and a smoothness that is wonderful. There is not the suspicion of a break between any two of the registers, and her control of it is remarkable. Temperamental warmth and good intelligence combine with the great original gift to make of her one of the most enjoyable symphony soloists St. Paul has ever had.—Miss Bordman, in St. Paul Daily News.

Greeted with resounding applause, the soloist of the evening, Mildred Potter, stepped before the audience, which, because of her lovely voice, clear as a bell, the lower tones of which remind one so much of Schumann-Heink, and because of her overpoweringly beautiful rendition of the great aria, "Gerechter Gott," from "Rienzi," at once claimed her for their own. Her irreproachable pronunciation, which should be especially spoken of, further enbanced the rendition.

The singer, who was in extrordinarily fine voice, sang herself even more deeply into the hearts of her hearers in her second offering, the dramatic aria, "O Pretres de Baal," from the prison scene of the opera "Le Prophet," by Meyerbeer.

The enthusiastic audience would not be satisfied after this aria until the singer again appeared and delivered most beautifully the lovely aria, "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah." Miss Potter can look back with pride upon her reception in St. Paul, her native city.—T. Munch, in St. Paul Die Volkzeitung.

McCormack's Second New York Program.

John McCormack, the Irish tenor, assisted by Donald McBeath, violinist, and Edwin Schneider, pianist, will give the following program at his second New York recital this season, in Carnegie Hall, next Sunday afternoon, November 22:

Mittell Pupil Wins Praise.

Oscar Wasserberger, a boy of fourteen and a pupil of Philipp Mittell, the New York violin pedagogue, played in Plainfield, N. J., on November 6 and in Nutley, N. J., on November 7, where he won much deserved applause, being compelled to respond with two encores. His selections were "Zigeunerweisen," by Sarasate; "Liebesfreud" and "Caprice Viennois," by Kreisler. His encore numbers were "Chanson Louis XIII," by Couperin-Kreisler, and "Andantino," by Padre Martini-Kreisler. Young Wasserberger, who has studied with Mr. Mittell for five years, gives promise of becoming a fine artist.

Anne Stevenson Sings at Waldorf-Astoria.

At a musicale given on Thursday afternoon, November 5, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, by the National Society, Daughters of the Empire State, Anne Stevenson sang groups of lyric songs in French, Italian and English. One of the most striking features of Miss Stevenson's singing is the exquisite quality of tone. Her artistic finish and beautiful high pianissimo elicited rounds of applause. Especially notable was the subtlety of expression in her French numbers.

Frederic Dixon accompanied Miss Stevenson and played with much effect piano numbers by Chopin, Hinton and Rachmaninoff.

Laura Sedgewick Collins, reader and composer, gave several readings, one of special interest being "A Modern Masque," a fanciful play by Mary MacMillan.

Helen Meseritz, soprano, pupil of Anne Stevenson, who is rapidly coming to the front, sang at the annual benefit given by the Ladies Aid Society of the German Hospital and Dispensary, Hotel Biltmore, New York, on November 14.

Gilberté Season Opens.

Hallet Gilberté, the American composer, opened what bids fair to be one of the most successful seasons of his career at the Maine Festival concerts, Bangor and Portland, October 2 and 6, where he was introduced to his native State by Mrs. William Rogers Chapman as a shining light in the world of music. The following is taken from the Bangor Commercial:

> Florence Anderson Otis, a festival favorite, sang a brilliant waltz song, called "Moonlight and Starlight," by Hallet Gilberté, a Maine man, who also played the difficult accompaniment. Both song and accompaniment were an instant success, and Mrs. Otis' youth, grace, temperament and charming personality were never displayed to better advantage. This portion of the program will not soon be forgotten.

Hallet Gilberté will, within the next week, fill the following engagements: At the Three Arts Club with Vernon Archibald, baritone, in a group of his own songs, November 18; at the Cameo Club, November 19; private musicale in Short Hills, N. J., November 20; Newark, N. J., November 24.

Several past engagements include appearances at Columbia University, November 6; at Mrs. McLewee's musicale, November 15, etc.

Gilberté's "Evening Song" will soon be issued with German text, and his "Two Roses" has already appeared with French text. "I look for this to be the best season of my career in every way," says the subject of this brief notice.

BOSTON VISITED BY PROMINENT RECITALISTS.

Several Noteworthy Concerts Given Last Week—Symphony Programs and Other Mention.

Boston Office of Musical Courier, No. 6, Fenway,
Boston, Mass., November 13, 1914.

For the first time this season Symphony Hall was filled to capacity with the two long aisles on either side of the first floor filled with standing lines four abreast and the stage provided with extra chairs accommodating two hundred. The concert that attracted this throng took place last Sunday night, November 8, John McCormack being the attraction, and this record breaking Boston gathering added new credits to the Irish tenor's reputation as a marvelous drawing power. Since McMormack succeeded so well in getting the Bostonians to turn out in such large numbers to hear him, this item alone bespeaks everything for his beautiful art of song giving, and it seems, in such circumstances, rather needless for one to enter into a detailed review of the superb qualities noted in this remarkable voice. Mr. McCormack was assisted by the young Australian violinist, Donald McBeath, who gave an excellent account of himself. John McCormack opened the concert with Mozart's aria, "Il mio tesoro." Following numbers, which, as usual, necessitated the adding of encores, were Rachmaninoff's "Oh, Thou Billowy Field," "Sylvelin," by Sinding, a short group of old Irish melodies with new arrangements, and "Lovely Kind and Kindly Loving," by Cyril Scott, "Pluck This Little Flower," by Landon Ronald, with Coleridge-Taylor's "Life and Death" marking a close.

Fremstad and Amato Joint Recital.

The regular Sunday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall brought Olive Fremstad and Pasquale Amato in a joint recital. Both singers are favorites in Boston and a good sized audience greeted their appearance. Mr. Amato opened the program with a fine rendition of the "Masked Ball" aria, "Eri tu." A group of Russian songs in which Borodine, Moussorgsky and Balakirew were represented served to display the exquisite refinement and admirable diction one finds ever present in the Metropolitan Opera baritone's singing. Several old French and Italian arias and two German ballades by La Forge revealed the rare versatility of the artist.

Mme. Fremstad was heard in two of Hugo Wolf's songs, other selections representing Jean Sibelius, Emil Sjorgen, Sigurd Lie and Felix Weingartner. A set of folksongs from the Troubador, Bulgarian, Moorish, Scottish and American schools formed delightful vehicles for the prima donna to demonstrate her attractive art, lovely personality and versatile musicianship. The duet from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," as sung by two such brilliant operatic stars, formed an ideal finale to a most artistic entertainment.

Arrigo Serato's American Debut.

Last Sunday afternoon, Arrigo Serato, the Italian violinist, made his first appearance in America, when he played for the Boston Music School Settlement at the Boston Theatre. George Mitchell, tenor, assisted in the giving of the program, which was as follows: Concerto in D minor (Wieniawski), Mr. Serato; "Triste Ritorno" (Barthelemy), "Visione" (Leboffe), "Il Primo Amore" (Widor), Mr. Mitchell; sonata in E minor (Bach), Mr. Serato; "Yesterday and Today" (Spross), "I Hear a Thrush at Eve" (Cadman), "Invictus" (Huhn), Mr. Mitchell; "Adagio ma non Troppo" (Bruch), "Abendlied" (Schumann), polonaise (Vieuxtemps), Mr. Serato. The audience at this second concert of the series given for the people crowded the house as it did two weeks ago.

Ethel Leginska's All-Chopin Program.

Twenty-four etudes and the B flat minor sonata constituted the all-Chopin program which Ethel Leginska, the pianist, gave on Monday afternoon, November 9, in Jordan Hall. Miss Leginska's fine pianistic qualifications are suitable to a wide variety of demands and her fine interpretative ability stamps her work as unique and most attractive. The petite lady gave a splendid performance throughout.

Edith Thompson in Piano Recital.

Edith Thompson, a local pianist, was heard in recital at Steinert Hall, Wednesday afternoon, November 11. The program, which contained mainly short pieces, was beautifully performed, but compositions of a more pretentious nature would have been more suitable to this pianist's ability. A Beethoven sonata, op. 27, closed the first group, which also contained compositions by Siloti, Couperin and Daquin. Three of MacDowell's piano sketches were followed by some Chopin numbers, and the final group contained an impromptu by Fauré, "Poissons d'or," by Debussy, and Albeniz's "Seguidilla." Miss Thompson played in good style throughout the recital, and her accomplishments are to be placed in a high rank.

Albert Spalding's Rare Art.

Albert Spalding gave a violin recital on Thursday afternoon, November 12, in Jordan Hall, and again showed that he is an artist possessed of unusual gifts. The American violinist attracted a large and enthusiastic audience, and the keen appreciation for his brilliant performance was manifested through loud demands for numerous encore numbers. Corelli's sonata in D, magnificently played, was the opening selection. In the adagio and fugue for violin alone by Bach the true depth of the Spalding virtuosity was revealed, and immediately following this, in the Mozart concerto, his playing was just about perfection itself. Two of the violinist's own compositions and his arrangement of Paganini's "La Campanella," together with an adagietto by Bizet, and Brahms' seventh Hungarian dance, formed the balance of the program. The extreme refinement of Spalding's musicianship is ever in evidence, and his Boston success was immense. It is sincerely to be hoped that Mr. Spalding may again favor us with another appearance.

Willard Flint Sings in Connecticut.

Willard Flint, the Boston basso, has some fine press clippings from the Manchester, Conn., papers in praise of his work at the opening concert of the Popular Entertainment Course given there on Thursday evening, October 29. Mr. Flint, on this occasion, sang various groups of modern German and English ballades, and also participated in a quartet rendition of Liza Lehmann's song cycle, "In a Persian Garden." His versatility as a song recitalist, and the exceptional quality of his voice, coupled with fine musicianship, have gained for him a wide reputation. Mr. Flint will be heard extensively in recital, concert and oratorio throughout the New England section during the early and latter part of this season, while the intermediate midwinter months will be spent on a Western tour booked by the Briggs management.

Gertrude Rennyson's Song Recital.

Thursday evening, November 12, Gertrude Rennyson gave the following song recital program, assisted by Bernthaler, accompanist, in Jordan Hall: Ponchielli's "Suicide," aria from "La Gioconda," Saint-Saëns' "La Gouche," Bergerette's "Maman dites-moi" and "Jean Fillettes," Chaminade's "L'ete," Brahms' "Sapphic Ode," Schubert's "Du bist die Ruh," and "Gretchen am Spinnrade." Grieg's "Ein Traum," Rotoli's "On the Wild Rose Tree." Tipton's "Three Shadows," and "Spirit Flower," MacDowell's "Blue Bell" and Wagner's "Dich theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser."

Pavlowa Dances in Boston.

Anna Pavlowa gave three performances at the Boston Opera House on Friday night, Saturday afternoon and evening of last week. The complete Pavlowa 1914-15 repertoire was presented and the remarkable work of the great terpsichorean artist and her assisting company made a deep impression in this city.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

At the fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, November 13, and Saturday night, November 14, the Sibelius fourth symphony was given a fine reading by Dr. Muck and his band. Concertmaster Anton Witek was the soloist in the second part of the program. His playing of Beethoven's D major concerto won a rousing reception from the audience, which has learned to cherish his invaluable service to the local organization. Mr. Witek revealed technical mastery, tonal charm and dignified interpretation. Another Beethoven number, the oft played "Egmont" overture, closed the program.

Victor Winton.

S. Wesley Sears, Organist.

What with routine duties as organist and choirmaster of two large churches, recitals, concerts, composition and editorial duties, S. Wesley Sears, the widely known Philadelphia organist, faces an unusually busy season this year. For several years Mr. Sears has held the post of choirmaster at St. James Protestant Episcopal, one of the most important positions of this kind in the country, with notable success; beginning on October 1 he assumed a similar duty at the Church of the Advocate, Eighteenth and Diamond streets, Philadelphia. Beside duties of administration and choir training this means two recitals every Sunday, several special series of concerts, and at least two Lenten oratorios.

On December 9 Mr. Sears will conduct a special concert at the Church of the Advocate under the auspices of the Philadelphia chapter of the American Guild of Organists. It is known that eleven choirs are to contribute their best material for this service, though details of the concert and the program are as yet unannounced.

Mr. Sears has drawn specifications for a new organ at Cresson, near Pittsburgh, and in the last few weeks has supervised its construction. He will open it with a recital before the end of the year. This record of varied and manifold activity proves conclusively that there are yet lines of musical activity unaffected by wars and rumors of wars.

D'Arnalle's Appearances.

That Vernon d'Arnalle is an artist is well known, and from the recent press notices of his concerts in the United States it is evident that he has the faculty of making his audiences enjoy every moment of his art with him.

D'Arnalle has been heard lately at the Schubert Club, of St. Paul, and the Tuesday Musical Club, of Knoxville, and his recitals in those places will be long remembered.

Although he has been but a few weeks in this country, it looks as if this artist would have a very busy season, for each appearance brings a group of others.

D'Arnalle is greatly impressed with the enormous musical development of this country in the last years, and the deep and enthusiastic interest of the public. He finds the American audience extraordinarily intelligent and responsive.

De Cisneros as Brangaene in Paris.

Eleonora de Cisneros, who is now appearing in America under the management of Antonia Sawyer, had the unique distinction of being one of the cast which appeared in the last German opera, which will be sung in Paris for many a long day. This was "Tristan and Isolde" with the Anglo-Americaine Saison at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees, with Margarete Matzenauer as Isolde, de Cisneros as Brangaene, Ferrari-Fontana as Tristan, Amato as Kurvenal, and Egon Pollack conducting.

"Three Centuries of Primme Donne" Praised.

Yvonne de Tréville should feel gratified at the New York press' approval of her unique costume song recital, "Three Centuries of Primme Donne," given in Acolian Hall on the afternoon of Friday, November 6, as the following attests:

It was a unique and picturesque recital.—New York Herald.

Yvonne de Tréville, who is well known for her charming soprano voice, gave a costume recital at Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. She has the style as well as the voice to sing the early works.—New York Evening Post.

Yvonne de Tréville was heard here in an unusual program. It is a long time since New York has had so unusual a recital as that given yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall.—New York World.

The fact that she wore dresses of the style affected in the period of Mlle. de Maupin, Jenny Lind and Yvonne de Tréville neither added nor detracted from the interesting music on her program, nor the interesting manner in which she sang it.—New York Tribune.

Yvonne de Tréville gave an unusual entertainment. A costume recital it was called and it offered the soprano an opportunity of appealing to the eye as well as to the ear. The program ranged over three centuries and in each Mlle. de Tréville wore costumes representing some noted personage of that time—Mlle. de Maupin, Jenny Lind and finally herself.—New York Press.

There was no doubt for her success in those portions of the program where delicacy, charm and refinement were the requisites. She is accomplished in all the effects and graces of artistry.—New York Times.

A versatile little woman is Yvonne de Tréville. In her recital she sang in seven languages in addition to the nameless phonetic language of coloratura, which defies human comprehension; she represented three different characters and graced the costumes of three different centuries, and she interpreted the extremes of tragedy and comedy with a voice which was equally at home in the tricks of technic and in music of dramatic intensity.—New York Evening Mail.

A concert in costume can be a pretty entertainment when judgment in the selection of songs is paired with taste in their delivery. Miss de Tréville loked well in her three costumes. In her delivery of some of the songs the soprano showed both taste and intelligence.—New York Sun.

Audience charmed by unusual program! Her brilliant flutelike soprano, heard to advantage in coloratura test pieces, won her rounds of applause. The sweet, tender qualities of the soprano were brought out delightfully in a group of Scandinavian folksongs.—Brooklyn Standard Union.

A delightful program of three periods with coloratura. To say she sang in seven languages gives no adequate idea of her accomplishments. It was the spirit and thorough understanding of her work as well as her lovely voice that counted.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Bauer Plays Brahms.

Harold Bauer, the soloist at the second pair of concerts of the New York Symphony Society's present season, last Friday afternoon, November 13, and Sunday afternoon, November 15, at Aeolian Hall, played the Brahms D minor concerto, which is perhaps, except for its second movement, the most unpianistic of all concertos. By his masterly laying out of the music and his great breadth of tone Bauer succeeded, however, in making the first movement, with its overthick accompaniment, as plausible as is possible for any pianist to do. The adagio, offering more opportunities for real pianistic effects, was splendidly done, with great beauty alike in tone and phrasing, while the final rondo—one of those movements which shows how strongly Brahms felt the Hungarian influence—was played with splendid dash and vigor and worked up to a really inspiring climax. The pianist was applauded warmly after each movement and there was a tremendous outburst of enthusiasm at the end.

The rest of the program was not particularly interesting. It began with a respectable performance of Weber's "Oberon" overture, followed by an equally respectable and uninspiring one of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. Then came "St. Francis Preaching to the Birds," orchestrated by Felix Mottl from Liszt's piano piece. Presumably those who like this work for the piano like it even better orchestrated, for the imitation of birds is more lifelike, but many persons, among whom is the present writer, detest it in both forms. It was badly played.

The first horn distinguished himself during the program by a very woolly tone in the "St. Francis" solo, followed by a hardly less delightful sour note and a false entrance in the concerto accompaniment.

John Barnes Wells in Meriden.

John Barnes Wells, the New York tenor, was recently heard in "The Swan and the Skylark," produced under the direction of Mr. Southwick in the city of Meriden, Conn., and in which the tenor part is highly important. Mr. Wells sang the solos, and the following is quoted from the Meriden Morning Record of November 3:

Peculiarly felicitous was the selection of John Barnes Wells to sing the swan music. Mr. Wells has that most unusual possession—a pure tenor voice. There is no baritone quality about it. It is smooth and ingratiating and there is a floating quality which is very satisfying. His enunciation is clear and his method of tone production is so excellent that one does not think of the training that produced the effect. He sings with the greatest ease, and whether in the light, delicate, fanciful measures of the swan or the beautifully dramatic and dignified music of the aria, "The Sorrows of Death," by Mendelssohn, there is the same even beauty of tone. THE FLONZALEY QUARTET IN THE WEST.

Tribute to a Carrol Badham Preyer Pupil.

Margaret Hellär, the young and charming soprano and singer of songs of the "Sunny South," is at present concertizing in the West, but she expects to return to New York about the first of the year, when her many friends and admirers in the East will have a chance to hear her. Miss Hellär, who is a pupil of Caroll Badham Preyer, the New York vocal teacher, has been well received wherever she has appeared, as these press opinions witness:

A young New York artist of beautiful voice and pronounced individuality.—Denver (Col.) Press, 1913.

Margaret Hellär, a most accomplished singer, delighted the audience last night in the last number of the season for the Ottawa University. . . . She is a lyric soprano with an unusually [illegible] and attractive voice. . . . One of the most beautiful was an aria from "Madame Butterfly" and a German group, including the beautiful "Ungeduld," by Schubert.—Ottowa (Can.) Evening Herald, May 27, 1914.

MARGARET HELLAR.

A French group of bergerettes was very enjoyable. She sang them with a delicacy of touch and purity of tone which rendered them wholly delightful.—Chicago Tribune.

A rarely lovely voice, charm and magnetism.—Tacoma (Wash.) Press.

Margaret Hellar, a young woman of charming presence, sang "Elsa's Dream," from "Loheagrin," with much tonal beauty.—Denver (Col.) Republic.

Mme. Hellär possesses a lyric voice of exquisite quality. . . . It showed the masterly way in which she could handle her voice. . . . Mme. Hellär is at all times artistic and has a stage presence that makes it a delight to see her as well as hear her.—Wichita (Kan.), Beacon, 1913.

Margaret Hellär, of New York City, has a very beautiful voice and her singing of the "Madame Butterfly" aria with her encore of "Will o' the Wisp" completely charmed her hearers at her first appearance; . . . a young woman of handsome appearance and charming manner.—Hutchinson (Kan.) Globe, 1914.

She made a pronouncedly favorable impression with her beautiful voice in Bishop's "Lo, Hear the Gentle Lark," with flute accompaniment. She was enthusiastically received and charmed everyone with an unaffected and delightful personality.—New York Press.

Zimbalist's Violin Mastery.

Among the recognized "stars" of the violin world, Efrem Zimbalist occupies a peculiarly agreeable position in New York, for not only has he been recognized here as a master of his instrument since his first quiet public entry into this city, but also through his marriage to Alma Gluck (a product of the metropolis and one of its warm favorites), his hold on the affections of our concert goers has become strengthened, and he is looked upon as one of our own artistic circle who in all likelihood will become a permanent part of our local and national musical life.

An unusually large audience turned out to do Zimbalist honor at Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon, November 14, and they were rewarded by finding the player in impeccable form, his technic being as finished and brilliant as ever, his tone as pure and warm, his musicianship as sound, and his taste as unfailing. Handel's E major sonata and a trio of Liebersohn arrangements of old classics by Grazioli, Couperin, and Rameau, as well as a Haydn "Vivace" adapted by Auer, served to reveal the poise and dignity of the player in music requiring stylistic knowledge and interpretative command rather than kindling emotional warmth, and Zimbalist answered the requirements like a true artist, eager in performance and ripe in experience.

Bach's chaconne carried on the serious character of the first half of Zimbalist's program and he presented a remarkable reading of the great violin epic, a reading instinct with noble feeling, searching tonal appeal, magnificent control of bow, and unerring sense for the contrapuntal beauties which, next to its exalted mood, constitute the chief musical value of the Bach chaconne. Zimbalist's performance was in every way that of a veritable prince of the fiddle.

Goldmark's aria displayed the artist's tone in its broad and virile accents, while Tschaikowsky, Kallinikow and Kreisler tidbits emphasized the resource of nuance and piquant attractiveness which Zimbalist knows how to bring from his instrument when he seeks merely to charm.

That always delightful Wieniawski arrangement of "Faust" melodies gave Zimbalist rare opportunities to shine as a virtuoso and his scintillating technic and temperamental verve stirred the listeners to demonstrations of pleasure which resulted in forcing the obliging artist into granting several very welcome encores. The concert was altogether one of the emphatic successes of the early season.

Manuscript Society Concerts.

Works by the following composers will be sung and played at the first concert, twenty-sixth season, of the Manuscript Society of New York, Friday evening, November 20, at the National Arts Club: D. W. Miller, of Norwood, Ohio; M. Silver, W. R. Cox, E. Hague, E. Kilenyi and Vivian Burnett, of New York. The following artists will participate: May MacGibeny, Catherine Bryce, sopranos; Lisbet Hoffmann, Lillian Sauvage Poole, pianists; Hyman Eisenberg, cellist. Following the concert the usual refreshments and social period will be enjoyed by the members and guests.

Kefer and Goodman Recital.

Paul Kefer, formerly solo cellist of the New York Symphony Orchestra, and Lawrence Goodman, pianist, gave a recital at the von Ende School of Music, Tuesday evening, November 17. This served to introduce Paul Kefer as a member of the faculty of the school. Mr. Kefer and Mr. Goodman played Boellman's sonata, op. 40, besides several groups of solo pieces.

family quartet, who was born on October 12, this year. The quartet is now made up of Mr. and Mrs. Seagle, son John and the young lady in the picture, who is named Eleanor after her mother, and who is going to be called Nell, as her mother is.

Mr. Seagle, just returned to New York from a very successful trip through the East and South, will remain here teaching for about two weeks and will then leave again for another extended concert tour.

Marie Morrisey's New York Recital.

Marie Morrisey made her second bow to an Aeolian Hall audience on Monday evening, November 9, when, as at her New York debut last season, the audience was of good size and showed great enthusiasm for her singing.

And it liked her appearance too, for Mme. Morrisey in her statuesque beauty, greatly enhanced by her handsome costume and the tasteful stage setting of palms, was more than ordinarily agreeable to look upon.

Her ambitious program included standard works from Italian, German, French and English composers, and she met all its taxing demands.

Mrs. Morissey showed that she has a voice of much natural beauty, of wide range, one capable of versatile attainment. Her German interpretations stood next to the English, in successful presentation. She was especially effective in the Bruno Huhn cycle, "Love's Triumph," sung for the first time in toto on this occasion. She emphasized strongly her dramatic ability in this particularly. Mr. Huhn was at the piano. Incidentally this cycle is being sung by leading singers in recital throughout the country.

Mrs. Morrisey's diction, in general, was good. The "Agnus Dei" (Bizet) concluded the program effectively; Bruno Huhn was at the organ, Elsa Cowen, her skillful accompanist, at the piano, and W. Paulding De Mike played the cello.

The enthusiasm of Mrs. Morrisey's listeners seemed even greater at the conclusion than after the first few numbers, a proof sufficient of her ability to interest and please in a song recital.

Harry Munro in America.

Harry Munro, the basso cantante, is another American singer whose plans were upset by the European war.

Two years ago, after having achieved success in concert and oratorio in America, Mr. Munro left for Europe to enter the operatic field, where he soon made an enviable reputation for himself among the younger operatic singers.

Last spring Mr. Munro looked forward to brilliant prospects in Europe, among them a prospective appearance at the Berlin Royal Opera, but Fate ruled otherwise and he returned to this country again to enter the American concert and oratorio field.

With this end in view Mr. Munro has placed himself under the management of G. Dexter Richardson, who has already booked him for several engagements, among which are a Brooklyn recital, a performance of "The Messiah" in Trenton, N. J., and two spring festivals.

Wittgenstein Encomiums.

Attached are a few press notices relative to Victor Wittgenstein's appearances both abroad and in America:

This artist possesses, together with a glowing temperament, a strong sense of the romantic and an inborn instinct of interpreting the underlying ideas of the composer. . . . If he plays everything in this heroic manner he will without doubt be counted among the pianistic lions.—Amsterdam (Holland) Telegraaf.

Technically this young pianist holds his own with many of his older and more experienced colleagues. With a sure and clean cut execution, he combines a soft and yet firm touch, which enables him to produce a beautiful singing tone.—Elberfeld (Germany) General Anzeiger.

Victor Wittgenstein belongs to that class of well equipped pianists who control a big technic.—Berlin Deutsche Nachrichten.

In Victor Wittgenstein, we made the acquaintance of a musician thoroughly equipped technically, a pianist whose beautiful touch modulates at his command, for he controls all the nuances. The eloquence of his pianissimo and brilliancy of his passage work were marked by beautiful shading.—Baden-Baden Badeblatt.

Victor Wittgenstein possesses great ability, unusual musicianship and displays a healthy sense of the romantic.—Berlin Musik Salon.

With such natural gifts as the young player unquestionably possesses, he could hardly have failed to acquire under such masters a good technical equipment.—New York Press.

The playing of Brahms' rhapsody and the Schumann romance was of excellent quality, and the splendid Rubinstein etude was given a very brilliant rendition. . . . Mr. Wittgenstein is young, his technic is good, he has power, an adequate command of tone and an excellent idea of contrasts.—Hartford (Conn.) Courant.

Victor Wittgenstein gave a stirring interpretation of MacDowell's "Sonata Tragica." There is in this remarkable piece of work a breadth and depth of conception that might defy the interpretative genuis of much older men, but Wittgenstein rendered it with sterling majesty and a sensitive regard for its finest qualities. The last movement was especially beautiful.—Philadelphia (Pa.) Ledger.

Mr. Wittgenstein is a pianist of warmth and of poetic feeling. That his sense for the classics is deep was proven by the very well developed Beethoven which he played.—He brought real poetry and much interest into the sonata in D major, op. 28. He played with a highly polished, clean technic and his phrasing was musicianly and full of intelligence.—New York Evening Mail.

Arthur Herschmann's New York Recital.

Aeolian Hall, New York, contained an audience of friends, judging from the applause, at the song recital given by Arthur Herschmann on the evening of November 11. A program of many novelties served to interest the listener, who heard a pleasing baritone voice, of considerable range and volume. Mr. Herschmann sang with distinct enunciation and manly style, his French songs allowing him to do best with his limited vocal resources. He had to sing Levitt's very original song, "Gerippentanz," twice, and the same was the case with Kaun's "My Native Land."

To Mr. Herschmann is due the excellent translations of most of the French songs, several of the Italian and one of the German. He has undoubted good taste in this.

Max Herzberg played excellent accompaniments. The program was as follows: "Chi Vuol la Zingarella," Paisielli; "Come Raggio di Sol," Caldara; "Furibondo Spira il Vento," Handel; "Der Musensohn," "Der Doppelgänger," Schubert; "Träume," Wagner; "Selig sind die Verfolgung Leiden," Kienzl; "Wie Wundersam," Schillings; "Gerippentanz," Richard Levett; "Der Freund," Wolf; "Psyche," Paladilhe; "Benvenuto," Diaz; "Les Berceaux," Gabriel Fauré; "Le Plongeur," Ch. M. Widor; "Le Vent," "En Route," Ch. René; "My Native Land," H. Kaun; "False Cupid," "To Pyrrha," R. H. Walthew; "Ridonami la Calma," Tosti; "Zaza," Leoncavallo.

Birdice Blye's Concert Season.

Among the cities which Birdice Blye visited during her five months' sojourn in Europe this year there was none that she enjoyed more than Venice, and the accompanying snapshot shows her feeding the pigeons at St. Marks.

Miss Blye has not found that the business depression due to the war has in the least affected her concert season, the applications for dates having been fully as many as usual.

BIRDICE BLYE FEEDING THE PIGEONS AT ST. MARKS, VENICE.

On account of conflicting dates Miss Blye was obliged to decline an offer made her by one of the prominent managers for an extended tour to the Pacific Coast. Miss Blye also declined a very advantageous offer from the East to appear in vaudeville in the principal cities, which came to her unsolicited.

THE APOLLO CLUB,
Portland, Ore., October 26, 1914.

Alma Voedisch, Chicago, Ill.:

DEAR MISS VOEDISCH—The Claussen concert was one grand success. Our audience was composed of Portland's best musical people and the Heilig Theatre was practically filled.

I have sent you one of the programs and advertising matter, which we sent out to about the number of 10,000.

We want the first chance at Claussen next season, and hope you will protect us. Every one I have met who was present at this concert was most enthusiastic. I have heard most of the big artists and she certainly has them all beaten.

We are much pleased with the unqualified success with which Mme. Claussen met and the prestige gained for the club.

We are awaiting the reply from the theatre for February 8 for the MacDermids and will know in a few days.

With best wishes, very truly yours,
(Signed) SIDNEY LATHROP, Secretary.

Spiering's Lucky Violin.

So much has been written about celebrated Cremona instruments in the possession of well known artists that it is quite a unique experience to meet with one who had used a rare Joseph Guarnerius del Jesu for more than twenty years in his public work without making the fact an advertising medium.

Theodore Spiering bought this violin in 1892 when still a student at the Royal High School in Berlin. That same year he returned to America after a four year course under Joseph Joachim. This was the summer in which Hamburg was visited by a violent cholera epidemic, so the young artist, sailing on a Hamburg boat, was quarantined in New York Harbor for two weeks. Great was his anxiety about the newly acquired treasure when it was known that all passengers' baggage and belongings would have to be fumigated, as a number of deaths had occurred during the voyage.

Pleading and an exposition of Spiering's art finally led to the exemption of the violin, which otherwise probably might have been ruined. This early incident in the history of the instrument was recently recalled when Mr. Spiering, twenty-two years older in experience and renown, landed again in New York fresh from the European war zone. Once more good fortune had prevented harm to the violin and its owner, and doubtless both will find here during the present musical season the same favor as of yore.

Mme. Riheldaffer's Bookings.

Grace Hall Riheldaffer, soprano, is at present on tour and from the following list of engagements it will be seen that her time from now until December 9 is well occupied. The list speaks for itself:

October—8, Milwaukee, Wis.; 12, New Castle, Pa.; 13, Warren, Pa.; 14, Celina, Ohio; 16, Monroe, Mich.; 17, Adrian, Mich.; 20, St. Johns, Mich.; 21, Charlotte, Mich.; 22, Ligonier, Ind.; 23, Mt. Vernon, Ind.; 24, Crown Point, Ind.; 26, Lebanon, Ind.; 28, Wichita, Kan.; 29, Alva, Okla.; 30, Sterling, Kan.

November—2, Nowata, Okla.; 4, Atchison, Kan.; 5, Tarkio, Mo.; 6, Fremont, Neb.; 7, York, Neb.; 9, Mason City, Ia.; 11, Cheboygan, Wis.; 13, Racine, Wis.; 16, Lansing, Mich.; 17, Howell, Mich.; 18, Hudson, Mich.; 19, Huntington, Ind.; 20, Montpelier, Ind.; 23, Bryan, Ohio; 24, Shelbyville, Ind.; 25, Petersburg, Ind.; 26, Princeton, Ind.; 28, Edinboro, Pa.

December—1, Maysville, Ky.; 2, Glasgow, Ky.; 4, Fairmont, W. Va.; 8, Galeton, Pa.; 9, Reading, Pa.

Francis Rogers' Recital.

To a lover of the truly fine in singing a recital by Francis Rogers, the baritone, offers genuine enjoyment, likewise valuable illustration in the art of correct singing.

At a Rogers recital one is given an admirable example of each phase of vocal technic and of an intelligent interpretation combined with a strong musical sense. His phrasing arouses admiration immediately, his diction is clear in all the languages in which he sings, and his singing of those languages shows that he understands them. His runs are delightfully smooth and even and he is equally skillful in songs demanding a broad legato or delicate finesse.

At his New York recital, Thursday afternoon, November 12, in the Little Theatre, Mr. Rogers sang in Italian, French, German and English.

The good sized and discriminating audience showed its pleasure after each number, particularly of the "L'Amour de Mai" (old French) of the first group and the Cornelius difficult "Ein Ton" of the second group, one verse of the first and the last of which were repeated.

The following shows his well chosen and well arranged program: "Vittoria," Carissimi; "Nina," Pergolesi; "Bois Epais," Lulli; "Vive Henri IV!" "L'Amour de Moi," old French; "If Thou Thy Heart Wilt Give Me," J. S. Bach (?); "Si, tra i Ceppi ("Berenice"), Handel; "Das Veilchen," Mozart; "Ein Ton," Cornelius; "Aufenthalt," Schubert; "An dic Nachtigall," "O liebliche Wangen," Brahms; "Cradle Song of the Peasant," "Love Song of the Idiot," "Field Marshal's Death," Moussorgsky; Folksong, Greek; "The Sally Gardens," "The Banks of the Daisies," Irish; "Turn Ye to Me," Scotch; "The Hundred Pipers," Lady Nairne.

Isadore Luckstone accompanied Mr. Rogers in his usual able manner. It was noticeable that Mr. Luckstone played the entire program from memory.

A Dudley Buck Studio Recital.

Dudley Buck pupils who appeared at the November 5 studio "Hour of Music" were Enrichetta Onelli, soprano; Katherine Galloway, soprano; Marie Morrisey, contralto, and Robert Gottschalk, tenor. These were the numbers: "Hayfield and Butterflies" (Del Riego), "Ah, Love, but a Day" (Beach), "A Southern Song" (Ronald), Miss Galloway; "Pour un Baiser" (Tosti), "Le Rêve de des Grieux," from "Manon" (Massenet), "Il Neige" (Bemberg), Mr. Gottschalk; "Voi lo sapete" (Mascagni), Mme. Onelli; "Invocation to Eros" (Kuersteiner); "Love, I Have Won You" (Ronald), "My Star" (Beach), Mme. Morrisey; "Donna vorrei morir" (Tosti), "Le Rondini" (Poggi), "Des Oiseaux" (Hue), "If I Were a Bee" (Rogers), Mme. Onelli; "Birds in the High Hall Garden" (Whelpley), "Come to the Garden, Love" (Salter), "Expectancy" (La Forge), "Autumn" (Matthews), Mr. Gottschalk; "Ombra Leggeria," from "Dinorah" (Meyerbeer), Miss Galloway.

Edgar Schofield, baritone, was called away at the last moment to fulfill a professional engagement, but Mr. Buck sang in his place, much to the delight of those who were present. Mr. Buck gave the "Pagliacci" prologue, "My Heart Is Like a Garden-Close" (Woodman), and "Invictus" (Huhn). As is usual with Dudley Buck pupils' programs, this one also proved not only very enjoyable, but instructive as well.

The recital occurred in Mr. Buck's Aeolian Hall studio, New York.

Elsie T. Cowen, at the piano, added materially to the enjoyment of the evening by her excellent accompaniments.

A Bloch Announcement.

Nettie F. Bloch, of New York, announces the marriage of her daughter, Blanche, to Alexander Bloch, an Sunday, November 1. Mr. Bloch is a young violinist of brilliant talent and attainments and is rapidly coming to the fore. Blanche Bloch accompanied him at his recent New York recital, proving herself to be a capable musician and pianist.

In This Country The Entire Season

BAUER was received with such acclaim on the occasion of his New York Recital Nov. 7th, that A SECOND AEOLIAN HALL RECITAL IS ALREADY ANNOUNCED FOR SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 5th.

The following excerpts from the critical comments on his first recital are typical:

WORLD—"He moved his many and admiring hearers to applause such as is seldom heard in a New York concert room."

TRIBUNE—"He is an artist, whose technical mastery is supreme, whose sincerity is unquestioned."

AMERICAN—"He expressed his many and varied tonal qualities, his taste in emotional expressiveness and in poetic tenderness."

TIMES—"Mr. Bauer's playing delighted his listeners by its vigor and power, its grace and poetical feeling, its variety and depth of tonal coloring."

"Aida" at the Century.

"Aida" was performed for the first time this season at the Century Opera House, New York, Tuesday evening, November 10. The cast was in many respects the same as that which presented this opera at this house last season. "Aida" was also given at the Century Opera opening last year, and was repeated late in the season. The only member of the present cast who was not heard here in last season's performances is Henry Weldon, whose splendid voice and magnificent stage presence are both well adapted to the role of Ramfis. Mr. Weldon sang with breadth and clarity of tone and much dignity and charm of interpretation.

As the king, Alfred Kaufman gave a creditable performance. Kathleen Howard was stirring and passionate in the role of Amneris, giving it brilliant rendition. Her clear enunciation was especially commendable. She was particularly effective throughout the entire second act, where her histrionic ability came into play.

On the opening night, the role of Radames was taken by Morgan Kingston, whose voice is especially well suited to this music and who gave a dignified impersonation of the part. His acting, especially in the last act, was strong and often impassioned. Gustaf Bergman alternated with Mr. Kingston in this role, singing the part with brilliancy and force and acting it with his accustomed vigor.

The intensity of Louis Kreidler's interpretation of the role of Amonasro aroused much favorable comment, and it would be difficult to find any suggestion for improvement in his acting. He lends to it all of that savagery which one feels is an intrinsic part of the Ethiopian king's character, but with all his intensity of acting, he never for a moment loses his dignity nor his perfect vocal control. It is a masterly interpretation.

The role of Aida was sung by Lois Ewell and was well done, although this is not one of the parts most suited to Miss Ewell's brilliant talents.

The ballet was effective and interesting, particularly the work of Albertina Rasch, the talented premiere danseuse of the Century Opera Company.

Agide Jacchia conducted the opera, and Jacques Coini was responsible for the stage management and in this regard there was an enormous improvement over last season's performance. The pageantry of the opera was more effectively carried out. Unstinted praise, however, cannot be meted out to this side of the performance, as there were certain incongruities, and, at least in the opening performance, a feeling of uncertainty. The stage also was overcrowded, especially in the second scene of the second act.

Philharmonic Plays Tschaikowsky.

The second pair of concerts of the New York Philharmonic Society on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, November 12 and 13, at Carnegie Hall, presented an all Tschaikowsky program, with Leo Schulz, cellist, as soloist. These concerts were in no way a test of the durability of Tschaikowsky's charm, or of his ability to furnish an entire afternoon's or evening's entertainment, simply because the program was so arranged as to offer two of the great Russian's best works at the beginning and two of his poorest at the end, with the natural and inevitable result that there was a feeling of weariness and a waning of interest and enthusiasm on the part of the very large audiences which completely filled the vast auditorium and gave conclusive proof of the drawing power of Tschaikowsky's name.

The program consisted of the "Romeo and Juliet" overture, the "Pathetique" symphony, "Variations on a Rococo Theme" for cello and the "Capriccio Italien."

Like all great composers, with the single exception of Wagner, Tschaikowsky had his inequalities, and between works of marvelous intensity, of unparalleled beauty and charm, he produced things of little worth and among these latter are the cello variations and the Italian caprice. It would be impossible for any man to remain constantly keyed up to the state of exaltation which must have inspired Tschaikowsky when he conceived his masterpieces, and that his spirit flagged during intermediate periods should give no cause for surprise.

Of the works of Beethoven, Schubert, Mozart and the rest of the recognized giants of the past, only the best have been perpetuated on our programs, and it will be the same with Tschaikowsky. Time and perspective are already beginning this sifting process and so many of his compositions have survived that it should be easy from them alone to provide more than one all Tschaikowsky program that would be of interest from start to finish.

The Philharmonic Society proved itself to be masterly interpreters of the Russian school and to be in entire sympathy with the aims and ideals of Tschaikowsky. Be it not supposed that the works of Tschaikowsky are easy either to interpret or to execute. His scheme of orchestration, entirely original with himself, is essentially contrapuntal, much of it in pure four part counterpoint and often enough with the several parts taken by different groups of instruments of divergent tone quality. These voice parts must be made to blend and balance, and herein did the orchestra particularly reflect its understanding of the intentions of the composer and its great skill in carrying out these intentions. In the "Pathetique" the players were able to meet and follow every change of the composer's mood with unusual fidelity, an ability rarely found, for though this symphony is frequently played it is rarely well interpreted, and certainly never better than it was by the Philharmonic on this occasion.

The members of the Philharmonic evidently played this fine music lovingly and with enthusiasm. The sonorous fulness of the orchestral tone was splendid and the unison melodic passages of the strings uncommonly luscious and sensuous. The tone of the trombones also must be commended for its brightness and true trumpetlike quality:

Beulah Munson Sings at Beecher Memorial.

Beulah B. Munson, lyric soprano, was the soloist at the opening ceremonies, which extend throughout two weeks, of the Beecher Memorial, Brooklyn, N. Y., Tuesday evening, November 3. Her varied program was thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience, who gave audible expression of its appreciation of the selection of Miss Munson by the committee in charge.

Miss Munson was in good voice, and again charmed her listeners with the purity, strength, beauty and sweetness of her tone. Her artistic rendition of "Ständchen," by Strauss, and "L'heure exquise," by Hahn, showed a good mastery of pianissimo. Particular mention might be made of her interpretation of "Vissi d'arte" from "Tosca." "All Through the Night" was effectively given also. The "Morning Hymn," with its inspiring tone of aspiration and victory, closed the program.

Miss Munson's enunciation impressed throughout the program by its clearness.

The soprano is also endowed with a commanding and pleasing stage presence.

An added pleasure was the splendid work of her accompanist, Martha Falk Mayr.

These were her numbers in full: "Widmung," "Der Nussbaum," Schumann; "Ständchen," Strauss; "L'heure exquise," Hahn; "Mattinata," Leoncavallo; "Vissi d'arte," Puccini; "Yesterday and Today," Spross; "Conspirators," Engel; "All Through the Night," Welsh melody; "If Thou Wert Blind," Noel Johnson; "Morning Hymn," Henschel.

Consensus of Praise for Werrenrath.

"In his Aeolian Hall recital last Monday evening, October 26, the Werrenrath art and the Werrenrath versatility again were demonstrated convincingly, for he covered a wide range of song styles and mastered each one superbly. English, German and Italian were the languages employed by the performer, his diction in the three tongues being beyond criticism. In mood the numbers constituted a gamut embracing the deeply serious, the lyric, the tragic, the romantic and the humorous. Smooth and sympathetic as is Reinald Werrenrath's voice, the manner in which he employs it constitutes the chief charm of his singing so far as the ear and the mind of the connoisseur are concerned. Musicianship, interpretative resource and infallible taste are the remaining qualities that make up the artistic stature of this sterling artist, who though he is young in years may be said to have reached a remarkably high stage of maturity."

The above is an excerpt from the MUSICAL COURIER review of Reinald Werrenrath's Aeolian Hall, New York, recital, October 26.

Praise was likewise unanimously accorded the baritone in the New York daily press critiques, a few extracts from which follow:

Reinald Werrenrath, at his song recital in Aeolian Hall last night, sang two or three familiar songs (familiar, that is, to the close observers of such things), and over a dozen which were new and strange. It has been one of the laudable things in Mr. Werrenrath's career that he has consistently and persistently tried to give freshness and variety to his programs and extend popular knowledge in the field of artistic song. No singer now before the public is better equipped for such a mission than he, for his art as a singer is so exceptionally delightful that no matter what he sings he is heard with pleasure.—Tribune.

Reinald Werrenrath, a baritone, who by conscientious endeavors has acquired a musical following in this city, gave his annual recital last night in Aeolian Hall before a large gathering.

This singer has shown gradual and distinct artistic progress since he first appeared on the concert stage, and he is now recognized as one of the best interpreters of the type of song with which his programs are flavored.

Style, suavity, coloring, insight, good phrasing and diction are among his more praiseworthy attributes.—World.

It was a good augury that the list of the song recitals of the young musical season began with such an excellent entertainment as that of last evening at Aeolian Hall. Reinald Werrenrath, a baritone who has won for himself a place in the front rank of platform singers, was heard in a program noteworthy for its catholicity and liberality. Mr. Werrenrath is not afraid to sing songs which are gentle and even modest in their appeal to the finer sensibilities, songs which his intelligent art dignifies and ennobles, and for which it makes a potent claim to recognition. Nor does he neglect those standard bearers who uphold the revered traditions of the lied. And whatsoever he does he does with honor to it and himself.

. . . Mr Werrenrath sang like an artist. Exquisite management of the voice, impeccable phrasing and the diction of a master in all three of the languages heard were the salient technical features of his singing. His interpretations ranged through a considerable scale, and perhaps there was more of the cool poise of the fastidious artist than the average listener could appreciate.

. . . Mr. Werrenrath's recital may be summed up as an exhibition of genuinely polished art and as such it was a thing of delight.—Sun.

It fell to the lot of New York's "own, particular baritone," Reinald Werrenrath, to give the first song recital of the season last night in Aeolian Hall. As was proper, there was a full house to welcome him. . . .

In a program which was refreshingly unconventional, as far as the custom of including many time honored songs is concerned, the young artist gave himself the opportunity of showing just what can be done with a splendid voice, splendidly trained. It is essentially a musical voice, of beautiful texture, and evenly developed. . . .

"Fuzzy-Wuzzy," the words by Kipling and the music by Arthur Whiting, called by Werrenrath one of the "old war horses," closed a program which will set the pace for the winter—a pace it will be hard to sustain.—Press.

It is seldom that such a carefully arranged program as that heard last night in Aeolian Hall at the first of the season's song recitals given by Reinald Werrenrath, one of the foremost of American baritones, finds its way into our concert halls, and rarely is a recital so well sung.—Herald.

Who, since one famous Sembrich folksong recital, has dared to give New York a concert of all new things, as Reinald Werrenrath did in Aeolian Hall last night? He not only held an audience of professionals, singers, publishers and critics past 10 o'clock, but sent them all home in the rollicking humor of Arthur Whiting's war ballad, "Fuzzy-Wuzzy." . . .

Mr. Werrenrath is the only singer except Alma Gluck to have sprung full armed into public view lately. As she with exquisite voice, so he with fine intelligence, makes the new men sound the gamut of light and shade in sentiment and song as truly as the classics of old.—Evening Sun.

Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, showed in his recital in Aeolian Hall last evening, before an enthusiastic audience, that he is a notable musician in three ways. He has a voice of rare beauty, he knows how to manage it with consummate mastery, and, perhaps more rare than all in a musician, he knows how to bring to light compositions that are new and how to sing them with finished artistry.—Brooklyn Daily Eagle. Nana Genovese's Bookings.

Nana Genovese, the soprano, has taken an attractive apartment in the Metropolitan Opera House Building, New York, and at the end of this month she intends to give a musical reception in order to formally open it.

During November she will be heard in New York, Poughkeepsie, Peekskill, Mount Vernon, Bridgeport and Kingston. A December tour through the New England States will follow, and in January she will be heard in Pennsylvania and the West.

Two Prominent Sulli Pupils.

Gloria Mayne, prima donna soprano, has appeared with marked success in various cities of Australia, New Zealand, Africa and America, everywhere meeting with warm appreciation. Miss Mayne is a pupil of Giorgio M. Sulli, the New York maestro. She calls her program "Great Moments from Great Operas," and that both the subjects and the singer have pleased may be gleaned from the following appended critiques:

Gloria Mayne, the American lyric soprano, immediately won her way into the favor of the audience by her splendid singing of several artistically rendered numbers which were cheered.—Sydney (Australia) Referee.

Gloria Mayne, in "Great Moments from Great Operas," has a beautiful soprano voice. Her wonderful singing brought the audience to their feet in salvos of applause.—Adelaide (Australia) Advertiser.

GLORIA MAYNE.

Gloria Mayne has a voice of much power and flexibility.—Melbourne (Australia) Hawklet.

This singer is the possessor of a soprano voice of a beautiful clear quality. Her most notable number was no doubt the "Jewel Song" from "Faust," and it was greeted with enthusiastic applause.—Dunedin (N. Z.) Courier.

A thoroughly appreciated new arrival was Gloria Mayne, American Tetrazzini. She has a well trained soprano of beauty and flexibility, which she uses in a clever combination of coloratura operatic arias and the more popular ballads.—Cape Town (Africa) Review.

Then there was Gloria Mayne, a lady with a fine appearance and a splendid voice. . . . Her voice, a soprano, is splendidly modulated and contains a real note of sympathy, which helps to make her a great success.—Johannesburg (Africa) Transvaal Times.

Gloria Mayne possesses a really splendid voice.—Los Angeles (Cal.) Examiner.

Another popular Sulli pupil is Belle Koskoff, soprano, now appearing with the Manon Grand Opera Company at the Hippodrome in Chicago. (Advertisement.)

Mrs. McConnell and Her Pupils.

Minnie M. McConnell, vocal teacher and second soprano of the McConnell Vocal Trio, gave a concert at the Country Life Permanent Exposition, held in the Grand Central Terminal, New York, on Saturday afternoon, November 7, before a large and enthusiastic audience.

Besides Mrs. McConnell, the following of her pupils participated: Henrietta Goodheart, soprano; Harriet McConnell, contralto, and Walter Mills, baritone, as well as Grace Bender, pianist. The program consisted of soprano, contralto and baritone solos, vocal trios, and several piano selections.

To Music Clubs and Managers of America:

Percy Hemus,

"America's Baritone"

will tour the country this spring with his accompanist, Gladys Craven. Mr. Hemus is doing more than any other singer to introduce in the proper way American compositions. He is acknowledged by critics, public and composers as an American singer whose interpretations stand alone. The New York Times acknowledges his propaganda a musical "institution." The New York Herald says: "Mr. Hemus is to be commended for the interest he has taken in American music." Write his secretary for open dates—64 East Thirty-fourth street, New York. Mr. Hemus is teaching singing this winter.

Gabrilowitsch Engagements.

The joint recital of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, and Clara (Clemens) Gabrilowitsch, contralto, will be given in Aeolian Hall, New York, on the evening of Wednesday, November 25, instead of the afternoon as originally scheduled. The pianist will play compositions of Beethoven, Schumann and Chopin, while Mme. Gabrilowitsch will sing the Beethoven aria "Ah, Perfido," four Gypsy songs of Brahms, and the song of Duparc, Debussy and Faure. Mr. Gabrilowitsch and Mme. Gabrilowitsch opened their tour in Atlantic City, N. J., November 12, where they gave a joint recital for the benefit of the Red Cross Society. The pianist appeared in Baltimore, November 13. In addition to appearances with the leading orchestras, he will make a recital tour that will keep him in this country until the close of the season.

Marie Hoover Ellis with Russian Orchestra.

Mt. Vernon, Ia., November 12, 1914.

At the concert given at Cornell College by the Russian Symphony Orchestra, the feature was the appearance of the Chicago pianist, Marie Hoover Ellis, who was heard in the Grieg concerto. Mrs. Ellis, who has just returned from Austria, is well equipped technically and interpretatively, and she won a well deserved success. She studied in Vienna several years under Leschetizky.

Myrtle Elvyn Scores in Appleton.

Myrtle Elvyn, the pianist, gave a recital recently in Appleton, Wis. The following reviews show that her work was greatly enjoyed:

In a piano recital of high excellence, Myrtle Elvyn delighted her audience in the second number of the artists series given in Peabody Hall last night under the auspices of the Lawrence School of Music. Of particular merit was her wonderful interpretation of the "Tannhäuser Overture" arranged by Liszt, by far the most remarkable feat of the entertainment.

The Tannhäuser overture is an immense undertaking and requires great technic and marvelous skill. It has never before been attempted by a woman in public recital, and Hoffman is probably the only male artist that has been successful in undertaking the number. Miss Elvyn has proved fully equal to the task, and her superb technic and strength, combined with the independence of her hands, accomplished truly remarkable results. In the "Pilgrims' Chorus," one of the most difficult parts of the overture, her work was particularly pronounced and the melody was brought out with an octave technic that was wonderful.

Again in Chopin's polonaise, op. 53, was her octave technic unusual, and the other selections by Chopin, ballade A flat major and nocturne, op. 15, No. 2, that went to make up the first group on the program, gave her an opportunity to display her remarkable emotional expression and temperament. The "Sonata Tragica," by MacDowell, was also excellent, and, although not as popular as others on the program, is a very heavy dramatic composition, hard to memorize and execute. The MacDowell numbers are used a great deal on the platform this year, inasmuch as the musicians of America are endeavoring to bring his compositions to the front.

In the third group on her program, the first number, the ever popular "Caprice Viennois," by Kreisler, and the etude (in form of variations), by Paganini and Liszt, stand out prominently. The latter proved a remarkable technical display from beginning to end. The etude for the left hand alone, by Blumenfield, another of this group, was unusual because of the wonderful pedaling. Miss Elvyn by her use of the pedals gave the impression of a two handed composition, and throughout the entire number retained a distinct tone in the bass, although seldom touching the keys far below middle C. As an encore to this group she delighted her audience with Dvorak's "Humoresque," played in a decidedly distinctive manner, the syncopated notes producing an unusual effect. Her final encore, Mendelssohn's "Spinning Song," was beautiful.

In appearance Miss Elvyn possesses an attractiveness that adds to her charm before the public.—The Crescent, Appleton, Wis.

Before a good sized audience last night, at Peabody Hall, Myrtle Elvyn, well known concert pianist, held the intense interest through a program made up completely of piano selections rendered in a wonderful manner.

Through the haunting Chopin numbers, in which she displayed talent of a remarkable order, she dashed into the splendid "Sonata Tragica," by MacDowell. In these selections she displayed power of memorizing which was most extraordinary, as among musical selections there are some of the most difficult to render from memory.

Delighted applause greeted her "Caprice Viennois" and the "Schoen Rosmarin," by Kreisler. In these she succeeded in projecting her own capricious mood into the music, as well as interpreting the moods of the composer in a splendid manner.

Perhaps the most difficult number rendered was the etude variations by Liszt, and her closing number came as a triumphal close to a splendid program, for the "Tannhäuser" overture by Liszt is seldom played as Miss Elvyn rendered it last night. The beloved "Humoresque" and MacDowell's "To a Wild Rose," which she gave as encores, were received with enthusiasm and delight.

Myrtle Elvyn's ability as a pianist is aided greatly by her gracious manner and her splendid appearance. Last night she appeared in a gorgeous Paquin gown of emerald green and gold, the clinging lines of which accentuated her beauty of form and her splendid carriage. She wore her auburn hair simply and without ornaments of any description. She is of the type which one may well call splendid, for there is an air about her which is lovely in a wholesome way. Without knowing it one associates her with deep breaths of clear, fresh air and the wideness and deepness of things of nature.

On November 6, Charles Wakefield Cadman will appear here in a lecture recital of American piano and song literature selected from his famous compositions. He will be assisted by the beautiful Indian princess, Tsianina Redfeather, mezzo soprano, who will sing Cadman's Indian compositions in native costume.—The Post, Appleton, Wis. (Advertisement.)

A Few Encomiums of Mme. Karweska.

Mme. Karweska's home is in southern Russia, on the banks of the Black Sea. Here she enjoys the delightful climate especially. However, she pays an annual visit to the North, for, as she says: "The very atmosphere of the Northern climate—a country where the snow flies two-thirds of the year—develops the mind and body much more rapidly than a Southern clime."

The accompanying picture shows a delightful spot where Mme. Karweska often spends a happy day among the flowers and playing fountains.

Extracts from foreign press criticisms follow:

MME. M. KARWESKA IN CONCERT.

At the concert on Friday evening the vocal artist was M. Karweska. Her commanding stage presence and pleasing personality at once won the admiration of her audience. Besides displaying wonderful vocal art, the artist commanded great versatility of expression and dramatic interpretation. She was recalled time and again and had to sing several encores.—Novoe Vremya, Petrograd.

Mme. Karweska is a delightful artist and possesses a voice of rare beauty. She shows skill and technic and exhibits rare taste and musicianship.—Petrograd Gazette.

Mme. Karweska was especially forceful in her dramatic interpretation of the romanza from "Cavalleria Rusticana."—Paris Le Journal.

Mme. Karweska was in splendid voice and sang with grace. Her phrasing, enunciation of vowels were rendered with great skill. Her German diction of the Schubert and Brahms lieder was perfect.—London Telegraph.

Percy Hemus Honored.

As a token of appreciation for his singing of songs by American women, Percy Hemus has been presented with a large wreath tied with the American colors, with a fitting inscription beautifully embossed on ribbon in gold letters from Gena Branscombe, Harriet Ware, Fay Foster and Mary Helen Brown—four of the composers on Mr. Hemus' program, Aeolian Hall, New York.

The following press notices show the tributes paid Mr. Hemus by the New York critics after this his second New York recital of songs by American composers Hearing with much admiration Percy Hemus' fine bass baritone and admirable art.—New York Tribune.

The singer with his propaganda is now to be taken as one of our musical "institutions." Mr. Hemus has a voice of power and rich quality, and sings with intelligence and dramatic force. . . . He showed that the quality of his voice and the manner of using it could be brought to bear eloquently on the purely lyric.—New York Times.

He has a voice of good quality and he manages his tones with skill. He sings generally with taste and sometimes with feeling, and he discharges such a duty as that of last evening with manifest interest, and, when it is possible, even with enthusiasm.—New York Sun.

The interpretations are aided by the singer's "acting," which, in his case, does not appear out of place on the concert stage.—New York Morning World.

Given effectively in Mr. Hemus' big and splendidly trained voice . . . . at all times he was impressive, sometimes forceful.—Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

On the whole it was a worthy enterprise, and Mr. Hemus is to be commended for the interest he has taken in American music and for the care which he took in preparing the work.—New York Herald.

He has a pleasing voice of good quality and he did justice to a host of songs of varying degrees of worth.—New York Evening World.

American Institute Engages Ne Collins.

The American Institute of Applied Music announces the engagement for the vocal department of Bertyne Ne Collins, soprano.

Beside her work as a private instructor, Mrs. Ne Collins has taught at Cornell University summer session for four seasons and won for herself a most enthusiastic following of pupils, as well as the admiration of musicians and critics.

Hollis Dann, head of the department of music in Cornell University, writes:

Allow me to congratulate you on the continued and increasing success which you have attained with your vocal pupils. All of your pupils are enthusiastic concerning your teaching, and I have noticed both at this and previous sessions that you never lose a pupil; they all swear by you. Please accept my congratulations.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) HOLLIS DANN.

Ithaca, August 16, 1914.

Mrs. Ne Collins possesses a sympathetic, clear soprano voice, under admirable control, which she uses with discretion and the art of a temperamental musician. She enters immediately upon her work at the American Institute. Arrangements have been made by which a competitive scholarship for the season is to be awarded by Mrs. Ne Collins to a pupil with a fine voice and requisite intellectual and personal attainments. An informal reception, introducing Mrs. Ne Collins, was given at the institute, November 13.

Von Ende School Artist Recitals.

It seemed singularly appropriate that the season's first recital at the von Ende School was given by Anton and Vita Witek, for these two extraordinary musicians are striking representatives of that European spirit and atmosphere which students were wont to seek abroad, and which they can now profit by at home. The program was happily arranged, containing the D minor piano violin sonata by Brahms, a Chopin and Schubert number and the Beethoven violin concerto. No composition by Brahms is better adapted to introduce the student to such eclecticism, which is the powerful voice in a period of indiscriminate acclamation of the new because it is new. Nor is there a concerto in all violin literature which reflects the very essence of classicism in such noble lines as does the work of Beethoven. Not a small number of people stand aloof at the mention of Brahms, and fail to respond to his appeal, but the warm and spirited interpretation of the work by Mr. and Mrs. Witek likely made converts. The first and second movement particularly haunted the ears of the listeners for many hours after the remarkable performance.

Chopin's nocturne in F, op. 15, and Schubert's impromptu with variations were a romantic intermezzo in the program. Both were played by Mme. Witek with virile strength, intellectual lucidity and poetic treatment; she never fails to impress her audience. The climax of the recital came with the Beethoven concerto. It was played by Mr. Witek with mastery, justifying the claim made by critics that since the death of Joachim he is the great Beethoven interpreter.

The musicale was a most auspicious beginning of the season in this school, which for seriousness of purpose and latitude of effort has acquired an enviable reputation.

The second recital in the series was given on November 12 by Sergei Kotlarsky, violinist, whose tour with Caruso, followed by subsequent study in Europe and a tour in Germany and France, is all of recent record. Mr. Kotlarsky played the Bruch concerto in D minor, Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," and smaller pieces by Chopin, Sarasate and Paganini. An audience of large numbers filled the spacious recital rooms of the von Ende School of Music. Mr. Kotlarsky's playing was heard in most attentive silence, especially in the opening movements of the concerto. The last movement was played in tremendous tempo, with incisive style. The difficult work of Lalo showed all the artist's virtuoso qualities and, of course, entire technical mastery. The repose in the andante was in pronounced contrast to the brilliancy and terrific tempo of the finale. Mr. Kotlarsky was for several years Mr. von Ende's pupil, and as such appeared in various notable concerts in New York, including several at the Metropolitan Opera House Sunday evenings. His rapid rise in the violinistic world is well known to New Yorkers, and he is sure to continue this artistic progress.

Maurice Eisner, at the piano, did effective work.

The two coming recitals in this course will occur November 24, when Alfred Ilma, baritone, and Lawrence Goodman, pianist, will appear, and November 30, when Sergei Kotlarsky, violinist, and Moritz Lichtman, pianist, will be the artists.

Oscar Seagle's Large Class.

In spite of the fact that Oscar Seagle has a great many concert engagements this winter, there will be no serious or long interruptions to his work as teacher in New York City, as Mr. Seagle is making no extended Western tour this year and his absences from New York will only be matters of a few days at a time. Mr. Seagle has a very large class at his studio in Carnegie Hall, many of whom were with him all through the past summer at Bramber, in England, and returned to continue their work here.

Myrna Sharlow in Louisville.

Myrna Sharlow is the young soprano who created such an instantaneously favorable impression in Boston last season. These are press notices in addition to those reproduced in this paper last week referring to a Louisville (Ky.) appearance:

The concert given last evening at the Woman's Club under the auspices of the Music Committee of the Club, with Myrna Sharlow as the singer, was in every respect delightful and notable, both as to the importance of the concert as a musical event and for the discriminating audience present, an audience genuinely interested in hearing the young singer who has returned to Louisville after an absence of two years.

The program was arranged with the view to offering an opportunity to Miss Sharlow to demonstrate the full range, quality and power of her voice no less than to give an idea of her dramatic power and artistic temperament, and that Miss Sharlow more than met the demands made upon her is unquestionable.

Since her concert at the Woman's Club two years ago, Miss Sharlow has developed wonderfully and for so young a singer she has admirable poise and reserve; in fact at times she is somewhat too restrained in her singing, but whatever faults may be found in her manner of singing, there is not one which we feel will not be overcome with a little more experience. Everything seems possible for her and even now, when only a few years out of her teens, she is a brilliant singer and an artist to her fingertips.

She has a marvelous range, her tones are full, clear and even and, above everything, her voice possesses the quality of resonance to a marked degree.

Her first number last evening, "Batti, Batti," from "Don Giovanni," showed to the audience at once her development in the last two years. This development was shown even more markedly in her splendid singing of Antonia's aria from "Tales of Hoffmann." The richness and purity of her voice and her dramatic appreciation were well demonstrated in her singing of the aria.

In the group of modern songs, English, French, German, Russian and Norwegian, Miss Sharlow was charming in the varied interpretations she gave. She sang Xavier Laroux's "Le Nile," with great subtlety and appeal and her singing of Grieg's "Ich liebe dich" was brilliant and stirring.

In every number she gave, Miss Sharlow unconsciously makes it evident that she has the dramatic instinct in a great degree. Her rendering of the prayer from "La Tosca," illustrated this strongly. Her singing of Mrs. Beach's "The Year's at the Spring" was a splendid outburst of the joyousness of youth, spring and delight in life, and the applause that followed the song was no less spontaneous than Miss Sharlow's singing.

The two arias from "Bohcme," "Mi Chiamano Mimi," and "Addio," which Miss Sharlow sang in costume, were further evidence of her possibilities as a great artist.

It will be very interesting to watch Miss Sharlow in her career, and it will also be very gratifying to have the prediction that she is to be recognized as one of the great American opera singers realized.—Louisville Herald, October 30, 1914.

Under the auspices of the music committee of the Woman's Club, Myrna Sharlow gave a song recital last night. The program was made of operatic selections, folksongs and modern songs of the French and American schools.

The training that Miss Sharlow has had, has fitted her especially for opera, and it was to be expected that her singing of the operatic selections would have been on the whole superior to her singing of the songs. The remarkable fact concerning the recital was that, in so young a singer, both types of selections on her program should have been done so well. A young singer is likely to specialize either in songs or in opera almost to the exclusion of the other branch of vocal music. Yet last night Miss Sharlow sang Laroux's "Le Nile" as beautifully as she sang the prayer from "La Tosca."

"Le Nile" was peculiarly suited to Miss Sharlow's style. It demanded resonance, power, a suave legato, dramatic power and beauty of tone. These are qualities which Miss Sharlow has above all others.

Miss Sharlow's voice is decidedly that of a dramatic soprano. All of the richness and the dramatic power on Antonia's aria from "Tales of Hoffmann" were brought to the audience as Miss Sharlow sang it last night. Grieg's "Ich liebe dich," Bibb's "Rondel of Spring" and Mrs. Beach's "The Year's at the Spring" were all noteworthy for the same qualities. Miss Sharlow's voice was constantly rich in color, of that rare, indefinable lustrous quality, filled at the same moment with light and shadow, which makes the voice seem alive, even independently of the personality of the singer.

Best of all was her singing of the Puccini arias, in which just such a voice is needed. She sang two arias from "La Boheme" in costume, acting them at the same time. These were carefully done, memorable, appealing. Yet never for a moment were tbey exaggerated. Miss Sharlow sang these portions of the role of Mimi with a dramatic power, restraint and finish that would rejoice singers of many times her years could they acquire them.—Louisville Post, October 30, 1914. Friedberg Return Engagements.

In compliance with a large number of requests, Carl Friedberg will give a second piano recital the latter part of January, in Aeolian Hall, New York. He will then play a request program, as well as some compositions which have never been heard in this country. The date of this recital and full particulars will be announced later.

The pianist has achieved such an overwhelming success at the Cincinnati Symphony concert, through his playing of the Brahms concerto, that the music lovers of that city insisted upon hearing him again at an early date. Accordingly, he will give a recital December 9 at the Emery Auditorium.

Albert Lindquest's Active Career.

Albert Lindquest, the genial young Chicago tenor, whose successful career has been started, was "snapped" on a recent morning while starting out to meet his accompanist for his daily work. Mr. Lindquest is very grateful for the response he received from the announcement of his enforced return from Europe the last of September. He has been engaged for "The Messiah" in Minneapolis, St. Paul, Dubuque, St. Louis, and Flint, Mich. Beside a fine list of other engagements this gifted tenor will be one of the soloists at the sangerfest to be held next June at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco, in the great auditorium for music now being built.

Paul Althouse Pleases Norwich.

The recent visit of Paul Althouse, tenor, to Norwich, N. Y., was followed by several press notices echoing the great enjoyment of the audience, as follows:

Paul Althouse, a leading tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, scored a decided success Monday evening when he gave a recital under the auspices of tbe Monday Evening Musical Club. Witbout a doubt he is the greatest singer who has visited Norwich in recent years, and the club is again to be congratulated upon bringing so eminent an artist here. He was accompanied at the piano by Prof. Frederick W. Riesberg, who is a native of Norwich, and holds an enviable position in the musical life of New York City.—Utica Saturday Globe.

A large and enthusiastic audience greeted Paul Althouse, tenor, who gave a most delightful program of songs at the Congregational Church Monday evcning under the auspices of the Monday Evening Musical Club. Mr. Althouse bas been lauded as one of the finest stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and on Monday evening be demonstrated that his abilities were such as to warrant this bigh standing in the operatic world. Mr. Althouse undoubtedly possessed the finest tenor voice which has ever been heard in this city, and the enthusiastic applause attested the delight and pleasure of the large audience.—Cbenango Union. Miller Vocal Art-Science Booklet.

An attractive brochure of twenty-four pages has been issued, defining the Miller Vocal Art-Science system of vocal music. The various captions in the booklet are as follows: "Is Miller Vocal Art-Science a New System?" "Establishment of the Principles of Resonance," "Seven Points for Consideration," "What Is Sound?" "The Open Sesame," "To Show Progress of Investigation of Voice Problems," "An Hour of Philphonia." The chapter on voice problems has to do with the case of a singer with a congenital cleft palate. The lady in question was unable to enunciate in an intelligible way. By careful and definite procedure her cleft palate speech was practically obliterated by Adelaide Gescheidt.

The booklet contains further information regarding this case, and closes with the following: "Miller Vocal Art-Science has solved the mysteries of vocal art. Through a number of carefully compiled exercises, and competent teaching of this science by Adelaide Gescheidt and her assistants, a student is enabled to understand and use his voice to the best possible advantage, both scientifically and artistically."

Kriens-Patterson Recital—Dr. Richardson Talks—The Nichols Tour—Max Jacobs' Engagements—Fraternal Association of Musicians' Meeting—Tonkünstler Society Chamber Music—Tollefsen Engagements—Organ Notes.

Eleanor Foster Kriens, pianist, assisted by vocal pupils of Elizabeth K. Patterson, united in a recital at the home of the Misses Patterson, November 16. Miss Kriens, who is an expert pianist of the Joseffy schooling, played works by various composers, closing with five compositions by Christaan Kriens. Geraldine Holland, Frankie Holland, Agnes Waters and Celestine Burchell were the vocalists concerned in this interesting affair.

Dr. Richardson Talks.

At the annual Mackintosh celebration of Calvary Baptist Church choir, November 5, Dr. A. Madeley Richardson made a few remarks of general interest, in part as follows:

Standing here tonight I can say: "If you seek a monument to the late Edward Morris Bowman, look around you."

A year ago, ladies and gentlemen, we made a resolve that we would carry on this choir as a memorial to Mr. Bowman, that we would prepetuate his memory in the way that we were sure would be most pleasing to himself could he be present with us. And now I claim that we have succeeded.

The noble way in which you have responded to the call, in which you have freely given your time, your thought, your energies, is a constant and standing evidence of the influence that your late conductor had upon you, an influence which was not a mere passing and temporary thing, but one strong enough to leave a lasting and permanent impression.

When I made this resolve with you, ladies and gentlemen, a year ago, I knew what I, myself, meant to do if I were spared, but I could not then foresee how you were going to do your share. Now I can say with all my heart that you have fulfilled my hopes—nay, you have exceeded them; and that I look back with pride to your work during the past year, and with pleasant anticipation of still greater triumphs in the future.

You all feel, I am sure, great gratification in the fact that we still have with us her who took such a large share in Mr. Bowman's life, and it is a source of pride to me that Mrs. Bowman expresses warm appreciation of our work and feels it to be a comfort and happiness to herself.

The Nichols Tour.

John W. Nichols, tenor, and Mrs. Nichols, pianist, leave shortly for their fall tour, opening the season at Syracuse University. From there they go as far south as Florida, west to Oklahoma, north to Wisconsin, and back. Owing to the increased number of his concert bookings, Mr. Nichols has been obliged to give up his position as solo tenor at Temple Israel, of Harlem, where he has sung for the past six years.

Max Jacobs' Engagements.

Under the direction of Max Jacobs the string orchestra of the International Arts Society played at the Astor Hotel, November 7. Dorothy Marx, Mr. Jacobs' eleven year old star pupil, played De Beriot's seventh concerto in a masterly manner and with good musicianship. This orchestra meets Saturday at 10.30 a. m., at the High School of Commerce, Sixty-fifth street, near Broadway, where those desiring to join may apply.

Mr. Jacobs appeared as soloist at the Beethoven Society concert, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, November 14. November 25, he will play at Star Casino.

Fraternal Association of Musicians' Meeting.

The fifth year of the Fraternal Association of Musicians began November 5, at 58 West Fortieth street. The attendance was large and many new members were elected at the brief business meeting which preceded the program. Louis N. Sajous, the new president, gave a hearty greeting to members and guests, and also a brief outline of the policy of the association, which aims to bring all musicians into friendly social and professional fellowship.

A program of unusual excellence was performed by Grace Elliott, pianist; Lillian Birmingham, contralto; George Carre, tenor, and Claude Rossignol, violinist.

Tonkünstler Society Chamber Concert.

A large and attentive audience heard the Tonkünstler Society concert, November 10, at Memorial Hall, Brooklyn. Marion Marsh charmed the audience with her exquisite harp playing. She and Alois Trnka combined in violin solos with harp accompaniment, which were enjoyed. Helen Reusch sang German lieder with good expression, with A. Campbell Weston at the piano. A sonata for piano and cello, by Nicode, was the last number played by Mr. and Mrs. Stoffregen.

The next musicale will take place November 24 at Assembly Hall, New York.

Tollefsen Engagements.

Carl H. Tollefsen appears as solo violinist or with his trio at concerts in the near future as follows: November 28, Columbia University, Horace Mann Auditorium; December 6, Commercial High School, Brooklyn, People's Institute; December 11, Academy of Music, People's Institute; April 10, People's Symphony Club, Washington Irving High School. At the two last named the Tollefsen Trio will play the brilliant trio in D major by Charles Wakefield Cadman.

Organ Notes.

The opening free organ recital in the series given under the auspices of the American Guild of Organists took place November 10 at the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York, J. Warren Andrews, organist. Mildred Potter, contralto, and Edward J. Boyle, tenor, sang. T. Tertius Noble gives the next recital, Monday evening, November 23, at St. Thomas' P. E. Church, Fifty-third street and Fifth avenue.

Following the opening recital, an informal gathering of members of the guild, with a luncheon, filled out an hour of social intercourse.

Professor Baldwin gives his 393d organ recital at City College today, November 18, at 4 o'clock. His most important number will be Cesar Franck's "Grande Piece Symphonique." The coming Sunday, November 22, at 4 o'clock, Professor Baldwin plays a program of special interest, including Eugene Thayer's fifth sonata, Guilmant's "Funeral March and Chant Seraphique," concluding with the prelude and theme on the name B-A-C-H.

Gottfried H. Federlein plays "A Period of Music" consisting of piano, organ and orchestral works at his recital, November 22, at 4 p. m., at the meeting house of the Society of Ethical Culture, Central Park West and Sixty-fourth street. Compositions by the Americans, Nevin, Ralph Kinder, and Organist Federlein, are included.

Notes.

George F. Schimmel, the young tenor from Scranton, Pa., recently sang for a number of musical people of New York, who were much pleased with his voice and evident earnestness. With further study he should be assured of an excellent position in the vocal world.

Platon Brounoff gave his lecture-recital on "Russia in Story, Music and Song" in the Board of Education Series at Public Schools 10, 4 and 173. In these recitals he sings and plays works by Russian composers, including many folksongs. "America, My Glorious Land" is his concluding number, and this is always received with enthusiasm.

Cornelius Rübner's song, "Thanksgiving," has been published. This composition is for soprano or tenor, and is sure to find a large sale, for it is melodically interesting and not difficult. He has issued "Italian Drinking Song," dedicated to Caruso, and Impromptu, op. 7, for piano.

Edmund Jacques announces the first noon choral recital at St. Paul's Chapel, Broadway and Fulton street, next Wednesday, November 25. This will be a combination "American Thanksgiving" and "English Harvest Festival" service.

An "Evening of Music" was given October 27 at the beautiful home of Mrs. H. J. Ubert, Dobbs Ferry, N. Y., with a well chosen and enjoyable program, by Hans Barth, pianist, and Walter Pugh, violinist. Both are young men of fine musical attainments, whose work showed a thorough training in their art and musical perception above the ordinary.

St. Thomas' Festival Chorus, T. Tertius Noble, conductor, has been formed with a view of rendering in the church from time to time the sacred works of the great masters, both ancient and modern. The work now in preparation is Brahms' "Requiem," which will be given this season. Voices are needed, more especially altos, tenors and basses.

For membership and full particulars please write to T. Tertius Noble, 1 West Fifty-third street, New York.

A Second Bauer Recital.

So successful was Harold Bauer's November 7 New York appearance that the pianist has decided to give another Aeolian Hall recital on Saturday afternoon, December 5. He will play then an all Chopin program. It was Mr. Bauer's original intention to return to Europe early in January, but on account of the war he has decided to remain in America until the close of the season. He has been engaged as soloist with every orchestra of importance in the country, while a special feature of his visit will be twelve appearances on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

School of Accompanying Is Busy.

A casual caller at the School of Accompanying, Aeolian Hall, New York, Mrs. Marshall Elliott Stewart, director, will find that institution running to full capacity. The school includes a special course in transposing. A correspondence course, established some time ago, is growing finely and inquiries come from all parts of the United States. Such a course can be as beneficial to students in Buenos Aires as to those in Boston. Mrs. Stewart, the director, herself established a wide reputation as accompanist, and still appears frequently in that capacity.

FESTIVAL ASSOCIATION ELECTS OFFICERS.

President of Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company to Head Newark Music Festival Association—Gigantic Chorus Holds Third Rehearsal—Newark and Jersey City Advisory Committees Hold Meetings—Musical Happenings.

Newark, N. J., November 16, 1914.

On Friday afternoon last, at Lauter Hall, a meeting of the Newark Music Festival Association was held and the following officers and directors were elected:

Third Chorus Rehearsal.

The third rehearsal of the Newark Music Festival Chorus was held last Wednesday evening, November 11, in the beautiful auditorium of the Central High School. There were nearly five hundred singers present, which number, when one remembers that Mme. Schumann-Heink's recital and the Newark Musicians' Club's concert both took place on the same evening, is a remarkable showing.

This is only the third rehearsal, but the results already attained would lead the visitor to believe the chorus was a long established one. It is true that a large percentage of the members have trained voices, yet there are many who have had little or no chorus experience. Nevertheless the voices are well balanced and the volume and quality displayed is extraordinary. A still greater increase in the number of singers present is expected at the next rehearsal, which is to be held in the same auditorium, on Wednesday evening, November 18.

Newark Advisory Committee Meets.

On Thursday afternoon last, November 12, in the Lauter Building, a meeting of the advisory committee of the Newark Musical Festival Association was held, a large number of prominent musicians attending. Louise Westwood, who is chairman of the committee, presided. The question of enlarging the chorus was the principal topic of discussion. All the members present pledged themselves to enlist at least two male voices before the next rehearsal; an addition of over fifty male singers has thus been promised.

MEETING OF JERSEY CITY ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

At the Lincoln High School, Harrison street, Jersey City, the advisory committee of the Jersey City Festival Chorus met last Thursday evening, November 12, and plans for the organization of the Jersey City chorus were discussed. A large number of the most prominent musicians of that city were present and marked enthusiasm in the scheme to join together the various city choruses was much in evidence. Moritz E. Schwarz is chairman of the committee.

It was decided at this meeting to hold the first rehearsal of the Jersey City Festival Chorus on Thursday evening, December 3, the place of meeting to be decided upon later. Singers who desire to join this chorus are requested to send their name, address, part they sing, also stating whether voice is high or low, to Jessie B. Lockhart, 17 Brinkerhoff street, Jersey City, secretary of the Jersey City advisory committee, or to the office of the Newark Music Festival Association, Lauter Building, 593 Broad street, Newark, as soon as possible, so that music may be prepared for them. Membership cards will be mailed upon receipt of application.

NEWARK MUSICIANS' CLUB CONCERT.

On Wednesday eveing, November 11, the second concert this season of the Newark Musicians' Club was held at 849 Broad street. A large number of the members were present and enjoyed a delightful and unusually interesting program. Those who took part were: Arthur Klein, pianist; Cecilia Joachim, soprano; Mary Bradin, violin; John A. Campbell, tenor, and Florence Bucklin Scott, contralto. Sidney A. Baldwin and Alexander Berne were the accompanists of the evening.

FIRST ARTISTS' CONCERT A GREAT SUCCESS.

The first of the eighth series of artists' concerts in the Elliott Street School Auditorium, which was held last Friday evening, November 13, was well attended, and the large audience showed its appreciation of a well rendered program. The Schubert Quartet, of New York, and Florence Austin, violinist, assisted by Winifred Lee Mayhall and Henry M. Williamson, accompanists, were the soloists of the evening. The quartet was composed of Mildred Graham Reardon, soprano; Horatio Rench, tenor; Alice Mertens, contralto, and George Warren Reardon, baritone. To Charles Grant Shaffer is due the credit for the splendid success of this annual series of concerts.

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK SINGS.

Mme. Schumann-Heink sang before a large audience in Krueger Auditorium, on November 11. She was assisted by Edward McNamara, the baritone, formerly a Paterson, N. J., policeman.

H. J. Stewart, Official Organist.

Dr. H. J. Stewart has been appointed official organist at San Diego, Cal., and will preside at the magnificent instrument presented to the city by John D. Spreckels. The organ will be used daily during the Panama-California Exposition, and it will remain a permanent addition to San Diego's musical attractions after the exposition has closed.

One unique feature of the new organ is that the recitals will be given to an audience seated in the open air. The wonderful climate of San Diego renders this possible throughout the year. Dr. Stewart will dedicate the new instrument on January 1, 1915, that being the day on which the Panama-California Exposition is to be formally opened to the public.

The San Diego Exposition is not to be confounded with the Panama-Pacific International Exposition to be held next year at San Francisco.

An Eleanor Hazzard Peocock Testimonial.

Among the recitals recently given by Eleanor Hazzard Peocock was one at the Michigan State Normal College at Ypsilanti, an institution which is hearing the best American and visiting artists.

Mrs. Peocock's art roused her hearers to a great pitch of enthusiasm, and Charles McKenny, president of the college, addressed the following letter to Mrs. Peocock's manager, M. H. Hanson:

DEAR MR. HANSON: I have seldom heard an entertainment richer with humor, pathos and rare musical quality than that given by Eleanor Hazzard Peocock at the State Normal College. Mrs. Peocock has given the same program on three successive occasions and every time to a capacity house.

Mrs. Peocock is a beautiful singer and has rare dramatic ability. I unreservedly recommend her. Yours very sincerely,

(Signed) CHARLES MCKENNY,
President.

Eleanor Spencer's Engagements.

That which most strongly impresses the visitor to Eleanor Spencer is her repose and intellectuality, her complete unaffectedness unspoiled in spite of the long series of successes which she has already won in her youth, not having had to wait for recognition through long years of struggle and disappointment. Miss Spencer's age, or rather youth, is no secret, for the fact has been widely published that she was born in 1890 and that she made her debut in concert just ten years later. Since that time her life has been one series of successes, either the small successes, which mean so much, however, of the studio or the large successes of the concert stage. She has played, not once but many times, with most of the leading orchestras of Europe, a thing that would appear the pinnacle of good fortune to most artists of her age and would have turned the heads of many. When one looks at this girl and stops to think that she has played numerous times with the Berlin Philharmonic, the London Symphony Orchestra under Nikisch, the Brighton Orchestra, the Dresden Gewandhaus Orchestra, the Amsterdam Concertgebowe Orchestra under Mengelberg, and at Utrecht, Aachen,

ELEANOR SPENCER.

Leipsic, Cologne and other cities, each time with some famous orchestra under a conductor of the highest rank, one cannot but be deeply impressed with the thought that surely she must be endowed with that splendid steadfastness of character which is a part of genius to have withstood all of these plaudits, this adulation, and have yet retained her charming simplicity, her reverence for the great ones of music, and her firm and undeviating purpose to advance toward the goal of her ideal, which is, to be worthy of the masters whose music she loves to interpret.

That is the impression one gets in talking to her, an impression of her sincere veneration for the great composers who have made possible the art of the interpreter, and a deep belief in the sacredness of her calling. And so it comes as no surprise when, in answer to your question of her likes and dislikes, she affirms her unreserved love for the classics. It is not that Miss Spencer does not understand and appreciate the work of the moderns, for she plays Debussy and Scriabine and others of the advance guard and plays them well, but her love is for the classics, the standards that have lived through the flight of years, whose worth is proven beyond cabal or dissent.

Among the modern works which Miss Spencer includes in her repertoire is the symphonic variations of Cesar Franck, which she will play with the New York Philharmonic Society on November 27 at Carnegie Hall, New York. In answer to a question as to whether she considered Cesar Franck a classic master, she hesitated a moment and then said: "Well, perhaps not yet. But he will be." Which thoroughly defines her conception of the classic as something which can only be determined with certainty by the test of years. She added that she was under the impression that this work had not been played here for some years. The Philharmonic is giving an all French program on this occasion.

Asked about her further appearances, Miss Spencer said she did not carry them in her head and had not thought much about programs except for the more immediate engagements. In Cincinnati she had decided on the Schumann concerto; with the Minneapolis Orchestra she did not yet know what she would play. There were to be many dates, among them a Chicago recital in January.

Speaking of her European experiences, Miss Spencer expressed an especially kind feeling toward Willem Mengelberg and great regret at his reported death. Since this interview reports have been received that he is not dead but is recovering from his serious injury, which will be good news to Miss Spencer and to the many other friends and admirers in this country of the eminent Dutch conductor.

Miss Spencer's friendship for Mengelberg dates from some years back and in September, 1909, he wrote a letter of recommendation in which he speaks of her splendid technic, "which does honor to her teachers, Leschetizky and Harold Bauer," and of her temperament and taste. A testimonial from so noted a personage was no doubt useful in its day, but this young artist's own success before the public has now rendered unnecessary all personal recommendation, and her mature art is most heartily welcomed back in the land of her birth.

University People Applaud David Bispham.

David Bipham's speaking voice gives immediate evidence of the singer. Its clarity, fine mellow quality, resonance, distinct enunciation, practically all those fundamental technical qualities necessary to the singer are to be noted when Mr. Bispham speaks. It seems scarcely a step from a David Bispham musical reading to a song, so far as his quality of voice is concerned. Tones are produced easily and naturally, without effort, and the thoughts to be expressed flow on whether spoken or sung through the medium of a responsive and delightfully controlled vehicle.

So that when David Bispham stands before his audiences it is with full mechanical equipment to all appearances, well subordinated to the message of the song or reading. Unhampered he is able to give his undivided attention to interpretation.

Only recently returned from a long tour, where he has been greeted with admiring crowds in vaudeville, which have proved that the average entertainment seeker appreciates and enjoys the so called "high brow" music when presented properly, Mr. Bispham appeared before a representative university audience, which taxed the capacity of the Horace Mann Auditorium at Columbia University, New York, Friday evening, November 13, and was likewise there, from the start to the finish of his program, the object of enthusiastic admiration; and this because of his thoroughly artistic style in delivery, the sympathetic quality of his voice and a personality which is bound to win any audience.

David Bispham's pioneer work in the propaganda of singing in English is well known. His entire program was sung in English on this occasion, an English which was clear and delightful. Inadvertently he sang the first verse of one song in Italian. On rectifying this and finishing the song in English, the spontaneous applause disclosed the favor of the audience for its native tongue as sung by Mr. Bispham.

Mr. Bispham was in splendid voice, and his work throughout that of the finished and versatile artist.

The baritone's explanatory and introductory remarks on "The Function of Song in Modern Life," sparkling with infectious humor, were of additional interest.

But the work of Mr. Bispham seems too well known, whether he sings a simple ballad, a humorous song, an operatic aria, or gives an intensely dramatic reading, for its finished production, to need extended comment here.

Every number in the appended program was warmly encored and and many repetitions desired: "O! Ruddier than the Cherry" ("Acis and Galatea"), Handel; "I Attempt From Love's Sickness to Fly," Purcell; "When Two That Love Are Parted," Secchi; "I'm a Roamer" ("Son and Stranger"), and "It Is Enough" ("Elijah"), Mendelssohn; "When I Was a Page" ("Falstaff"), Verdi; "The Evening Star" ("Tannhäuser"), Wagner; "The Two Grenadiers" (Heine), Schumann; prologue from "The Atonement of Pan" (Joseph D. Redding), Henry Hadley; "The Flint Song" from "The Cave Man" (Charles K. Field), William J. McCoy; "Calm Be Thy Sleep" (Tom Moore), Louis Elbel; "Killickrankie" (Robert Burns), H. H. Wetzler; recitation to music, "King Robert of Sicily" (Longfellow), Rossetter G. Cole.

Florence Austin to Play at Norwich.

Florence Austin, "America's violinist," will appear on February 1 in Norwich, N. Y., at a recital, following that recently given by Paul Althouse, tenor of the Metropolitan Opera. The Monday Musical Club, of Norwich, is giving this series of concerts in the Congregational Church of that city. In this same church some forty years ago Camilla Urso, Henrietta Beebe, and other shining musical lights of that period appeared. The people of Norwich and the Chenango Valley look forward with interest to hearing Florence Austin, of whom such good reports have been registered.

MINNEAPOLIS ORCHESTRA PLAYS A NEW SYMPHONY

Work by Hugo Alfven Has First American Hearing—Thursday Musical Artists Recitals Begun—Arpi Male Chorus Opens Season.

Minneapolis, Minn., November 9, 1914.

The twelfth season of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra is becoming more and more interesting. At the second concert on Friday evening, November 6, the orchestra played the third symphony of Hugo Alfven. It was given its first hearing in America. Emil Oberhoffer has made all modern works a serious study and in this case he directed this long, difficult work from memory, which was a colossal task. This symphony is in four movements and comes from the pen of "the Brahms of the North." His works are being played in all the great musical centers of the world. In a letter to Dr. Victor Nilsson, music critic of the Minneapolis Journal, Mr. Alfven gives the following interesting information concerning this work: "My symphony No. 3 was written in Italy. It is a pæan of praise of all the joys of life, sunshine, and the love to live. The last movement is imbued with an intense longing for home. I dreamed that I was a knight in a faroff land, who in a heedless gallop is making for home—a wild ride now through sunny landscapes, now through dark abysses, until he has reached the goal of my dreams." The composer is a tone poet and a symphonist of rank. Mr. Oberhoffer's ideas of this work were clear and poetic—and under his skilful guidance every contrast and nuance were brought out by the players. Great applause followed each movement and Mr. Oberhoffer was recalled at the finish.

The program was opened by Beethoven's overture "Fidelio" and closed by Sibelius' "Finlandia." This inspired composition was splendidly played by the orchestra. Again Mr. Oberhoffer directed from memory. The soloist of the evening was Albert Spalding, who replaced Willy Burmester, delayed in war stricken Europe. He chose as his program number the beautiful third concerto of Saint-Saëns. His technic is brilliant and his reading was sweet and tuneful. He played as Saint-Saëns would have wished his work played, and what more can be said? As an encore to the enthusiastic applause, he gave a gratifying and scholarly interpretation of Beethoven's romance in F major.

Sunday Popular Concert.

The third popular symphony concert of the season went into history Sunday afternoon, November 8, at 3.30 o'clock and equalled in charm all preceding concerts. It was as full of interest as it was full of merit. The opening number was Schubert's "Marche Militaire," an ever popular number. Weber's "Jubilee" overture was next performed, with due appreciation of all its beauties. Hadley's fourth symphony was given a splendid rendering on this program, Mr. Oberhoffer being most painstaking in bringing out the rhythms and tone colors. Liszt's rhapsody No. 2 was played with broad, striking contrasts. Richard Czerwonky, concertmaster, did the "Meditation," from Massenet's "Thais," with ingratiating sweetness. His tone is ever sympathetic and his interpretation poetic. The vivacious and languorous movements of Glazounow's ballet, "Automne," were portrayed vividly. Sarah Sutton, pianist, was heard in MacDowell's A minor concerto. Miss Sutton has good technic and a sympathetic and musicianly manner of playing. Mr. Oberhoffer weaved a beautiful symphonic background to this splendid work. Miss Sutton responded to an insistent recall by playing Liszt's "La Campanella" in a graceful way.

Thursday Musical Artist Recital.

The first of the artist recitals given by the Thursday Musical took place at the First Baptist Church on Thursday afternoon, November 5. Marie Gjertsen-Fischer, dramatic reader, gave the program, assisted by her accompanist, Bertha Marron; Raymond Schryock, violinist, and his sister, Eloise Schryock, accompanist. Mrs. Fischer is the wife of Carlo Fischer, local manager of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra and former solo cellist of that organization. All her numbers were given with music; the first, "Daybreak," by Longfellow-VandenBerg, was quite as effective as the two following, "The Birth of the Opal," by Wilcox-Hawley, and "Princess of the Morning," by Clark-Ware. She next gave the melodrama, "The High Tide," by Ingelow-Lehmann, with dramatic force, in which her voice was rich and pure. The "Cry of Rachel," by Reese-Salter, was most artistic. Chief interest in the program centered about the four spoken songs composed by Arthur Koerner, a young Minnesota composer, who makes his home in Owatonna, where he is head of the music department of Pillsbury Academy. These songs are dedicated to Mrs. Fischer. They were "Death," by Tagore; "Gypsies," by Rice; "The Three Fishers," by Kingsley, and "The Days Gone By," by Riley. They were splendidly read by Mrs. Fischer and beautifully accompanied by Miss Marron. Mrs. Fischer was the recipient of many floral offerings, and she was obliged to respond to several enthusiastically demanded encores.

Mr. Schryock played twice on the program, being heard in the first movement of the Bruch concerto in D minor, and in a group comprising "Chanson d'amour," by Saar; "Der Schmetterling," by Hubay, and "Chanson," by Manen. All of these were played with artistic finish, especially the "Chanson" by Manen. Eloise Schryock, who accompanied her brother, is a sympathetic and artistic pianist.

Miss Osborn in Duluth.

Esther Osborn, the soprano, went to Duluth, November 6, to be the guest of honor at two receptions, one given by Mrs. Dr. MacClaren and the other by Dess MacPhail. Miss Osborn will be heard in recital in Minneapolis, December 1.

Arpi Male Chorus Opens Season.

The Arpi Male Chorus opened its season of three concerts at the Auditorium, November 5, assisted by Marie Sundelius, soprano, of Boston. There are twenty picked voices, which show a balance rarely found in male choruses, while guiding them is Hjalmar Nilsson, the veteran director, who was the director in chief at the National Saengerfest held here last June. The choruses were all beautifully phrased, the enunciation being about perfect. The numbers were Lindblad's "Sangfaglarne," Sodermann's "Tag imod Krandsen," Noren's "Inga lill" and Myrberg's "Serenade." The encores were "Spring Song" (a Swedish folksong), "Three Rollicking Girls" by Frodnig, and "Courting" by Colerman.

Mme. Sundelius chose as her program numbers an aria from Charpentier's "Louise," a group of charming Scandinavian songs by Sjogren, Peterson-Berger and Grieg. Her next group consisted of "Ah, Love, But a Day," by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach; "Lullaby," by Cyril Scott, and "Summertime," by Ward Stevens. Mme. Sundelius is a finished artist, her voice is clear and sweet, and she handles it with complete ease. Added to all this is a complete effacement of self, the charming singer entering thoroughly into the spirit of the composer. This was Mme. Sundelius' second appearance in Minneapolis, and she pleased even more than on her first visit. She responded to many enthusiastic encores.

Northwestern Conservatory Notes.

The most important conservatory event of the past month was the faculty recital on October 31, by John Seaman Garns, the new head of the expression school. A large and enthusiastic audience was in attendance to hear the interesting program, which consisted of a talk upon "Romance and Romanticism," illustrated by readings from "Monsieur Beaucaire," by Booth Tarkington. Ethel Alexander and John Beck opened the program with suite for two pianos by Reinhold.

On November 13, at 8 o'clock, in studio 510, Elizabeth Brown-Hawkins, of the conservatory voice department, will give the first of informal musicales which have been a feature of her work for the last five years.

So much interest was manifested in the Grieg recital given by Karen Westvig, of the Conservatory piano department, at the faculty hour last Saturday morning, that the program will be repeated in conservatory hall on the evening of November 13.

The following pupils of Ethel Alexander, Karen Westvig, Harriett Gongle, of the conservatory piano department, appeared in the junior recital on Saturday afternoon: Nadine Leighton, Lillian Layden, Margaret Schultz, Norma Peterson, Marjorie Johnston, Margaret Clute and Minnie Fineman. They were assisted by Verna Monette, reader. John Beck, instructor of the piano department, gave a five-minute talk upon "Who Should Study Music and Why."

The first of a series of faculty recitals to be given in the city high schools by members of the conservatory faculty was held at South High School last Thursday morning, when Gladys Conrad, violinist; Robert Fullerton, tenor, and John Beck, pianist, gave an interesting program.

Evelyn Gardner, Marguerite Mathieson, Alpha Kelsey, Ardis Lofgren, Maude Knight, Margaret Bopp, and Margaret Zeney, pupils of Ethel Alexander, Karen Westvig, John Seaman Garns, Luella Bender and Anne Hughes, appeared in student recitals the past week.

At the Stanley Hall vesper service Sunday, November 1, the musical program consisted of numbers by Elizabeth Brown-Hawkins, soprano, and Gladys Conrad, violinist, of the conservatory staff.

Ruth Anderson.

Franklin Riker in New York.

Franklin Riker, the tenor, whose entertaining letters from Milan appeared in the Musical Courier last season, has been forced by the war, in common with so many others, to give up his study in Europe for the present and will spend the winter in New York singing and teaching. He will inaugurate his season by a recital at Aeolian Hall, Friday evening, December 4. The program which Mr. Riker has selected, aside from interesting groups in Italian, French and German, has two carefully selected groups of English songs by some of the best American composers.

During the last two years and a half, Mr. Riker has been studying with some of the best masters in Europe, including Jean de Reszke, of Paris, and Roberto Villani, of Milan, and his many friends will look forward with great interest to this recital, which is bound to give evidence of the splendid progress which Mr. Riker has made during that time.

VOL. LXIX.—NO. 21. NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1914. WHOLE NO. 1809.

CHICAGO CONCERT SEASON MANIFESTS MUCH ACTIVITY.

Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler Appears in Piano Recital—A Manager's "Lost and Found" Experience—Breezy Paragraphs and Current Items.

At the Illinois Theatre on Sunday afternoon, November 15, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler gave her annual piano recital under the direction of F. Wight Neumann. The theatre was completely filled with an enthusiastic and discriminating audience, which acclaimed the popular artist to the echo. Mrs. Zeisler's program was made up of selections well known to piano students and the rendering accorded the different numbers by Mme. Zeisler was a veritable piano lesson for the numerous pupils present on this occasion. The first group, consisting of the Schubert "Moment Musical," and the minuet in G major and "Sonata Appassionata," by Beethoven, was not heard by this reviewer. The second group was made up entirely of Chopin selections, including the mazurka, op. 7, No. 1; etudes No. 7 and 12, op. 10; valse. No. 2, and ballade, op. 52. The distinguished pianist gave in this group new proof of her art in delivery, her wonderful technic, and her superb musicianship. As ever, her pianissimos were exquisite and in the dynamic passages the bigness of tone was attained without apparent effort or any dynamic misuse of the instrument. It was virile playing, full of strength and beauty. The player's limpid touch and velvety and polished tone also were in evidence. Her readings were of constant interest and the entire recital had about it an air of authority, yet without loss of charm. The listeners were delighted.

Encores were numerous, but not half as many as would have pleased the audience, which seemed bound to have a repetition of each and every number inscribed on the program. However, Mrs. Zeisler contented herself with bowing repeatedly and adding new numbers only at the close of each group.

The writer dwells at length on the Chopin numbers, as he was especially happy to be present during that part of the program. While the pianist's performance of the last group was as excellent, the selections were less fortunate than those heard in the previous one. It was made up of the Paderewski "Théme Varie," A major, which though admirably played by the recitalist, again impressed unfavorably. In the Schloezer "Etude de Concert," which followed, Mrs. Zeisler for one second had a lapse of memory, which probably passed unnoticed with the majority of her hearers, as she repeated one or two bars without a pause, thus giving the public no chance to be cognizant of her mishap. This is only mentioned to show how resourceful Mrs. Zeisler is on the keyboard and how experienced a public player must be in order to meet such an emergency. The arabesque on themes of "The Beautiful Blue Danube," by Schulz-Evler, was the last number on the program. This piece should be relinquished to the eighty-eight note roll on the reproducing piano. It is too long and too bombastic, and does not deserve the notice it has had from good pianists. However, it received rapturous applause, and with a Schubert encore concluded one of the best piano recitals ever heard in this city.

Irene Mitchell in Chicago.

The popular manager of Kansas City, Irene Mitchell, was in Chicago a few days during last week and called at his office. To a representative of the Musical Courier Miss Mitchell said that she enjoyed her stay in town very much, especially since recovering her gold purse. Upon inquiring as to the story of the gold purse, this office was informed that it had been lost at the Midway Gardens, where Miss Mitchell had enjoyed an evening with several well known Chicago artists. Leaving the Gardens, Miss Mitchell did not notice that her purse was missing, and only upon her return to her hotel did she discover that she had left the purse, containing a five hundred dollar certificate of deposit, several checks and about $50 in bills. She at once telephoned to her friends, as well as to the Midway Gardens, but was informed that the purse had not been found. The following day at lunch Miss Mitchell was paged at the Congress Hotel, and upon her return to her table was asked by a bell boy if she was not Miss Mitchell from Kansas City. Upon her affirmative answer she was told that a lady who was dining two or three tables from her had something of interest to tell her. Miss Mitchell went over to the adjoining table and met the lady, who asked her if she had not lost something of value. Miss Mitchell thought it was a joke of one of her friends, but answered, however, that she had lost a gold purse containing much money and other valuables. The lady informed her that a friend had found the purse, and if she would call Mr. Woods at the Midway Gardens the purse would probably be returned. At once Miss Mitchell telephoned and the purse was returned. "The funniest thing of all this," said Miss Mitchell, "is that my story is not from any press department, but a true statement, even if emanating from a manager."

KING AND QUEEN OF BELGIUM AND THEIR ELDEST SON AT HOME BEFORE THE WAR.

This picture of the King and Queen of Belgium and their eldest son at home, before the war, was first published in the Musical Courier on August 27, 1913, and appeared in the London Tatler of November 4, 1914, in connection with the following remarks: "No one can miss the pathos of this charming picture of the hero King taken in happy days before the war. Europe owes a debt to brave little Belgium she can never repay, and Belgium has made her name immortal throughout the ages. King Albert was the idol of his country before the war; he is now the idol of civilization, which will spare no efforts to avenge the wrongs he and his country have suffered and to vindicate the cause we have in common."

Chicago Concert Quartet in Oak Park.

Last Tuesday evening, November 17, the Chicago Concert Quartet, directed by Carl D. Kinsey, appeared at the Oak Park Club. The quartet and its director met with their customary success.

Helen Bright Bengel-Hazel Burket-Russell Joint Recital.

At the Fine Arts Theatre on Sunday afternoon, in the Metropolitan Artists' Course, given under the direction of Ernest Briggs, Helen Bright Bengel and Hazel Burket-Russell were the soloists. Mrs. Bengel was heard for the purpose of this review in her second group, which was made up of Wolff's "An Eine Aeolsharfe," Brahms' "Nachtigall" and Strauss' "Schlagende Herzen." Mrs. Bengel disclosed a beautiful contralto voice, sweet in quality and large in volume. Her diction is excellent, but her readings very poor. It would be well for this coming artist to hear other singers and to benefit by their interpretations of the German lieds, of which she seems to have an erroneous conception, as was manifested, especially through her readings of the Strauss number. Fortunately, the singer had the very best of support in Edgar Nelson, who played delightful accompaniments and who certainly understands song literature. Hazel Burket-Russell was heard in the Schumann sonata, in G minor. Mrs. Russell seems to lack in personality. Her playing is cold and uninteresting, yet she made up for the coolness of her reading by exactness of tempo and clarity of tone. Mrs. Russell, furthermore, is well equipped technically and in a measure deserved her success.

Mabel Sharp Herdien in Demand.

Mabel Sharp Herdien, soprano, was the soloist last Sunday evening with the Sunday Evening Club, at Orchestra Hall. On Wednesday, November 18, she was the soloist at the Oriental Consistory, and the following day, November 19, she appeared in recital before the Normal School. Mrs. Herdien's bookings for the balance of the month are practically solid, while she has already secured many engagements for the months of December, January, February and March, which will be published in these columns in the near future.

Alice Nielsen, Soloist, with Irish Choral Society.

Alice Nielsen is announced as the soloist with the Irish Choral Society of 250 voices at their concert of Irish melodies, to be given in Orchestra Hall, Tuesday evening, November 24. The society will present a number of quaint and charming folksongs never before heard in Chicago.

Sturkow Ryder a Popular Composer.

Theodora Sturkow Ryder's new song, "Love's Feast," which has been so well received, was heard again on Tuesday afternoon, November 17, at the reception given by Mrs. George B. Carpenter in Fine Arts Hall. Elsa Arendt sang this song, with the composer at the piano.

Walter Spry School First Faculty Concert.

On Sunday afternoon, November 29, at the Fine Arts Theatre, the Walter Spry Music School will give its first faculty concert. Among the teachers who will participate are: Minnie Fish-Griffin, soprano; Hugo Kortschak, violinist; James Whittaker, pianist. Jessie M. Curtis and Walter Spry were the accompanists.

Clarence Whitehill to Sing in "Messiah."

Clarence Whitehill has been engaged as soloist for the two performances of "The Messiah," to be given by the Apollo Musical Club at the Auditorium, December 25 and 27.

Amateur Musical Club to Present Efrem Zimbalist.

Next Monday afternoon, November 23, at the Illinois Theatre, at the one hundred and thirty-fourth artists' recital given under the auspices of the Amateur Musical Club, the program will be furnished by Efrem Zimbalist, violinist.

Second Sinai Orchestral Concert.

The second concert of the third season of the Sinai Orchestra will be given Sunday evening, November 22, at Sinai Temple, with Arthur Dunham conducting, and Benjamin Paley, violinist, as soloist. Besides directing the orchestra Mr. Dunham will also play on the organ the Bossi "Etude Symphonique."

GEORGIA KOBER AND WILLIAM WEGENER IN RECITAL.

Last Thursday evening, November 19, at Recital Hall, Fine Arts Building, the Sherwood Music School presented in a joint recital Georgia Kober, pianist, and William Wegener, tenor. Miss Kober, who is the president of the Sherwood School, and who, in addition to heading the piano department at her school, is busily engaged all through the year concertizing, has long been a favorite in Chicago. She scored heavily and justly so, as seldom has she been heard to better advantage than on this occasion. Her selections were well chosen and her playing was a source of joy. The affair attracted a capacity audience.

MRS. GABRILOWITSCH, OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH AND MISS GABRILOWITSCH ON SHIPBOARD.

EARLE BLAIR-CHARLES LABERGE RECITAL.

Earl Blair, pianist, and Charles LaBerge, baritone, were heard in a joint recital given under the auspices of the American Conservatory of Music at Kimball Hall on Saturday afternoon, November 24.

AMERICAN CONSERVATORY NOTES.

Adolf Weidig will give the first of a series of three lectures on the origin and development of chamber music, Saturday afternoon, November 28, at Kimball Hall. The lecture will be musically illustrated by the Misses Robyn, Bergusen, Merrill, Lychenheim, Woodworth and Hans Hess. Mr. Weidig gave a lecture before the students of the Illinois State University at Champaign, November 11, on "The Modern Orchestra," with special reference to the instruments employed.

Karleton Hackett read a paper on "The Problem and Opportunity of the Music Teacher in the Community" before the Kansas State Teachers' Association, at Topeka, Friday, November 23.

Two students' recitals were given by the American Conservatory on October 31 and November 7 by piano pupils of Heniot Levy and Kurt Wanieck, voice pupils of Ragna Linne and Charles LaBerge, and violin pupils of Herbert Butler.

Advanced pupils of Walton Pyre gave a dramatic recital at the American Conservatory Recital Hall, Friday evening, November 13. The program included recitations and several playlets, including "The Falcon," by Tennyson.

MARY LINDSAY OLIVER SECURES HAVRAH HUBBARD.

In a letter received at this office during the week from Mary Lindsay Oliver, the pianist, manager and critic on the Moline Dispatch, she said among other things: "I am sending you an account of Mr. Hubbard's talk here before the Woman's Club, of Moline, last Saturday. Mr. Hubbard has certainly developed a most interesting, instructive and inspiring form of presenting the subject of opera to the layman. I hope that very many committees may have the privilege of listening to him, as I feel he will do much good wherever he can go. I am very glad I was able to secure him for the Moline Woman's Club, which counts nearly 900 members." Mr. Hubbard's lecture was a discussion on opera and a reading of "Monna Vanna."

Miss Oliver invited, on the same occasion, her many friends to her studios for an informal evening to meet Mr. Hubbard and his accompanist, Floyd Baxter, who had furnished the attraction at the Woman's Club in the afternoon. Most of those present were musicians, students of music or music lovers. Miss Oliver gave also a piano number, and Mr. Hubbard and Mr. Baxter gave the "Secret of Suzanne," by Wolf Ferrari. Mr. Hubbard, according to the Moline paper, remarked that he had seen studios of various descriptions, but none as beautiful as Miss Oliver's.

HELEN STANLEY AT EVANSTON WOMAN'S CLUB.

The second musical morning given under the management of Rachel Busey-Kinsolving at the Evanston Woman's Club brought forth Helen Stanley in a diversified program. Miss Stanley's beautiful soprano voice was heard to marked advantage in operatic numbers, which included the aria of "Lia," from "L'Enfant Prodigue," the "Vissi D'Arte," from "Tosca," and "Il est Bon," from Massenet's "Herodiade," which were done in true operatic and artistic fashion. The Brahms and Schubert numbers showed Miss Stanley a versatile artist and three new German songs from the pen of Alfred Szendrei were delivered with spirit. Miss Stanley is possessed of a lovely clear soprano voice, which she uses most artistically. Her enunciation was good and she pleased a critical audience.

CELÉNE LOVELAND BUSY.

Celéne Loveland appeared last week with much success at the Visitation Convent in St. Louis. After the recital the Mother Superior asked Manager O'Hanlon to be kind enough to send her all the programs that Miss Loveland could play, stating further that she was one of the most brilliant pianists ever heard at the school. Many of the young ladies present informed Miss Loveland that they were surprised at how she could remember so much. The same week Miss Loveland was in Kansas City, where she played several recitals, including one at a large school and one before the Kansas City Woman's Club. On Monday afternoon, November 30, Miss Loveland is to appear in Chicago before the Amateur Musical Club at its monthly meeting in Assembly Hall.

JENNETTE LOUDON AND HOWARD VAN SWERINGEN IN RECITAL.

A number of friends of Jennette Loudon and Howard van Sweringen were invited to a studio recital last Sunday afternoon, November 15. Miss Loudon and Mr. van Sweringen furnished a most interesting program, which was appreciated by an enthusiastic assemblage. That Miss Loudon and Mr. van Sweringen are very popular was demonstrated by the large gathering which crowded the large studio despite the cold, rainy weather.

CHICAGO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

The program for the pair of symphony concerts given by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Frederick Stock, at Orchestra Hall this week, was made up of the overture to Weber's "Abou Hassan," the G minor symphony by Mozart and the Sinigaglia suite, "Piemontese." The soloist was Louise Homer.

MR. AND MRS. OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH AND THE FLONZALEY QUARTET EN ROUTE TO AMERICA.

THEODORA STURKOW RYDER'S DATES.

Theodora Sturkow Ryder will fill the following engagements in the next few weeks: November 24, a recital at Grand Rapids, Mich.; November 25, Academy Fine Arts, Chicago; November 30, Des Moines, Ia.; December 2, Battle Creek, Mich., December 4 and 5, Indianapolis, Ind.; December 7, Cincinnati, Ohio, and December 9 and 10 she plays in Syracuse, N. Y. When she is East, Mrs. Ryder will stop off at Ithaca and call at the Pathé Freres studio to see her sister, Elsie Esmond, who is one of this company's leading ladies in moving picture roles.

NOTES.

Cave Thompson, the blind pianist of Chicago, will give recitals at Oglesby, Ill., November 25; Chaffee, Mo., December 3, and Winona Lake, Ind., December 11. For his fall recitals Mr. Thompson has arranged an interesting program.

Elsa Fern MacBurney, soprano, with Grace Grove, accompanist, sang the following group of songs, Wednesday afternoon, November 18, at the Women's Society of the Hyde Park Church of Disciples: "Blossom Time" and "A Rose Rhyme," by Salter; Spross' "Yesterday and Today," and MacFadyen's "Birthday Song."

Carl Friedberg, the German pianist, will make his first appearance in Chicago in recital under the direction of F.

MANAGERS' FORUM.

Express Your Opinion.

[Comment and suggestions are invited upon any of the topics discussed in this department. They should be addressed to "The Managerial Forum," care of MUSICAL COURIER, 437 Fifth avenue, New York.]

Creative and Destructive Managerial Work.

The intention of these remarks is not to criticize individual methods used in managerial work, nor to take exception to special instances where the artist has encompassed his own destruction, but rather to discuss the work being done "on the road" to create new musical fields, and to show how oftentimes splendid possibilities are destroyed.

Perhaps in no other profession or line of business is there so much overstocking done by traveling men as in the concert business. One could mention scores of cities all over the United States where hundreds of clubs and local managers have been put out of business through overstocking on the part of some too zealous manager.

Better One Less Than One Too Many.

Let us admit that it is impossible to figure out exactly what the "digestive capacity" of a new field might be. So much more is there reason to warn the novice in the local concert managerial profession against overstocking during the first few seasons. The traveling manager ought to be fairly well posted on these matters, and if, notwithstanding he forces the issue by holding out gilded prospects to his new buyer, he is certainly destroying and not creating new musical fields. These matters are not mere hallucinations, for every intelligent manager will admit that lack of foresight and ignorance of local conditions have caused artists' managers to commit more blunders than they can repair in a lifetime. The total elimination of such mistakes will be a hopeless issue until the artists' managers are sufficiently moved by the modern spirit of this age to bury their petty grievances and form a protective and cooperative association for the preservation of their own interests, those of the artists, the local managers, and (lest one forget) the audience, who supply the lucre with which managerial machinery is run.

Clash of Interests.

To find the happy dividing line between the interests of the managers' artists and those of the novice local manager is not a light matter by any means. The manager is under great moral as well as material obligation to the artist in accepting the responsibility (and money) given in good faith, that by hook or crook results will be attained. It is but natural, therefore, that the manager on the road looms up as a sort of modern Atlas carrying a burden often entirely out of proportion to his ability.

Results at All Odds.

On he goes, his weary way tracked by competitors at every step. Under such conditions is it to be wondered at that some managers are apt to adopt not only ethically questionable but positively condemnable methods when they find a locality where the soil is virgin as yet.

There is a man in a thriving city who went into the concert managerial enterprise with a bit of capital and the honest intention to work and succeed. He did succeed—in losing every penny, his health, and something more, his name.

The man is one of the many, simply another victim who contracted for enough attractions to supply his entire State with, not only one city. The managers, who, knowing the true state of affairs, moved him to sign additional contracts, have been guilty of not creative but positively destructive work.

Too Much Is Unhealthy.

In another locality is a good "live town" that had a prosperous course. Competition being the life of trade, another series was founded in due time. The two merely existed. And now came the climax of troubles in a form in which it often visits innocent localities—viz, a manager who simply had to book in that city, with gilded words induced a third person to start a course, and so came about a trio of enterprises. All this in a city that could support only one first class concert course. During the following season that city proved to be a Waterloo to some of our most glittering stars.

Demoralizing Effects.

The destructive effects of such work reach out into many channels:

First, the managers, artists and the entire profession lose prestige and respect.

Second, in their anxiety to pretend success at all odds, each of the local managers distributes free tickets. This is the beginning of the end, for such a community probably never will regain its normal state.

Third, the manager of the artist exposes himself to endless attacks from his artists and the beguiled local manager.

E Pluribus Unum.

In one of the northern cities of Michigan similar conditions prevailed for two seasons. Each camp hoped that the other would disband, but they did nothing of the sort. Fortunately there was a college professor in that city who possessed more horse sense than the whole tribe of artist managers and their respective local representatives put together. After many failures this wise man succeeded in coralling the belligerents around one table and asked them this question: "What are you gentlemen working for?"

"Money," echoed the chorus in unison.

"Have you made any as yet?" There were some furtive side glances exchanged, a bit of coughing and hesitation, then in pp. con sordino, each piped forth a dolorous, "No!"

"Well, then, so far as I can see," said the modern Solomon, "you're all on the wrong track." This was also admitted in due order.

The peacemaker suggested consolidation, but here their warrior spirit asserted itself and none would hear of it. It did not take many moments before the local managers were convinced by the peacemaker that there were but two paths to choose: either consolidate or he would arrange for a course so superior to theirs and at such ridiculously low prices—backed by the students and the entire public—that they would soon be driven off the earth. His tenor sang very threatening—nay, more—convincing. The three lists were combined into one splendid course, each of them was well repaid for his work and the habitual papered houses are a thing of the cobwebbed past.

Wielding the "Big Stick."

Before closing the subject of destructive managerial work, one cannot pass by those numerous instances where local managers have been frightened into signing contracts for three or four artists whom they never dreamed of engaging, but were compelled to list because Mr. Manager has an artist who could not be secured unless the local man signed for the other three or four also. This is a very ordinary method, but one that is dying its natural death.

Please follow this simile. A traveling man strikes a new town and steps into John Brown's grocery store:

"Mr. Brown, I have a patented article here that will bring you a great volume of business if you will buy the sole distributing rights for your city."

Mr. Brown becomes interested. He sees the patent shoe polish, tooth brush, or whatever it may be, and readily discovers that it is a good thing. Then follows this:

"Of course, Mr. Brown, you understand that in order to get the sole selling rights for that article you will have to buy from us six barrels of soda crackers, one carload of nut crackers, ten gross of napkin rings, etc., etc."

If Mr. Brown is good at figures he soon can find out where he will land with his "good thing" and its numerous "if" attachments, but if he is overcome by the mirages of a land flowing with milk and honey, he will try his hand at the bargain. The patent article sells, but there is something wrong with the "ifs."

The following season the drummer strolls in briskly with an air of self confidence. Mr. Brown soon changes all that. The story of the "gold brick" is revived by Mr. Brown, also that ever true one about Lincoln and fooling people all the time

Spirit of the Age.

The only business worth while is the one that is founded on good faith and profits. The manager who allows the local managers "to work out their own salvation" is sinking his own canoe. Every course that depends upon one "star" to redeem six inferior entertainments sooner or later is doomed to failure. That has been the mistake of the old fashioned lyceum system and it seems some of our managers have failed to benefit from those lessons. The reason some managers with unethical and condemnable methods have succeeded in doing business for many years is not to be credited so much to their ingenuity as to the uncultivated territory which made it possible for them to seek ever new fields for their destructive activities.

But those wild and woolly days are over. The managerial profession is being purged and disinfected very effectively, and the local manager with shady tactics cannot stay in the game very long.

Notwithstanding the strenuous shaking of heads by skeptics, the sky will clear entirely when the Managers' Protective and Cooperative Association comes into being. It will and must come, for the spirit of the times is mightier than the influence of all the managers put together.

NEMO.

John Thompson Plays at Harrisburg.

John Thompson, the American pianist, gave a recital in the Capital building, House of Representatives, Harrisburg, Pa., November 9.

This recital was given under the auspices of the Dauphin County Teachers' Institute, and Mr. Thompson was greeted by a capacity house.

Immediately after the concert Mr. Thompson was reengaged for a concert to be given toward the end of January.

The Harrisburg Telegraph reviewed Mr. Thompson's playing as follows:

John Sylvanus Thompson, a young American pianist who has been winning laurels both in this country and in Europe as an artist of rare ability, gave a recital last evening in the House of Representatives before a large and cultured audience. Young Thompson was enthusiastically greeted and, being a native of Dauphin County, added interest was manifested in his appearance. His program was one of exceptional interest and the applause which greeted each number proved that it was not above the heads of his audience.

The great "Walstein" sonata of Beethoven, which opened the program, was interpreted along traditional lines, which is merely saying that both as regards technic and interpretation nothing more could be added. There is a certain virility in Thompson's tone which makes his rendition of Schumann's music somewhat unusual, if not noteworthy. This was particularly noticeable in the "Aufschwung" and "Novelette." There is a certain hidden meaning in much of Schumann which the average pianist fails to fathom. In this respect Thompson possesses unusual insight. The dainty scherzo in E minor of Mendelssohn was admirably played and revealed a touch of sylphlike lightness.

The Chopin group, ballade in G minor, nocturne in F sharp and the great octave polonaise, offered splendid contrast to the preceding numbers. In these Chopin numbers Thompson was clearly at home, in fact, from a technical standpoint, nothing seems impossible for this young man to undertake. It is rare to find in these days a pianist of artistic balance and a sane conception of chiaroscural values. Thompson has earned the right to membership in this unusual class. The piece de resistance was undoubtely the last number, Liszt's "La Campanella," which was played with a dash and bravoura most dazzling and called forth thunderous applause; in fact, the audience refused to leave until Thompson responded with an encore. Thompson's future as an artist pianist is surely assured.

The program was as follows:

Sonata, op. 53, Beethoven; "Rigaudon," Rameau-Godowsky; "Aufschwung," Schumann; novelette, E major, Schumann; minuet, E flat, Beethoven; scherzo, E minor, Mendelssohn; ballade, G minor, nocturne, F sharp, polonaise, A flat, Chopin; "Caprice Espagnol," Moszkowski; menuet (all' antico), Leefson; "La Campanella," Liszt.

Francis Rogers' Recital Tributes.

That Francis Rogers' annual New York recital, November 12, met with unusual favor, the following excerpts from the reviews of leading Metropolitan cities indicate:

A song recital always enjoyable and instructive is assured in the annual appearance of Francis Rogers. Mr. Rogers' skill in applying tonal colors and his intelligent and well thought out interpretations are recognized, and his performance yesterday afforded much pleasure.—World.

In all Mr. Rogers showed the sincerity of purpose and the interpretative power that have always been his, and the audience rewarded him with warm applause.—Tribune.

He was at his best vocally, and his program was an especially interesting one, with plenty of variety and contrast and an unusual number of fine songs. Mr. Rogers has a particular liking for very spirited songs, and he sings them well.—Evening Post.

Mr. Rogers' style is freer, more expressive, more varied and truly musical than ever before. His voice sounded yesterday at its best in richness and in quality. He uses head tones with skill and judgment, without excess; and in such songs as the old French "L'amour de moi" and Cornelius' "Ein Ton," both of which he had to repeat, gained beautiful effects therewith.—Times.

He is one of the most firmly grounded singers in the art of song we have, and to hear one of his carefully arranged programs brings enjoyment to the connoisseur of vocal style as well as profitable instruction to the vocal student in general.—Sun. (Advertisement.)

Leonora Allen's Press Comments.

Leonora Allen is the recipient of these tributes:

Miss Allen instantly won favor on account of her delightful personality, her lovely fresh voice with its power, range and sweetness of quality, and her skillful singing. Her aria, Gounod, was given with such clarity and technical ease that it won her a double encore.—Omaha Bee.

Leonora Allen created a deep and decidedly favorable impression through the artistry of her vocalism. Her voice is of considerable power, and as clear as a bell in tone. She phrases her passage work with the skill only to be acquired by long years of training in order to excel.—Winnipeg Tribune.

Miss Allen proved herself not only a capable soprano, but one whom it was a great pleasure to hear. Her voice is clear and pure, and of a peculiarly even quality in all of its registers, that marks the natural singer of very good training. There was no unsteadiness of the tremolo that is noticed in the work of many singers.—Indianapolis News.

Miss Allen is possessed of a voice of more than usual beauty and sympathy, easily produced and gratifying, true in pitch and round in tone form. She sings freely and confidently, and enunciates so that every word is intelligible.—Chicago Tribune.

Pilzer to Give Violin Recital.

Maximilian Pilzer will give a violin recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, Sunday evening, December 6. Mr. Pilzer, who has been heard frequently in recent years, is now acting concertmaster of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Edith Chapman Goold's Activities.

Edith Chapman Goold is one of those singers who keep busy, but do not talk very much about what they are doing.

"I am just as busy as I want to be now," she told the writer recently.

On Monday evening, November 16, Mrs. Goold sang the part of Bastienne in the Mozart operetta "Bastien and

EDITH CHAPMAN GOOLD,
Soprano.

Bastienne," which she, together with Heinrich Meyn and DeLos Becker, gave before the MacDowell Club, New York. William Humiston directed a selected orchestra on this occasion.

Mrs. Goold's recital programs are made up usually of French, German and English compositions. During her summer vacation she appeared in two joint recitals; one with Charles Roseley, tenor, at Prouts Neck, Me., and one with Lawrence Adler, pianist, in Dublin, N. H.

Her long and successful association with quartet work is well known. At present she is the soprano in a quartet, the other members of which are Rose Bryant, contralto; John Young, tenor, and Wilfred Glenn, basso.

Mrs. Goold is booked to sing on several occasions in "The Messiah" during December and there are also many engagements pending to be filled after January 1.

Schumann-Heink Charms Brooklynites.

At her Brooklyn, N. Y., recital, Thursday evening, November 19, given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Mme. Schumann-Heink sang the three arias from "Samson and Delilah" (Saint-Saëns), "Spring Song," "O Love of Thy Might," "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice" and the "Adriano" aria, from "Rienzi" (Wagner). These formed the opening group. "All Through the Night" (Old Welsh) and "Good Morning, Sue" (Delibes) were other Brooklyn numbers, not heard on the New York recital program delivered by the prima donna recently.

Edward J. McNamara, the baritone protege of Mme. Schumann-Heink, assisted with three numbers, prologue to "Pagliacci" (Leoncavallo), "Red, Red, Rose" (Hastings) and "Ould Plaid Shawl" (Haynes), disclosing a voice of unusually rich quality, resonant and full.

The big crowd that again greeted the great contralto at the Academy of Music demonstated anew that Mme. Schumann-Heink has a permanent place, and a niche all her own in the hearts of Brooklyn lovers of song. It goes without saying that the diva had to respond to numerous encores. Schumann's "Frauenliebe und Leben," Arthur Foote's "An Irish Folksong," Wolfe's "Heimweh" and Carrie Jacobs Bond's "His Lullaby" also were on the program.

Search's New York Recital.

Frederick Preston Search, a young violoncellist from the West, made his bow before a New York audience at Aeolian Hall, on Wednesday evening, November 18. Mr. Search deserves credit for playing an unusual program, the only number upon it with which the New York public is especially familiar being "Am Springbrunnen," by Davidoff. He proved himself to be a player of much musical talent and with a decided natural gift for the instrument. He possesses considerable technic, in the display of which he was somewhat hampered by the instrument upon which he played. He shows musicianship in his phrasing and interpretation, and is also especially to be commended for his moderate and artistic use of the vibrato, which is so exaggerated by most players of the day. He was also heard as a composer, playing of his own compositions an aria and a sonata in G, both of which were attractive and proved this young man to possess genuine talent.

St. Louis Orchestra Season Begun.

St. Louis, Mo., November 11, 1914.

The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra opened its season Friday afternoon, November 6. Conductor Max Zach was greeted by salvos of applause. The opening number was Brahms' "Tragic" overture. Other numbers were the symphony in C major, by Schubert; Smetana's symphonic poem, "From Bohemia's Fields and Groves," heard for the first time in St. Louis, and "Tannhäuser" overture. There are seven new men in the orchestra. Ludwig Pleyer will lead the cello section in place of Max Steindel, who is now playing in Chicago. The program was repeated on Saturday night, November 7.

The Sunday "Pop" attracted a capacity audience. The encores were frequent and several numbers had to be repeated. The program, with annotations, was neatly gotten up by Charles Allen Cale, a member of the orchestra.

The Rubinstein Musical Club gave its first meeting of the season at the Cabanne Branch Library, Tuesday morning, November 10.

The School of Expressional Arts gave an interesting program Tuesday evening, November 10, to a large audience. F. Lillebridge delivered an interpretative lecture on the Chopin C minor scherzo. Eugenia Getner sang the

"An artist of quite unusual quality, a rare and exceptional talent. * * * * There is a burning intensity in her style, a fiery sweep; her playing is impetuous and hot blooded, full of high lights and deep shadows, yet it can be exquisitely restrained, and is not lacking in artistic reticence Her tone is of great beauty, whether it is in passages of delicacy or of power."—The New York Times, Nov. 17, 1914

"Jean d'Arc" aria by Bemberg, and Allan Bacon played "Eroica" by Liszt.

An informal musicale was given at the Principia Academy, November 8, by Allan Bacon, pianist.

Olga Hambuechen, contralto, and Louis Templeman, baritone, gave a concert at Aeolian Hall, Saturday, November 7. Miss Hambuechen and Mr. Templeman are products of the Tausig Studios and are now assistants of that popular teacher.

Max Gottschalk, a member of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, and one of this city's leading composers, has finished a quartet for strings, which was played at the Violinist Guild. He is working at present on a piano quintet.

Blanche Herrick, contralto, and soloist at the West Presbyterian Church, gave an interesting program for the Kirkwood Choral Society on November 10.

MAY BIRDIE DITZLER.

Mrs. Harrison Irvine's Musicale.

Mrs. J. Harrison-Irvine will present her pupil, Pauline Giesselmann, of the Thuel Burnham Scholarship, MacDowell Club, in a piano recital, at her studios, 1013 Carnegie Hall, New York, Sunday afternoon, December 6. David Hochstein, violinist, will assist.

A reception will follow, at which Regina de Sales, of Paris, will be the guest of honor.

Mrs. John R. MacArthur and Charlotte Babcock will assist Mrs. Irvine in receiving; likewise the young artists, who will give the program. These are the numbers: Prelude-fuga xxi (Bach), "Sonata Pathétique" (Beethoven), Miss Giesselmann; romance (Schumann), waltz (Brahms), "La Capricieuse" (Elgar), Mr. Hochstein; valse, op. 42, etudes, op. 25, No. 5, op. 25, No. 1, op. 25, No. 11 (Chopin), Miss Gieselmann; melodie (Tschaikowsky), caprice (Paganini), "Rhapsodia Piemontese" (Sinigaglia), Mr. Hochstein; "Hexentanz" (MacDowell), "Oiseaux Tristes" (Ravel), "Papillons" (Rosenthal), "Danse Negre" (Scott), Miss Giesselmann.

LOS ANGELES BREVITIES.

Los Angeles, Cal., October 31, 1914.

An audience that filled the aduitorium of the Ebell gathered Wednesday morning to hear Mr. Tandler's talk upon his trip abroad this summer and the musicians he met, music he heard, etc. It was an exceedingly witty discourse and kept the audience interested and bubbling over with laughter most of the time. Idis Lazar, the brilliant young pianist, and Mr. Tandler played the Liszt preludes for two pianos.

Friday morning Mr. Tandler addressed the Friday Morning Club upon "The Instruments of My Orchestra." In this he was assisted by sixteen members of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra, who demonstrated the characteristic instruments making up a modern orchestra. It proved to be exceedingly entertaining to the large audience of women present and aroused increased interest in the coming concerts. The first pair of concerts of the Symphony Orchestra occur November 20 and 21 and they are anticipated with great pleasure.

MRS. CATHERWOOD'S FIRST RECEPTION.

Jane Catherwood resumed on Monday evening the monthly receptions and musicales which she established last year. They proved such a success that it was the universal desire that they should be continued this year. At this first evening, a large and brilliant company gathered in the music room of the Fowler Apartments. The feature of the evening was the talks by Marie Elliott, of Pasadena, and Mary L. O'Donoghue, each of whom were caught in the war district of Europe this summer. Both are brilliant speakers and their talks proved fascinating and instructive—full of wit and wisdom. A group of songs was sung by Thomas Govan, the young Scotch baritone, who has the gift of the genuine ballad singer, namely, remarkable beauty of tone, ease of diction and much feeling. His singing was a delight to every one. Mme. M. V. Budrow, the Castilian soprano, whose brilliant and lovely voice the writer has mentioned in former letters, sang the polonaise from "Mignon," and as an encore "La Paloma," which she gives inimitably. Her work shows fine schooling and genuine musical sense. The accompanists were Lorna Gregg and Kassa Bailey.

New Firm to Manage Wheeler Concerts.

William Wheeler has just been signed by Foster & Foster as their leading tenor. From many excellent voices, this new managerial firm, which is located at 25 West Forty-second street, New York, selected Mr. Wheeler for his long standing and meritorious work on which to help build their reputation.

The following dates already have been booked for Mr. Wheeler: November 17, Waterbury, Conn., Westover

WILLIAM WHEELER.

I.; January 15, Pittsburgh; February 3, Smith College; March 4, Syracuse University, "St. Paul"; March 10, Cambridge, Mass.; March 11, Harvard University; March 12, Williams College; March 15, Yale University; March 19, Princeton University.

MINNEAPOLIS ORCHESTRA ACTIVE IN HOME CITY.

Symphonic Organization Performs Popular and Young People's Programs—A Joint Recital—Current Notes.

Minneapolis, Minn., November 21, 1914.

A capacity house (and 200 people turned away) greeted the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra at the popular concert on Sunday afternoon, November 15. The sixth ("Pathetic") symphony of Tschaikowsky was the best number on the program. Emil Oberhoffer directs this work with a sympathy and finish that are beyond criticism. Tschaikowsky's "Marche Slav" was given a stupendous reading by Mr. Oberhoffer.

The andante from the violin concerto was played by all the first violins. It is a lovely arrangement by Jungnickel. The program closed with a captivating performance of the "Dance of the Hours," from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda."

Frances Ingram instantly gained favor with the audience by her lovely contralto voice. Her programmed numbers were: "O Don Fatale," from Verdi's "Don Carlos"; "Voce di donna," from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda," and as encore she sang "Strida la vampa," from Verdi's "Trovatore," and Elgar's "Where Corals Lie."

Young People's Orchestral Concert.

The second Young People's Concert of the fourth season took place at the Auditorium on Friday afternoon, and every available seat was taken. Emil Oberhoffer told in a bewitching manner the story of the "Nutcracker and Mouse King" and gave illustrations at the piano of all the different themes. The Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra played on this occasion eight parts of this ballet suite by Tschaikowsky. No child in Minneapolis ought to miss these concerts. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," from the "Thousand and One Nights," was performed, as was also the symphonic poem, "Sleeping Beauty in the Woods," by Bruneau. The program was brought to a close by the "Magic Fire Scene" and the "Ride of the Valkyries," by Wagner.

The next program will be given November 27, when the stories of "Hänsel and Gretel," "Kikimora," "Snow White" and "The King's Children" will be told and played.

McPhail-Phillips Joint Recital.

William MacPhail, violinist, and Harry Phillips, basso cantante, gave a joint recital in the Unitarian Church, November 13. William MacPhail has developed a clientele of pupils who are as devoted as they are ambitious and talented. His most advanced pupil is J. Rudolph Peterson, a member of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. Mr. MacPhail gave a hundred concerts last season, going as far west as Seattle. Most of these were in connection with the extension work carried on by the University of Minnesota. This season the MacPhail String Quartet has been almost constantly en tour, and has everywhere met with warm approval. Mr. MacPhail is always a satisfying player. He reveals decided progress and much breadth of tone. His conception of Beethoven's romance in F major was musicianly and the "Prize Song" from "Meistersinger" was given a compelling performance. Dienzl's "Spinning Song" was played delightfully. Mr. MacPhail gave the real Norse rendition to the "Vaggsang" of Tor Aulin. The ample technic demanded by Wieniawski's A major polonaise was at the finger tips of the player. A Brahms-Joachim Hungarian dance, Schubert-Wilhelmj's "Ave Maria" and Kreisler's "Liebesfreud" closed a most delightful program.

Last mentioned, but by no means "the least," were the excellent accompaniments supplied by Margaret Gilmore-MacPhail. She is quite as equally gifted as her husband, and is the young mother of a beautiful baby boy. This was her first appearance in public for some time and she was welcomed back with enthusiasm. A crowded house greeted these favorite artists and great applause followed every number.

Minneapolis School of Music, Oratory and Dramatic Art.

Signa C. Olsen, of the faculty, who has been heard in public only once since her return from Berlin, where she was a pupil of Michael Zadora and Ethel Leginska, gave an interesting program in the school hall, Saturday morning, November 14, before a large audience of pupils and friends. Miss Olsen's musicianly attainments and splendid technic enabled her to give a satisfactory reading of her entire program. She was most successful in the Chopin group at the close of the recital.

The regular faculty hour for Saturday, November 21, will be devoted to the first Beethoven concert to be given by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. Signor Fabbrini will give a lecture on Beethoven, his life and works and discuss the music of the program, illustrating at the piano. He will be assisted by Ebba Sundstrom, violinist, and Mrs. Herbert Pendleton, pianist.

The advanced pupils of the dramatic department, under the direction of Mrs. Charles M. Holt and Miss Kellett, have in preparation for the Christmas season the very beautiful nativity play, "Bethlehem," by Lawrence Houseman.

Northwestern Conservatory Notes.

Elizabeth Brown-Hawkins, of the Conservatory voice department, with her students, gave the first of the regular monthly informal musicales on Thursday evening, in Studio 510. A delightful program of solos and duets was given by Mabel Sibley, Mabel Oslund, Nora Anderson, Minetta Ballou. Ethel Carlson, violinist, pupil of Gladys Conrad, assisted, with Lola Newell, class of 1913, at the piano.

David Patterson, instructor in the Conservatory piano and theory departments, announces a Chopin program, to take place at the faculty hour, December 5, in Conservatory Hall.

John Seaman Garns, John Beck, Ethel Alexander, David Patterson, Margaret Daugherty, Glady's Conrad, of the expression, piano and violin departments, presented the following pupils at the student recital, on Wednesday, November 18: Florence Groth, Marion Livingston, Esther Sandberg, Selma Anderson, Roy Knutson, Ruth Foster, Vienna Larsen. Mabel Sibley and Nora Anderson, pupils of Elisabeth Brow-Hawkins, assisted in a group of Tuscan folksong by Caracciola.

Ethel Lyman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. Lincoln Lyman, of Rochester, Minn., is numbered among the newly enrolled non-resident students at the Conservatory.

Minneapolis Notes.

Cornelius van Vliet, the Dutch cellist, will play, besides all his Minneapolis engagements, the following recitals: November 2, Winnipeg Women's Musical Club; November 10, Atchison, Kan., joint recital with Jenny Dufau; November 17, St. Joseph, Mo., recital; December 5, Cincinnati, Ohio, joint recital with Julia Culp; January 6, recital for Thursday Musical, Minneapolis; January 11, La Crosse, Wis., recital, Musical Club. The Minneapolis Trio, consisting of Cornelius van Vliet, cellist; Giuseppe Fabbrini, pianist, and Karl Scheurer, violinist, won such marked favor last season that they will give a second series of three concerts this year. The first, November 15, will bring the trio, op. 1, of Wolfgang Korngold, the child composer. At the second concert, January 21, they will be heard in another novelty, the trio, op. 8, of Hans Pfitzner, and at the last concert, March 17, a trio by Joseph Jongen will be performed.

The Seton Guild (Catholic girls) are hard at work in all departments. The Choral Club is under the direction of Mme. Mastinelli and the orchestra is drilled by Ruth Anderson. The first concert of the season will take place in the ball room of the Radisson Hotel, November 18.

Beatrice Gjertsen made her first public appearance in Minneapolis at the First Baptist Church, November 10, when she gave a song recital, assisted by Harrison Wall Johnson, pianist.

Ruth Anderson.

"Lucia" at the Century Opera.

With the production of "Lucia" on Tuesday evening, November 18, the Century Opera gave the last of its revivals this season in New York, and on Saturday evening folded its tents and departed hopefully for Chicago, where the organization should meet with much success.

Florence Macbeth sang the title role in "Lucia" and did the part with commendable assurance and aplomb. Her coloratura is flexible, tasteful and brilliant, and in some of the trills and cadenzas she accomplished remarkable results. Miss Macbeth's youth and attractiveness helped her to make the Lucia an agreeable one to look upon and she acted with naturalness and convincing sincerity. Miss Macbeth's contributions to the Century Opera season here have been all too few; she is an artist of real accomplishments and a significant future.

Orville Harrold's Edgar had poise, distinction, fervor and splendid bel canto to recommend it. He always is a satisfying and often an uplifting operatic exponent. Louis Kreidler, the Ashton, made the most of his role, which he presented with dignity and vocal mastery.

The other roles were done well by Elizabeth Campbell, Hardy Williamson, Alfred Kaufman and Frank Mansfield. Of fine volume and quality was the choral singing, and Josiah Zuro led the performance with skill and fervor.

PHILADELPHIA CHORAL SOCIETY OPENS SEASON.

Wolf-Ferrari's "New Life" Well Performed by Chorus, Soloists and Orchestra—A Song Recital and Notes.

Philadelphia, Pa., November 21, 1914.

A report of the Philadelphia Orchestra concerts of November 20 and 21 will be found on another page.

PHILADELPHIA CHORAL SOCIETY SINGS "THE NEW LIFE."

Horatio Connell and Wolf-Ferrari's "The New Life" are becoming inseparably associated. One can hardly think of this bold, impressive work of German-Italian texture without calling to mind the name of Connell, who gives its principal role such eloquent interpretation; and to think of Connell is to remember this Wolf-Ferrari work which seems to summarize his rare artistic virtues. It is not because Connell is a Philadelphian that he sang "The New Life" with the Choral Society last Thursday evening, but it was because Mr. Connell does the role better and has probably done it more frequently than any other baritone. He has sung it five times, I think, in the last three years: twice with the Philadelphia Choral Society, twice with the Musical Society of Milwaukee, and last February with the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto. I happen to know that the Toronto appearance was due to the recommendation of Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

So it was advisedly that musical Philadelphia sent a capacity audience to the Academy of Music last Thursday evening. Mae Farley sang the soprano role with excellent effect and Walter St. Clare Knodle, organist, and Stanley C. Muschamp, Jr., pianist, sustained the high standards of the concert. Members of the Philadelphia Orchestra contributed the orchestral accompaniment. The double chorus showed its usual excellent tone and precise phrasing.

EDWIN EVANS SONG RECITAL.

History repeated itself in the capacity audience which greeted Edwin Evans at his tenth annual recital in Witherspoon Hall last Thursday evening. But history must be getting accustomed to repeating itself on this point. Last year, it will be remembered, at least 200 persons were turned away at this concert. With Stanley Addicks at the piano, Mr. Evans gave an excellent interpretation of the following program, twelve numbers of which were heard for the first time in this city:

Recitative and aria, "With Joy the Impatient Husbandman" (from "The Seasons"), Haydn; "Dawn in the Desert," Ross; "The Pine Tree," Salter; "How Much I Love You," LaForge; "Eve, and a Glowing West," Draper; "A Lover's Litany," Kramer; "Inter Nos," MacFadyen; "Bring Her Again, O Western Wind," Addicks; "The Foggy Dew," Loomis; "Roses for the Flush of Youth," Clough-Leighter; "The Grand Match" (requested), Huhn; "An Evening Song," Speaks; "To Lucasta," Ware; "Night and the Curtains Drawn," Ferrata; "And Let Me the Canikin Clink," Manney; "Noon and Night," Hawley; "Little Mary Cassidy," Old Irish.

PHILADELPHIA NOTES.

David Dubinsky and John K. Witzman, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, were the principal attractions at the first of a series of concerts especially designed for children at the Little Theatre this week.

Effie Leland Golz, of the Philadelphia Musical Academy, was in charge of the special program on "Songs and Legends of the Sea" at the meeting of the Matinee Musical Club, this week. Among the performers were Maud R. Pettit, Emily Stokes Hagar, and Nina Prettyman Howell. This energetic organization has subscribed for four balcony boxes for the opera season.

The Sternberg School of Music announces a recital in Griffith Hall on Friday evening, November 27, by Edward Goldberg, pianist. The program includes the Beethoven sonata, op. 78, in F sharp major, and the MacDowell sonata known as the "Keltic." H. P. QUICKSALL.

Andrea Sarto's Western Tour.

December will be a busy month for Andrea Sarto, the baritone. Beginning November 30, Mr. Sarto is to appear with the Syracuse Liederkranz; December 1, in a concert in Olean, N. Y.; December 6, in Minneapolis, with the Symphony Orchestra; December 8, in Emporia, Kan.; December 9, in Leavenworth, Kan.; December 11, in Salina, Kan.; December 13, with the Wichita Symphony Orchestra, and December 14, in recital at Lindsborg, Kan. Mr. Sarto has been engaged also to sing with the Chicago Apollo Club, Chicago Arts and Travel Club, Buffalo Clef Club and others.

A Maine Relief Fund Concert.

In a Belgian Relief Fund concert given in Waterville, Me., Friday evening, November 20, the following artists furnished the program: Jennie Chace Lee, New York, pianist; Ella Celia Mylius, New York, reader; Frances Emery Stuart, Portland, soprano; Frederick Gunther, New York, bass-baritone; Evangeline A. GiBoin, Portland, at the piano.

Saenger Students Form an Italian Club.

To encourage the study and practice of speaking the Italian language, a club has been formed by a number of Oscar Saenger's pupils which gives promise of a much needed opportunity to students to make themselves proficient in this language. Mr. Saenger, who made the inaugural address in Italian at the first meeting, said among other things, that he thought it possible to learn the various languages here in New York, if one created the proper conditions. He said that New York, besides having the greatest opera house, where the four principal languages are sung, has an Italian, a French and a number of German theatres, by far the best places to acquire a good accent. He also spoke of the difficulty nowadays for the average traveler to find an opportunity to make use of the languages while abroad.

At these gatherings every one speaks Italian, and all are supervised by Dr. Padula, who is the instructor for Mr. Saenger's pupils. The meeting was presided over by Mrs. J. L. Burley, the president, and addresses were made by Lillian Palmer and Dr. Padula. Mabel Garrison, coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, and Queena Tillotson, soprano, entertained the members with their beautiful singing. The club meets fortnightly at Dr. Padula's studio.

CONCERT DIRECTION M. H. HANSON, 437 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

Martha S. Steele Will Sing at Cleveland.

Tuesday evening, December 8, Martha S. Steele, contralto, of Pittsburgh, will appear before the Mendelssohn Club of Cleveland, Ohio. She will sing the solo part in "The Dark," a chorus for women's voices, by David Stanley Smith, and will give the following groups of songs: "Widmung," "Ich grolle Nicht," "Frühlingsnacht," Schumann; "Die Lorelei," Liszt; "Von Ewiger Liebe," Brahms; "I Wept, Beloved," Georges Hüe; "Thy Beaming Eyes," MacDowell; "Lute Song," Horatio Parker; aria from "Nadeschda," "Ah! My Heart Is Weary," A. Goring Thomas.

Mrs. Steele has also been engaged for Wednesday evening, December 9, with the New Castle Symphony Orchestra, and on Tuesday, December 15, she will sing the contralto part in the "Messiah" before the Oratorio Society of the University of Wooster, Wooster, Ohio.

Some of her recent appearances have been: Schumann and Liszt program, before the Pittsburgh Athletic Association, Sunday evening, October 11; Thursday, October 29, with Philharmonic Society, Somerset, Pa.; November 8, 15 and 22, at the Sixth U. P. Church, Pittsburgh, Pa.; December 8, at Cleveland, Ohio; December 9, at New Castle, Pa., and December 15, at University of Wooster, Ohio.

Culp and the Philharmonic.

Julia Culp was the soloist at the New York Philharmonic Society concerts in Carnegie Hall, on November 19 and 20, and a program was given that was scheduled for a week earlier but had to be postponed on account of Miss Culp's nonarrival. As it was Miss Culp only arrived in America a few hours before the concert and gained her first knowledge of her scheduled appearance from newspapers distributed on the steamer at quarantine.

The limited time allotted to her for preparation and rest after her voyage made no noticeable impression, however, upon her performance, which showed its accustomed finish and charm. Her part of the program consisted of an aria, "Il lamento d'Arianna," from one of Monteverdi's operas of which only this aria and certain choral fragments remain. It has been arranged for modern orchestra and has, in many places, a modern character, although the general conception and sequence of harmonies indicate its antiquity. Its somber and gloomy character of passionate grief and despair lend themselves well to the pathetic and tender quality of Miss Culp's voice and her interpretation of it was deeply emotional and effective. She sang also from Brahms' songs with piano accompaniment and was strikingly successful in carrying out the intentions of the composer and of accommodating herself to his everchanging mood. To the great natural beauty of her voice and her personal magnetism are added a perfect control of tone-color, excellent enunciation and emission, and thorough musicianship. She was warmly welcomed by the large audience, but refused to give an encore.

The orchestral part of the concert consisted of Bach's suite in D major and Beethoven's fifth symphony (both interpreted with not much more than ordinary understanding by the conductor, but brilliantly played by the orchestra). Hadley's new tone poem, "Lucifer," of which a very effective reading was given, and Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, wherein the high excellence of the players again was exhibited splendidly.

Hadley's "Lucifer," which had its first public performance upon this occasion, but was privately performed last summer at the Norfolk (Conn.) Festival, is program music of the sort that is spoiled by the program. There is much agreeable music in this tone poem and it is brilliantly scored, but it is ineffective for it produces no thrill, because, probably in its slavish fidelity to the programatic material upon which it is based, it is fragmentary and episodic from beginning to end. The impression left on the hearer is that of a series of disappointments of promising passages suddenly interrupted. It must be added also that the imagination of the composer is guided by too many divergent schools. At times it is frankly Teutonic, at other times as frankly Gallic, it is individual and original only in the impassioned allegro passages which are the best the work contains but too brief to lend their character to the tone poem as a whole.

Sokoloff Plays.

It is not merely the instrument that is responsible for the luscious and full, round tone produced by Nikolai Sokoloff at his recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, on Friday afternoon, November 20. The violin he played is a superb Guarnerius, but his handling of the bow was the chief reason why the tone of the instrument was so exhilarating and satisfying. A far less perfect violin would have sounded musical in Nikolai Sokoloff's hands. In Handel's D major sonata the recitalist was dignified in style and kept strictly to the traditional manner of classical interpretation.

Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" was the most brilliant and extended composition on the program. It contained no difficulties for Nikolai Sokoloff, however, but served as an admirable medium for the violinist's expression of feeling. Even the substitution of the piano in place of the orchestral accompaniment could not mar the beauty of the artist's performance of the solo part.

Bach's sarabande and giga from the sonata in D minor for violin alone gave the performer scope to display the solidity of his technic and the breadth of his musical culture. Ernest Chausson, that inspired and poetic pupil of César Franck, was represented by his "Poéme," op. 25. Nikolai Sokoloff deserves the thanks of the public for giving this lovely work a hearing and for performing it in so masterly a manner. The program ended with a dashing performance of Saint-Saëns' "Havanaise."

Co-Ed Music.

Something new in college history will be accomplished when the Wellesley and Princeton Glee and Banjo Clubs give a joint concert, at the Waldorf-Astoria, on the evening of November 28, for never before has a woman's college musical organization divided the platform, for an evening of song and tinkling strings, with undergraduates from a non-coeducational campus. As a consequence, the sale of tickets, for the benefit of Wellesley's Fire Fund, is progressing briskly.

CINCINNATI ORCHESTRA AT REHEARSAL.

CINCINNATI HEARS A WAGNER NOVELTY.

"Christoph Columbus" Overture Has Initial Local Performance—Dr. Kunwald Introduces Handel Concerto.

Cincinnati, Ohio, November 13, 1914.

The third symphony concert took place this afternoon in Emery Auditorium, with Edmund Burke, dramatic baritone, as soloist. A "novelty" by Richard Wagner, written before his genius had fully crystallized, while he was Musikdirektor of the Magdeburg Theatre in 1835, was played for the first time in Cincinnati. This overture "Christoph Columbus" has many of the Wagner characteristics, but is distinctly a student work and only interesting in so far as it shows the trend of the master mind seeking new avenues of musical thought and expression. There seems to be plenty of good reasons why it has lain dormant these many years.

Two years ago Dr. Kunwald introduced to the local musical public Handel's concerto grosso, No. 6, furnishing something of a sensation by presiding at the piano and playing a basso continuo the while he directed the orchestra. On today's program there appeared the Handel concerto grosso, No. 7, for strings and piano (basso continuo), Dr. Kunwald again appearing in the dual role of director and pianist. The No. 7 concerto contains no solo passages and treats the piano as part of the orchestra. Dr. Kunwald's virile playing was ably seconded by the strings and the concerto was given a spirited rendering.

The climax of the program was the Brahms symphony, No. 1, in C minor, over which much discussion has raged in Cincinnati. Whatever may be said about interpretations of the past, Dr. Kunwald and the Cincinnati Orchestra rose to heights of unsuspected power in the reading of this stupendous work. The symphony has been played here before by Dr. Kunwald, but never in the spirit with which it was given at this concert. Naturally, the orchestra and the conductor have grown into more intimacy since the Brahms No. 1 was first played, and this close association leads to very fine results. The clarity and sturdy vigor of the first movement were especially admirable, followed by triumph on triumph through the expressive andante and the wonderfully beautiful third movement, to the glorious finale with its suggestion of the finale in Beethoven's ninth symphony. The orchestra was superb throughout, awakening a feeling of pardonable pride in Cincinnati's musical achievements of which our orchestra is the apex.

Edmund Burke, who is the fortunate possessor of a resonant, warmly colored baritone, sang with artistic insight two arias, "Quand la Flamme de l'Amour," from Bizet's opera, "La Jolie Fille de Perth," and "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade," by Massenet. His encore, "I'll Sing the Songs of Araby," by Clay, showed him to be a balladist par excellence, and not a few members of the audience expressed a desire to hear Mr. Burke later on in a song recital.

JESSIE PARTLON TYREE.

Werrenrath Engagements.

Among Reinald Werrenrath's engagements in the near future are appearances with the Arion Society of New York, November 29, the Mundell Choral Society of Brooklyn, December 2, and the Mozart Society of New York, December 16. At this last concert, Deems Taylor's new cantata, "The Highwayman," will be given, Mr. Werrenrath singing the solo part, as he did at its initial performance at the MacDowell Festival, Peterboro, N. H., last August.

Boston Welcomes Mrs. Beach.

A demonstration in honor of the return of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was arranged by the MacDowell Club, of Boston, recently. The reception and concert arranged by the club had attracted an audience of some 900 women to Copley Hall, crowding the place to its utmost capacity. When Mrs. Beach entered the hall the entire audience rose and the assembly of women cheered the distinguished composer and pianist for fully five minutes. After an address had been read, Mrs. Beach was showered with flowers and the stage and the piano were literally covered with beautiful blossoms. When at the end of the concert the little woman, after shaking hands with practically every one in the audience, called for her automobile expressing a desire to go home and rest after the joyful but trying ordeal, she was carried off by the committee of the club to the Copley-Plaza Hotel, where a repast had been spread for some seventy subscribers.

During this first week of her stay in Boston, Mrs. Beach has attended no less than three concerts, and has played at each one; two dinner parties, the MacDowell Club reception at the Copley-Plaza as well as two others, all given in her honor, and to bid her welcome home.

On December 4, Mrs. Beach will make her first appearance in the West when she will participate in a concert, arranged by Myrtle Irene Mitchell at the Shubert Theatre, Kansas City, Mo. At this concert as well as at many others to follow Mrs. Beach and her friend, Marcella Craft, prima donna soprano of the Royal Court Opera of Munich, will appear together. Mrs. Beach will return to Boston in time for her first public recital, which will be given on December 16 under the management of Richard Newman. Invitations are coming in from Women's Clubs all over the United States requesting Mrs. Beach's appearance before them.

Composer of "Le Dernier Adieu" Honored.

Sebastian B. Schlesinger, composer of "Le Dernier Adieu," is in receipt of an appreciative letter from Lise Landouzy. The translation of the letter follows:

October 24, 1914.

For a month I have been singing in all our field hospitals to distract our patients. Some patriotic songs and especially your "Le Dernier Adieu" were a perfect delight to all our dear wounded. Yesterday evening Colonel Henry left us, and happening to be in his hospital he begged me to sing to him for the last time before his departure "Le Dernier Adieu." I sang it with the greatest emotion, which brought tears into the eyes of all, and with tears still on his eyelashes the colonel thanked me and said:

"Kindly present my compliments to the author of this pretty melody and tell him that I am returning to the front with the air of his plaintive song, so appropriate to the present circumstances, still ringing in my ears. Thanks."

Boston Music Company, Boston.

"THE MECHANICS OF PIANO TECHNIC," a primer of the movements and forces used in piano playing, with precise analysis in the method of modern physieal scienee. By Ethelbert Warren Grabill.

In the preface the author says: "It is believed that an effective technical command of the piano may be acquired more quickly and surely by means of the scientific procedure herein outlined than by eommonly aceepted methods, even those having the warrant of high pedagogie authority."

There are about eighty pages in the book, and the subjects treated are: Muscles, levers, dynamie meehanism, forearm, rotary motion, passages, scales, staecato, chords, practice. Felix Fox, the eminent pianist, of Boston, says: "The book gives food for thought. Carefully studied, it will make the student think, look and listen to things probably hitherto totally ignored by him. Any book that in the smallest measure inculcates and encourages the habit of thinking more and playing less during the practice period is a weleome addition to musieal literature."

"Lyric Scries of Part Songs and Choruses for Women's Voiees," in two volumes, octavo, bound in paper boards. Representative works of almost every school—Russian, French, German, English, Dutch, Austrian—are to be found among these twenty part songs and ehoruses. Eaeh one of them is furnished with a well arranged and moderately easy piano accompaniment. None of the works is to be sung without the aecompaniment.

C. W. Thompson & Company, Boston.

"THERE IS NONE HOLY AS THE LORD," an anthem for church use. Words from the book of Samuel; music by H. J. Stewart.

This is evidently the work of a praetical and experieneed organist and ehoirmaster who knows the powers and the limitations of the average ehoir voiee, and who is at home with the organ. In addition, the anthem is musical, full of eontrast and well written for ehoral effeets within the moderate eompass of the amateurs who usually make up the church choir.

Theo. Presser Company, Philadelphia.

"O BE JOYFUL IN THE LORD," an anthem for ehureh use. Composed by Clarenee C. Robinson.

Nothing could be happier than the way in which the eomposer has caught and expressed the spirit of the biblical test. The music is as spontaneous and unlabored as a folksong. The part writing, neverthelcss, is perfectly smooth and strietly correct, though there is no attempt at any display of contrapuntal learning. This anthem deserves a wide popularity. It is just what the average ehoir ean learn with little rehearsal and will thoroughly enjoy.

Gamble Hinged Music Company, Chicago.

First let us call the attention of our readers to the patent linen hinge which does away with any loose leaf in all of the works published by the Gamble Hinged Music Company.

"Some Day, Some Time," a song, with words by Estelle Merrymon Clark, and music by Jalmer John Clark; a very simple, tender and melodious love ballad for medium voice of moderate range.

"The Gipsy," a song, with words by Ernst Gradolph and music by Merle Kirkman; a rollicking ballad with a fine rhythmical swing and an effective vocal melody. The somewhat extended range of the tune, however, may limit the song's usefulness among amateurs.

"When Soft Winds Blow," a song, with words by Josephine Jaekson and music by Claire Guédy; a pleasing and unaffected song, free alike from vulgarity and deep feeling. It should have a vogue among teachers.

Clayton F. Summy Company, Chicago.

"THE SLEEP THAT FLITS ON BABY'S EYES," song, with words by Rabindranath Tagore, musie by Edith Lobdell; a pretty and melodious song in Siciliano rhythm, tripping and light hearted.

"Fatima," an Oriental air for the piano, by M. Fultoni; well written for the keyboard and useful as a teaching pieee. It is melodious enough to please the amateur, without being particularly Oriental in charaeter.

"Lithuanian Dances," as danced by the representatives of that nationality where they have colonized in Chicago; a series of five simple and tuneful dances arranged for the piano by Gertrude Madeira Smith. Each dance is preceded by a description of the necessary steps and movements. These ought to prove of interest to young entertainers.

Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.

"THE HIGHWAYMAN," a cantata for mixed voices and orchestra; words by Alfred Noyes, music by Deems Taylor.

This musie is vigorous, dramatic, full of eolor, and sounds as if it had been written at white heat when the composer was full of the tingling passion and romanee of the poem. The choral parts are by no means difficult, and the orehestral accompaniment ean be learned in one rehearsal by a good orchestra. We can therefore conscientiously recommend this work to the attention of choir conductors who are in search of new works with modern harmonies and a romantie spirit. Most of the hard work is given to the baritone soloist, who of eourse will be a professional singer capable of singing the diffieult but very effeetive solos and recitatives. The work requires about half an hour to perform.

"THIRTY OFFERTORIES FOR THE ORGAN," seleeted and edited by James H. Rogers.

This very useful and praetical volume eontains thirty short works of a quiet, contemplative charaeter suitable for performanee in the middle of the church serviee. The composers represented are: Beethoven, Brahms, Debussy, Delibes, Dubois, Faulkes, Gluek, Godard, Gounod, d'Indy, Maquaire, Malling, Massenet, Renner, Rheinberger, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Sehumann, Stojowski, Richard Strauss, Tsehaikowsky, Waehs, Wagner, Waring.

The registration is indieated for the average three manual organ, and there are no demands made on the organist's teehnieal powers. It is a work, therefore, which ought to meet with the approval of the many organists throughout the eountry who are sometimes at a loss to find just such arrangements and selections as these. Some of the transeriptions have been made by famous organists, ineluding Guilmant.

"Dream of Gerontius," December 9.

Sir Edward Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" will be sung by the Oratorio Soeiety of New York, Louis Koemmenieh, conductor, Wednesday, December 9.

This, the soeiety's sixth representation of the work, will enlist the serviees of Gervase Elwes, long identified with the name part, which he has now sung nearly one hundred times. He eomes from England espeeially for this event. The other soloists will be Mildred Potter and Frank Croxton. The orehestra of the New York Symphony Society will assist.

The eustomary pair of "Messiah" eoneerts will be given on December 29 and 30.

Enrico Bossi's "Joan of Are," a novelty of peeuliar timeliness, will be sung for the first time in America, Mareh 24. Although announeed six months ago, the officials of the Oratorio Soeiety have long feared that they would fail to obtain the score and parts of "Joan" beeause of conditions abroad. They have just learned that the musie is on its way.

Leopold Winkler will be one of the soloists at the St. Mark's Hospital concert here, on November 27, at the Waldorf-Astoria.

Kerr's Fifth Season in Albany.

Ulysses S. Kerr, basso-cantante, sang for the fifth successive season, in Albany, N. Y., Tuesday evening, November 17.

The Albany Kniekerbocker Press, November 18, referred to the reeital as follows:

A large audience greeted U. S. Kerr and A. W. Burgemeister in Odd Fellows' Hall last evening, at their concert under the direction of the Woman's League of Grace Episcopal Church.

The program follows:

La Calunnia (Barber of Seville).....Italian
Kypris (French).....Holmes
Die Lotus Blume.....Schumann
Kamrot (Norwegian).....Korling
Morgen.....Strauss
Der Linden Baum.....Schubert
Wie Melodien Zieht es Mir.....Brahms
Pogners Anrede (Die Meistersinger).....Wagner

Mr. Kerr.

Rhapsodie No. 12.....Liszt

Mr. Burgemeister.

The Asra.....Rubinstein
Oh, for a Breath of the Moorlands.....Fisher
Singing to You.....U. S. Kerr
Dreamy Days.....Ashford
I Heard a Soldier.....Holbrooke
The Rose's Cup.....Stephens
Two Grenadiers.....Schumann

Mr. Kerr.

In the Albany Times Union, November 18, appeared the following appreciative review of Mr. Kerr's appearanee:

Albanians were privileged to hear Ulysses S. Kerr, basso cantante, in song recital last night at Odd Fellows' Hall, assisted by A. W. Burgemeister, pianist, under the auspices of the Women's League of the Grace Episcopal Church. Mr. Kerr's program was a splendid one and gave him an opportunity to display his art. He has a voice of fine quality, which he uses with discretion, and he sings broadly, tastefully and ably. It is rich and resonant in the lower register and unusually flexible in the upper tones. Each number was delightfully rendered and he was recalled for several encores, and his enunciation and pronunciation in the various languages were exceptionally musical and pleasing. Among the numbers given were: "La Calunnia," in Italian; "Kypris," French; "Die Lotus Blume," German; "Kamrot," Norwegian, and several in English, including "Singing to You," arranged by Mr. Kerr, which was one of the best numbers. Mr. Gurgemeister gave rhapsodie No. 12, by Liszt, which was a pleasing number on the program, and he was recalled for an encore.

Mr. Kerr will sing in recital at Youngstown, O., December 1; Warren, Pa., December 18; Wheeling, W. Va., December 21.

Musicale at Oscar Saenger Studios.

Osear Saenger and Mrs. Saenger gave their first musicale of the season on Tuesday afternoon, November 17, at their attraetive New York studios, which were profuscly deeorated with chrysanthemums and autumn foliage. An exeellent program presented by Mr. Saenger's artist-pupils was enjoyed by a goodly number of music lovers.

The following program was presented: "Parla," Arditi, Miss Beale; "La Boheme," Puecini, Mr. Barron; "Ah! Mon Fils" ("Le Prophete"), Meyerbeer, Mme. Fjordé; "Dearest," Homer, "Mother o' Mine," Tours, Mr. Remington; "I Wait for Thee" (in Russian), Grodzky; "I Saw Thee in My Dreams," Pregojahs, Mr. Barron; Erda's aria from "Rheingold," Wagner, "Dass Gott shütze den Herrn" ("Le Prophete"), Meyerbeer, Mme. Fjordé.

William J. Falk and Emil Polak were the aecompanists.

Bernard Steinberg in Boston.

Bernard Steinberg, the baritone, paid Boston an artistic visit November 15, giving a eoncert which created mueh interest and won him warm press notiees. Two of these are as follows:

Cantor Steinberg sang the famous solo, "It is Enough," from "Elijah," in good style and with good taste.—Boston Journal, November 16, 1914.

Bernhard Steinberg displayed resonance of tone and fervid style throughout his program.—Boston Evening Record, November 16, 1914.

Jenny Dufau's Second Concert Tour.

Jenny Dufau's next coneert tour, beginning January 10, is to inelude the following eities: Dallas, Birmingham and Louisville in January; Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Buffalo and Omaha in February and first half of Mareh.

Charles Lurvey, who gave excellent support during the Southern tour, will be the aceompanist.

MacDowell Club Mozart Evening.

The Mozart Club, of New York, 108 West Fifty-fifth street, issued cards of invitation to a Mozart evening, November 17, when the following program was given:

"Bastien et Bastienne" in costume with orchestra.
Bastienne ..... Edith Chapman Goold
Bastien ..... DeLos Becker
Colas ..... Heinrich Meyn
Concerto for violin and orchestra, in D major.
Violin ..... Andre Polah
Symphony in A major.
Conductor ..... William H. Humiston

Conductor Humiston says that this was the first performance in New York of the Symphony in A major,

HEINRICH MEYN,
The bel canto baritone.

composed when Mozart was only eighteen years old. It was well performed, albeit in too slow tempo. The refreshing naturalness and charm of the Mozart music was evident in every movement. Andre Polah, violinist, played the concerto in D major, also a youthful work, with much spirit and considerable finish.

Of course, the event of the evening was the pastorale operetta, "Bastien und Bastienne" in German, composed by Mozart in his thirteenth year for a Viennese private theatre. Mr. Meyn, attired in a wonderful costume, consisting of green jacket, fawn-colored knee breeches, and a red wig, sang the part of the sorcerer with much distinction. He knew his music thoroughly and brought an evident love for interpretation as well as experience in theatricals to the part. He was at once lively, graceful, and of an altogether winning personality. Mrs. Goold, the soprano, was a lovely shepherdess; her tasteful singing, combined with appropriate acting, remain in the recollection. Mr. Becker, tenor, who has a fine high lyric voice, looked well and sang well. He is said to have had no stage experience, but this would not have been suspected. A minuet was danced in costume at the close of the formal program, and this, too, gave pleasure to an audience of large size and distinguished social quality.

A word of praise is due Mr. Meyn for the stage settings, and his altogether superior taste in all important details.

Caroll Badham Preyer Gives Musicale.

Elizabeth Katzenstein, of Baltimore, was heard in a song recital Wednesday afternoon, November 18, in Caroll Badham Preyer's studio, 27 West Sixty-seventh street. The program was composed of French, German and Russian songs, the latter being a striking feature, calling forth much interest and enthusiasm. Mrs. Katzenstein, artist-pupil of Mrs. Preyer, not only possesses a voice of rare beauty, but sings with true musical feeling. A number of distinguished people were present.

Pietro A. Yon's Program.

Pietro A. Yon, organist at St. Francis Xavier Church, New York, will perform the following program at that church on Sunday, November 29:

Mass in C (a capella) ..... P. A. Yon
Proper of the First Sunday of Advent ..... Gregorian
Offertory Motet, Panis Angelicus ..... Caseiolini
Prelude, Pastoral Sonata ..... Rheinberger
First Vespers of St. Andrew, Apostle ..... Gregorian
Alma Redemptoris ..... Witt
Motet, Jerusalem Surge ..... P. A. Yon
Panis Angelicus ..... Bas
Tantum Ergo ..... Dubois
Postlude, Toccata ..... P. A. Yon

In the mass in C (a capella), by P. A. Yon, the composer follows in a modern way the Palestrina school. Most of the themes are founded on the Gregorian modes, and very little chromatics are employed in this work, thereby maintaining a strict and solemn character.

Helène Koelling Wins Favor.

At Olean, New York, on November 9, Helène Koelling was very well received and earned the folowing deserved press comments:

Mme. Koelling's songs were wisely selected, consisting of a variety from the heavy aria to the light ballad. She proved her fine abilities as a coloratura soprano with a voice of great range, running to G above high C.—Olean Evening Herald.

The fame of the artist drew a very large audience, extra chairs being placed in the aisles. Mme. Koelling gave "Thou Brilliant Bird," by David, a solo of pronounced coloratura style. Her voice possesses a fine carrying quality, a splendid method which, combined with a charming personality, made Mme. Koelling an instant favorite. The florid work was done with fine intonation and clarity. Mme. Koelling will be welcomed again by a host of admirers.—Olean Times.

Paris Pedagogue Opens New York Studio.

Charles Bowes, the vocal teacher, who has spent six years with the Jean de Reszke school in Paris as student and assistant teacher, has taken a studio at 601 Madison avenue, New York, where he may be found from this time on. Assisted by some of his artist pupils, Mr. Bowes is planning to give a number of studio recitals during this winter.

Mr. Bowes, as a host in Paris, is pleasantly remembered by many of the American colony there.

His definite, clear cut teaching ideas, likewise his seriousness and high ideals in art, recommend him strongly to thoughtful students.

His special field is tone production. Mr. Bowes says: "Singing songs without some knowledge of the technical work is a loss of time, as the voice is soon ruined, for lack of understanding of the support of the voice. A singer who does not know his voice is an uncertain artist, and is apt to become what is called an 'in and outer' (doing good work one day and the reverse the next). This can be overcome and proper control had all the time."

Austin Recital, December 3.

Florence Austin, violinist, will give her annual recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on the afternoon of December 3, at three o'clock. Miss Austin has prepared a most interesting program as follows:

Sonata in A major ..... Handel
Suite in E major, op. 11 ..... Goldmark
Concerto in E minor ..... Mendelssohn
Romance from concerto in D major ..... Paganini
In Harvest Fields ..... Cecil Burleigh
The Fishermen ..... Cecil Burleigh
(In Harvest Fields and The Fisherman from "Twelve Short Poems," dedicated to Florence Austin.)
Souvenir ..... Weitzel
(Dedicated to Florence Austin.)
Capriccio Valse ..... Wieniawski

Miss Austin stands foremost among the women violinists of the day, and well deserves the splendid praise she receives for her work.

On Friday evening, November 13, Miss Austin played at the Elliot High School, Newark, N. J., before an audience of about fifteen hundred. She played the "Faust Fantasia," Wieniawski; "Slumber Song," Weitzel, and "Valse de Concert," Musin. Her encore numbers included "Souvenir," Weitzel, and "The Fisherman," from "Twelve Short Poems," by Cecil Burleigh, both dedicated to Miss Austin. Edna Rothwell accompanied Miss Austin at this Sinfonia Prize Award.

Philadelphia, Pa., November 16, 1914.

To the Musical Courier:

The committee on prize competition of the Sinfonia Phi Mu Alpha Fraternity announces that the judges have awarded the prize of $100 and certificate of merit to Robert Henry Prutting, of Hartford, Conn., for the best composition of a male chorus with soli set to the poem of Joseph R. Drake, "The American Flag."

The presentation will take place at a public concert to be held in conjunction with the fourteenth annual convention of the Sinfonia Fraternity, on Monday, November 30, at Philadelphia.

May we kindly ask for an announcement of the above (since it is of national interest) in the coming issue of the MUSICAL COURIER—and also of the coming convention of the Sinfonia Fraternity, of which I am enclosing a brief outline:

The fourteenth annual convention of the Sinfonia Phi Mu Alpha Fraternity of America will convene on Monday, November 30, and remain in session until Wednesday, December 2, at Philadelphia, Pa. The convention will be the guest of Beta, the local chapter, and the sessions will be held in their chapter room, 1331 South Broad street.

The Hotel Walton will be the headquarters of the delegates.

Representatives from seventeen universities and conservatories, in which chapters are located, will be in attendance at the convention.

Many matters of national importance will be brought before the body relative to the proposing of legislation dealing with the standardization of teaching, the advancement of the American musician and music student, and the general advancement of music in America. Prominent men will address the convention on topics bespeaking of the present day opportunities and advantages of the musical conditions in America.

Monday evening, November 30, a public concert will be given at Musical Fund Hall, where the prize trio of 1912 and the prize string quartet of 1913 will receive their first public performance, and the winner of the 1914 concert will be presented with $100 in gold and a certificate of merit for his composition, a male chorus with soli and piano accompaniment. Tuesday the annual convention banquet will be held at the Hotel Walton, at which gathering honorary members, George Cortelyou (ex-Secretary of State), Henry Schradieck, David Bispham, of New York; Dr. Hugh A. Clarke, Gilbert R. Combs, of Philadelphia, and others, will make addresses. Wednesday evening will be given over to the annual assembly and reception.

The officers of the fraternity are Percy J. Burrell, supreme president; Burleigh E. Jacobs, of Milwaukee, supreme secretary-treasurer; Harry D. Kaiser, of Philadelphia, supreme historian.

Very truly yours, HARRY D. KAISER,
Chairman and Supreme Historian.

Jenny Dufau in the South.

Jenny Dufau, soprano of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, has just left the South, which she toured for the first time as a concert singer, and is most enthusiastic over the manner in which the Southerners received her in North and South Carolina, Mississippi and Alabama. The reason for her ardent love of the South may be partly accredited to an hereditary trait, as all of her relatives are proprietors of cotton weaving factories in Alsatia, so that she has, so to speak, grown up among the cotton; indeed, as may be seen from the accompanying snapshot, the first thing she did as soon as she found herself in the South, was to go to a cottonfield, in order to renew her acquaintance with the precious plant.

Miss Dufau, now on tour in Kansas, went to Chicago, November 15, to take part, together with Mme. Claussen, at Director Campanini's especial request, in a performance in honor of the late and much regretted Maestro Emanuel, at the Auditorium Theatre. She left immediately for a new tour, which will extend to January 5, when she will again appear in a Chicago recital.

Young Harpist to Play at Waldorf.

Winnifred Bambrick, the young Canadian harpist, has been engaged to appear at the annual benefit concert of the New York Polyklinik Hospital, which is to be held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, on Tuesday evening, December 1. Miss Bambrick will play the following program: Prelude, theme and variations, Pinto; "Vision," Verdalle; "Berceuse," Sodero; prelude No. 1 (B flat minor), Loukine; Morceau characteristic (Butterflies), Verdalle.

More Praise for Helen Ware.

Herewith are appended two more tributes to the violin playing of Helen Ware, the interpreter of Slavic music:

Praise was heard on every hand of the wonderful recital given last night by Rudolph Ganz, the Swiss pianist, and Helen Ware, violinist. The artists at once established themselves with the audience and their reception was indeed an enthusiastic one. . . .

Miss Ware's closing solo was "Carmen, Fantasie Brillante," by Hubay. Following this number Miss Ware's admiring hearers insisted upon two encores, which were beautifully played.

Several of the selections played last night by Miss Ware have been given by violinists in previous concerts in the city, and for the people who are not trained musicians the real quality of Miss Ware's art was shown very plainly in the very superior manner in which she played the numbers which people here are more or less familiar with. Miss Ware's appearance is very charming, and her manner gracious.—Mankato, Minn., Daily Free Press, October 31, 1914.

Last night proved an ovation for the visiting musicians. . . . The selections were excellently rendered and provoked a storm of applause, but were but a beginning of the pleasure in store. The first number proved one of the most musical, Dvorák's compositions always holding a peculiar charm of their own, which the musician interpreted with the finest graduations of musical feeling. The Hungarian Dances were brilliantly rendered, and were followed by the nocturne number, another beautiful and melodious number.

Miss Ware seems to enter wholly into the music as she plays, and bends to her violin, forgetful of her surroundings. She was insistently recalled, and at last responded with an encore number, playing with muted strings.

Miss Ware then gave a selection from Hubay, "Carmen, Fantasie Brillante," rendering it with keen artistic interpretation. It is easily observable that Miss Ware has an inborn understanding of the wild and weird in music, which gives to her playing of Hungarian and Slav music its characteristic charm. She graciously responded to the insistent applause of her audience.—Mankato (Minn.) Daily Review, October 31, 1914.

Dora de Phillippe's Versatility

Dora de Phillippe, petite and charming, is rapidly becoming a general favorite with the opera goers, both of this country and of Canada, where she appear last season as a principal with the Montreal Grand Opera Company. The beautiful soprano voice of this artist and her intense dramatic instinct, combined with a pleasing personality, make her a justly popular singer. Mme. de Phillippe became well known by her realistic delineation of the role of Madame Butterfly, but she is heard almost to equal advantage as Suzanne, as Nedda, or as Musetta, all roles that call for dash and verve. This little lady sings in six different languages. "Well," one might say, "there is nothing remarkable about that; plenty of artists sing in six languages." To be sure, but do they, as does Mme. de Phillippe, converse fluently and intelligently in each of these six languages?

With such versatility, coupled with her personality and musicianship, there should be no reason why Dora de Phillippe should not reach a very high pinnacle in the operatic world.

Mme. Gadski Transplanted.

A slip of the pen in the MUSICAL COURIER of November 18 made Mme. Gadski's recent recital take place at Carnegie Hall. As a matter of fact, it was held in Aeolian Hall.

Bliffkins—I have finished a choral symphony which will last two hours."

when you seek a worthy interpreter.

For more than ninety years leading musicians have lavished their praises on the Chickering tone qualities and musical superiorities.

The best of the past is retained in the Chickering of 1914 and to it is added the enlightened achievement of the present.

The Boice Studios—Lenox Academy Orchestra Plays — Gilbert´-McLewee Musicale—Noble Organ Recitals—Price Pupils—Max Jacobs —Bangs Sings at Columbia University— Two Nichols in the West—Speke-Seeley Pupils — Hamish Mackay—Notes

Mrs. Henry Smock Boice studios' artistic output of high class singers is coming steadily to the fore. Numbers of those engaged in musical careers are filling engagements, in part as follows: Mrs. Otis sang at the Wanamaker auditorium, November 11, Hallet Gilberté at the piano; at Ridgewood, N. J., November 13, Miss Mayhall at the piano; Brockton, Mass., October 24; for the Baptist Social Union, November 12, with many engagements pending. Jessie Rowe Lockitt sang at a private musicale in Brooklyn, November 12, a reengagement; Katherine Bickford Self sang at an important club meeting on November 12; Beulah Girard, soprano, sang at a Chautauqua Alumnæ meeting, Flatbush, where she pleased every one with her beautiful voice.

Lenox Academy Orchestra Plays.

The orchestra of two dozen players from the Lenox Academy of Music, H. H. Reppert, conductor, played a program of eleven numbers in the series of concerts given at Central Baptist Church, November 18. Besides the orchestral numbers there were various solos, as follows: For piccolo, violin, cornet, piano and voice: Elsie Lawson deserves special praise as solo pianist, and A. Avvisati won much applause for his cornet solo. The same organization played three numbers at the evening service in the same church, November 15, Mr. Avvisati particularly distinguishing himself in his cornet solo, "Soldiers of the Cross." Mr. Reppert, the conductor and director of the Lenox Academy of Music, has many talented students under his instruction.

Gilberté-McLewee Musicale.

Despite the bad weather of November 15, a throng of invited guests listened to an hour of music at the handsome residence-studio of Mrs. McLewee, 21 West Sixty-ninth street. Those who appeared on the program were: Mme. McLewee; Vera Courtenay, soprano; Mme. Gilberté, reader; Harold Stanley Fowler, tenor; Almont Hart, baritone. Miss Courtenay showed distinctive style and a fine voice. She made a special hit with three songs by Gilberté. Of these "Minuet la Phillis" was sung with much grace, and "Ah, Love But a Day" with dramatic fervor. Almont Hart has a fine natural voice and sings as if he loved to sing. He sang Tosti's "Parted" especially well. Harold Stanley Fowler has a real tenor voice, high and clear, and in Gilberté's "Serenade" he gave forth a high C of real climax. "A Rose and a Dream" many people consider Gilberté's best song. It was particularly well sung by Mr. Fowler. As to Mrs. McLewee, her singing is altogether delightful. Although a contralto, she sang the coloratura soprano aria, "Una Voce Poco Fa" with striking effect, reaching the high notes with ease. The lovely music of Gilberté's "Evening Song" was sung and interpreted by her with a clearness and depth which brought forth prolonged applause.

Noble Organ Recitals.

Under the auspices of the American Guild of Organists, T. Tertius Noble, F. R. C. O., A. R. C. M., gave a recital of seven numbers at St. Thomas' Church, November 23. On the program were works by Noble, Karg-Elert, Tschaikowsky, Rea, Jadassohn, Calkin, Harwood and Reubke. Mr. Noble's organ recitals continue on Sunday evenings at this church, at 8 o'clock. The festival chorus, under Mr. Noble's direction, now studying Brahms' "Requiem," is progressing rapidly. A few more altos, tenors and basses will be welcomed.

Parson Price Pupils.

Charles Hopkins, basso profundo, manager of the new Punch and Judy Theatre, is one of the professional pupils of Parson Price, teacher of so many dramatic artists. David Prector is another Price pupil who knows how to sing. Of the many stage favorites who have studied with Mr. Price, Julia Marlowe and Maude Adams are the best known.

Jacobs Plays Four Times.

Max Jacobs, the violinist, appeared as soloist at the Bamberger auditorium, Newark, N. J., November 11. He played five compositions by modern composers, including his brother, Ira Jacobs' "Song Without Words." November 13 he assisted at a recital in the high school auditorium of Leonia, N. J. November 14, he was soloist for the Beethoven Society, Astor Gallery. He was also soloist at an organ recital under the auspices of the King's Daughters Circle, Christ Lutheran Church, East Nineteenth street.

Edwin Orlo Bangs at Columbia University.

Edwin Orlo Bangs, tenor from the Mehan Studios, appeared in a recital at Horace Mann Auditorium, Columbia University, Wednesday afternoon, November 18. His program was a varied one, and the material used gave opportunity for displaying a remarkable degree of expression and beautiful tonal quality.

Mr. Bangs showed a real poetic insight in Schumann's "Die Lotus Blume" and Brahms' "Ständchen." "Als die Alte Mutter" was given in fine tonal beauty. The singer found great favor with his audience in Cadman's "I Hear a Thrush at Eve," while the little song, "Why," by John Barnes Wells, was enthusiastically received. The audience was made up of the music student element of Columbia University and Teachers' College.

Mrs. John Dennis Mehan played very capable accompanists.

Mr. and Mrs. Nichols in the Middle West.

John W. Nichols and Mrs. Nichols have inaugurated their first fall tour, and are having success throughout the Middle West, where they are now touring. Last week was a "record breaker"; they filled six joint vocal and piano recital engagements in five consecutive days. Their itinerary for November is as follows: 4. Nashville, Tenn., Ward-Belmont College; 9, Burlington, Iowa, Music Club; 10, afternoon, Keokuk, Iowa, High School; 10, evening, Keokuk, Iowa, Y. W. C. A.; 11, Marshalltown, Iowa, Twentieth Century Club; 12, Des Moines, Iowa, Drake University; 13, Milwaukee, Wis., Milwaukee-Downer College; 14, Chicago, Ill., Church Society; 17, Appleton, Wis., Lawrence Conservatory; 20, Springfield, N. Y., Griffith Institute.

Henrietta Speke-Seeley Sings.

Henrietta Speke-Seeley, soprano, was the soloist at the November 11 meeting of the New York Browning Society. Mrs. Speke-Seeley sang four songs set to Browning's poems by John W. Worth. They were "Meeting at Night," "Parting at Morning," "Good to Forgive; Best to Forget," and "My Star." Several of these had to be repeated. Alice Campbell, the contralto, pupil of Mrs. Speke-Seeley, sang recently at the Linden Country Club, Linden, N. J., and at a concert in the Bronx Church House auditorium.

Hamish Mackay at the Musicians Club.

Hamish Mackay, whose recent recital of Scottish songs at Aeolian Hall was so successful, appeared privately November 15 at the Musicians Club, when he gave a recital in costume, entitled "Songs of Scotland."

Notes.

Concerts of the New Assembly have been resumed at the Plaza Hotel. November 19 the following artists appeared: Grace Northrup, soprano; Mabel Beddoe, alto; Melville W. Barton, tenor; R. Norman Jolliffe, baritone; George Halprin, pianist; and Harry Oliver Hirt, accompanist.

Amy Grant's opera recitals have been resumed at her studio, 78 West Fifty-fifth street, Sundays at 3.30 p. m., Elmer Zoller at the piano. The schedule for the coming six Sundays is as follows: November 22, "Parsifal"; November 29, "L'Amore dei tre Re"; December 6, "Wilhelm Tell"; December 13, "Louise"; December 20, "Julien"; December 27, "Euryanthe."

Regina Hassler-Fox, contralto, gave a song recital at Bamberger's auditorium, Newark, November 11, and was reengaged for a later recital. November 24 she sang at the Community Club, White Plains, N. Y. Other engagements include appearances with Rudolph Ganz, the Sevcik Quartet, and recitals in Oberlin, Ohio, Cleveland, Philadelphia and elsewhere.

Sarah Core, the soprano, who sang in opera in Coburg and returned to America, warmly recommended by the Baroness von Horst, is booking several concerts and recitals. Her exceptional voice and personality count much in her favor.

C. I. Valentine, musical director of the Newtown high school, Elmhurst, L. I., introduced Homer N. Bartlett as guest of honor, November 19, when a program of vocal and instrumental music by Bartlett exclusively, was per-

ALBERTINA RASCH

PREMIERE DANSEUSE OF THE Century Opera Co. AS "CARMEN"

In the last act Miss Albertina Rasch danced the ballet artistically.—N. Y. Herald.

Albertina Rasch contributed a dazzling bit of toe-dancing in the last act, ably supported by the ballet.—The Evening Mail.

The ballet in the second act with Albertina Rasch as soloist was exceptionally good.—The Evening Post.

The innumerable small parts were well taken, Albertina Rasch especially distinguishing herself. In her the Aborns have a dancer worthy of any company.—The Evening World.

formed. The card of invitation issued by Mr. Valentine read as follows: "It is the endeavor of the music department of the Newtown High School to have the boys and girls meet our American composers, thus making each one a real personage and not a mere name on a program. Will you not assist us by giving the project publicity? C. I. VALENTINE, Musical Director, Newtown High School."

Marta Milinowski, the Buffalo pianist, expects to give her postponed recital at Aeolian Hall, December 14. She has returned from her alma mater, Vassar College, where, with H. Edward Cumpson, of Buffalo, she repeated the interesting two-piano recital recently given at the Twentieth Century Club. The novel program was highly appreciated by the students at Vassar.

About two hundred members and guests attended the reception given to Felice Lyne at the Musicians Club of New York, 62 West Forty-fifth street, Monday afternoon, November 16. Miss Lyne was presented by Mrs. Julian Edwards. The dining room was beautifully decorated with autumn leaves and yellow chrysanthemums. Tea was served by candle light, Mrs. Conrad B. Kimball and Maude P. Allen pouring. Among those present were: Walter Damrosch, Alexander Lambert, Anna Ziegler, Homer N. Bartlett, Mr. and Mrs. L. T. Field, J. M. Priaul, Mme. von Klenner, Marie R. Kenney, Florence Loeb, R. S. Dalenz, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Hogg, Mrs. Chapman, Marie Stapleton Murray, Klaire Dowsey, Mrs. J. O. Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. John Lloyd Thomas, Mr. King, Mrs. Warren R. Hedden, Sadie Harrison, Mary Thomas, Dr. and Mrs. J. C. Marks, Joseph Mathews, Walter L. Bogert, Elias Caplan, Winthrop Parkhurst, Mrs. Graham, Mme. Brias, C. Linn Seiler, Elizabeth Parks, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Thomas, Florence F. Jenkins.

L. Uribe's students' concert occurs Sunday evening, November 29, at Berkeley Theatre, when the following artist-pupils will appear: Lyla MacNames, Lucilla de Aragon, Anita Gilman, Daisy M. Fisher, Frank Oglesby, A. Hitchcock, Warren Rishel, G. Ingrassia, Philip Morrell and Signor Uribe.

Baltimore Notes.

213 Prospect Ave., Roland Park,
Baltimore, Md., November 6, 1914.

Marguerite Maas, pianist, and Merrill Hopkinson, baritone, gave a recital of unusual merit on Thursday night at Lehmann Hall. Dr. Hopkinson's program was comprehensive in its scope, containing music from the time of Bononcini down to eminently modern composers. His voice is of brilliant, resonant quality, capable of fine dramatic effect, and he has, on the other hand, a wonderfully beautiful mezza voce. His most notable quality, however, is his genius for interpretation. It was the first appearance of Miss Maas since her year of study and concert work in Berlin.

The first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted a large audience. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony opened the program, which, with the Strauss "Don Juan" and the "Finlandia" of Sibelius, was very enjoyable. Pasquale Amato, the soloist of the evening, sang superbly the baritone aria from Saint-Saëns' "Henry VIII," and "Ombra mai fu," by Handel.

Admirers of Ernest Hutchison flocked in large and enthusiastic numbers to hear his recital last Friday, the first he has given here in two years.

Max Landow gave a masterly recital of Schumann compositions at the Florestan Club on Tuesday night.

Later Baltimore Items.

Baltimore, Md., November 20, 1914.

A house packed to the doors greeted Alma Gluck at her recital in Ford's Theatre, Tuesday afternoon, November 10. Not since Schumann-Heink's recital, a year ago, has so large an audience assembled for one singer. And, judging by the applause, Mme. Gluck's popularity has not waned. She presented a very interesting program, singing the Mozart, Handel and Haydn numbers with especial charm. The program unfortunately omitted the name of the accompanist, who played with intelligent artistry.

Much interest was manifested in the recital given by Oscar Seagle, baritone, and Harold D. Phillips, organist, on Friday, November 6. Mr. Seagle presented some rarely heard French songs of unusual beauty, and Cesar Cui's "Enfat, Si Jétais Roi." He was warmly received. Mr. Phillips played with unusual poetic insight, notably in the "Claire de Lune," by Sigfried Karge-Elert.

The Germania Maennerchor gave its first concert Monday night at Lehmann Hall, with Leonora Koke, soprano soloist. Mr. Hemberger, as usual, arranged a delightful program, and directed the choruses with his customary authority and good taste. F. S. Iula, harpist, played beautifully a concert etude of his own, and "Solitude," by Godard.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch made his first appearance here for five years, last Friday, when he created a furore. The recital was of great interest, as Gabrilowitsch is an artist of such consummate intellectuality as to breathe life into whatever he plays.

Nell McFrederick, contralto, has been engaged for the performance of Gaul's cantata "Ruth" at Catonsville next week.

Merrill Hopkinson, baritone, has been engaged to sing the role of Jairus in Stainer's "Daughters of Jairus," at Christ Church next Sunday night.

A feature of the second concert of the Melamet Opera Class, which will take place December 17, will be the singing of the quintet from "Meistersinger," and the Rhinemaidens' trio from "Götterdammerung." D. L. F.

Sarah Suttle with Minneapolis Orchestra.

Sarah Suttle, artist-pupil of Glenn Dillard Gunn, of Chicago, scored brilliantly with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra in the concert of Sunday afternoon, November 8. Comments of the Minneapolis reviewers follow:

The assisting soloist was Sarah Suttle, a young Chicago pianist, who scored a great success in her fine interpretation of MacDowell's A minor piano concerto. Though little more than a child, Miss Suttle proved herself a pianist of intelligence, surety and remarkable technic. Upon her foundation of style, technical assurance and artistic poise she can easily build a superstructure of emotional forcefulness which ought to carry her to supreme heights as a piano virtuoso. Her playing is clean, clear, delicately crystalline and amazingly forceful, and she possesses the rare and essential attribute of conviction so far as a thoughtless audience is concerned. In response to an enthusiastic encore she played as a solo Liszt's "Campanella."—Minneapolis Tribune.

The center of the program was held by a young pianist, Sarah Suttle, who played MacDowell's A minor concerto, not heard since Sherwood played it here some years ago. Miss Suttle possesses a fine technic and true musicianly instincts, which help her to a sympathetically convincing interpretation of the romantic masterpiece of MacDowell's youth. Mr. Oberhoffer let the orchestra weave an entrancing symphonic background to the whole work. Enthusiastically received, Miss Suttle played with rare delicacy the well known Liszt etude, which is a paraphrase of Paganani's "La Campanella," without at any time overemphasizing the mechanical part of the accomplishment.—Minneapolis Journal.

SARAH SUTTLE.

How the world moves, too, is shown by our hearing MacDowell's first piano concerto from another Chicagoan, after Sherwood's memorable presentation at a Sunday program nearly five years ago. This time it was a young girl, Sarah Suttle, who gave its many beauties and refinements with lovely grace and remarkable maturity. Her shyness at the spontaneous applause was finally overcome enough for her to give us an extra, Liszt's "Campanella," with the same surprising ability.—Minneapolis News.

Kefer-Goodman Recital, von Ende School.

The third artist recital of the von Ende School of Music presented Paul Kefer and Lawrence Goodman in a piano-violoncello program. Mr. Kefer has recently been added to the faculty of the school. Mr. Goodman's qualities as a performer insure to him a hearty welcome whenever he appears before an audience. As an initial number of the program, the two artists played Boëllmann's sonata for piano and violoncello, and brought out the interesting thematic structure, and the striking modulations with admirable taste. Mr. Goodman played the Bach-Tausig "Toccata and fugue in D minor" with noble dignity and breadth, contrasting effectively with the delicacy and warmth of the nocturne in C sharp minor, and the prelude in B flat minor, by Chopin. He concluded with a brilliant performance of the A flat polonaise. The second group consisted of Sibelius' charming "Romanza," Rachmaninoff's delightful "Ponchinello," and Moszkowski's "Caprice Espagnole," which were played with a verve and a color that made the audience clamor for an encore. Mr. Kefer's first group of solos began with the melodious "Canzone," by Bruch, played with exquisite feeling and rich tone. The spirited performance of the "Allegro Appassionato," by Saint-Saëns, a typical product of Gallic temperament, brought into strong relief the admirable musicianly qualities of Mr. Kefer. In the second group, Lalo's "Chant Russe" established him in the favor of the critical audience which attends these recitals. After the rhapsody, Mr. Kefer played Faure's "Cradle Song." Kathleen M. Shippen, formerly of Chicago, was the accompanist.

THE CALL FROM OUT OF TOWN

for The Philadelphia Orchestra has never been so widespread as this year, and several offers for the orchestra to visit different cities have had to be declined.

Two new cities never before visited by the orchestra will be included this year in the tour from November 30 to December 8: Indianapolis and Buffalo. The other cities to be visited will include Detroit, Cleveland, Ann Arbor, Akron, Oberlin and Erie.

Aside from the excellence of the orchestra itself, which makes it so desirable, is the confidence implied in the rule of the Association that the orchestra never appears, no matter how small may be the town visited, except with its full contingent of 85 men. The name "The Philadelphia Orchestra" may never be used except at concerts of the entire orchestra and where it is under the conductorship of Leopold Stokowski.

Kasner Heard at Faculty Concert.

On Thursday evening, November 19, Jacques Kasner, violinist, was heard at the opening reception of the faculty of the Fabri Collegium, "The Home of Music and the Fine Arts," New York. Mr. Kasner, who is the head of the violin and string department at this institution, played with his usual brilliancy and careful regard for the spirit of interpretation. His numbers were the "Serenade Melancolique," by Tschaikowsky and Kreisler's "Andantino" and "Tambourin Chinois."

Other soloists were Miss Kennedy, pianist, and Giuseppe Aldo Randegger, head of the piano and organ department.

Countess Fabri, who introduced the soloists, was represented by a number of her pupils, whose singing exhibited fine tone production, good diction and commendable execution. Of special interest, also, was the excellent singing of the pupils of Mr. Lee.

Adolf Dahm-Petersen Heard in Recital.

Adolf Dahm-Petersen, the baritone, gave a song recital on Thursday evening, November 12, at the studio of Stella Harris, in Tuscaloosa, Ala., in which he was also his own accompanist.

His program consisted of four groups of songs, each group being devoted to the works of a single composer, i. e., Johannes Brahms, Franz Liszt, Franz Schubert, and Adolf Jensen, each of which received able and artistic interpretation. His excellent baritone was heard to good advantage in Liszt's "Lorelei" and "The King of Thule," while "The Linden Tree" and "The Almighty" were particularly effective among his Schubert numbers. Two German student songs by Jensen completed the program and supplied the finale to a most enjoyable evening.

Spooner Sings at Wanamaker Festival.

On November 17, Philip Spooner, tenor, opened the four days music festival commemorating the anniversary of the Wanamaker Auditorium, New York. Mr. Spooner was in fine voice and was listened to with marked attention by a very large audience. His selections consisted of "The Dream," from "Manon," "I Hear You Calling Me," and "La donne e mobile," from "Rigoletto." This occasion marked the second appearance of the young American artist in New York within the week, the other being at the British War Fund Benefit given at the Lyceum Theatre, on November 13.

Slavic Exponent in West.

That young violinist who is attaining high rank as an exponent of Slavic music, Helen Ware, has been appearing recently in various States throughout the Middle West. One of her appearances was at Kenosha, Wis., where she scored immediately. Following her concert, Dr. M. A. Bernstein, of the medical fraternity, invited a few music lovers of that city to meet Miss Ware and enjoy a social hour together. During the evening the accompanying picture was taken. Those who appear therein are (reading from left to right): Upper row—Dr. Russahov, Kathryn Wysocke, H. E. Hill; middle row—Mr. Eisnes, Helen Ware, Mrs. C. B. Shepard, Mrs. Starr; lower row—Margaret Becker, Dr. Bernstein, Anne Shepard.

Those who heard Miss Ware on this occasion were very enthusiastic about her artistry and she will probably play a return engagement there at some future time.

Ethel Leginska's Program.

Ethel Leginska's all Chopin recital program attracted a big audience at Aeolian Hall, New York, Monday afternoon, November 16.

These were her selections: Twelve etudes, op. 10, C major, A minor, E major, C sharp minor, G flat major, E flat minor, C major, F major, F minor, A flat major, E flat major, C minor; sonate in B flat minor, op. 35; twelve etudes, op. 25, A flat major, F minor, F major, A minor, E minor, G sharp minor, C sharp minor, D flat major, G flat major, B minor, A minor, C minor.

ETHEL LEGINSKA,
Pianist.

Manifest interest prevailed throughout the entire program. Miss Leginska's playing of the C minor etude, the last of group one, and of the final A minor and C minor etudes, which concluded the program, aroused, however, perhaps more spontaneous and prolonged applause, likewise her rendition of the sonate.

This young English pianist is growing in the favor of New York music lovers. Attractive in personality, she possesses also a distinctive individuality, which characteristic enters into her playing and goes far toward making it interesting.

Technically she is efficient. Her always dependable fingers, wrists, etc., respond with facility, strength, delicacy, according to the demands of the pianist's interpretations. Add to these requisites an exceptional interpretative talent, and it is not to be wondered at that she should meet the taxing demands of a program of this nature with such distinct success.

Soder-Hueck Pupils Win Applause.

At a reception given by the Delta Tau Delta Club of New York, on November 20, Marie de Calve, dramatic mezzo-soprano, and Walter Heckman, operatic tenor, were splendidly received, both of them rendering a group of songs in their artistic style and manner.

Mme. de Calve, well known in the musical world as a singer of experience, gave the aria, Santuzza's romance, from "Cavalleria Rusticana," with great warmth of tone and temperament. She was obliged to add two encores.

Walter Heckman gave the well known aria from "Pagliacci," the ringing tones of his beautiful tenor voice pleasing his audience, who would not be satisfied until he responded with an encore, "For You Alone," by Gahl.

Mme. de Calve has sung a great deal in opera and concert and intends to reenter the operatic field, and more will be heard about her in a short time.

Walter Heckman, who is this season performing in vaudeville, is reported to have had several offers, among them one from the Dippel Company, but chose this as the biggest offer, from a financial standpoint. His robust tenor voice certainly would be adapted to an operatic career and he is preparing for this at present.

Both singers are pupils at the Soder-Hueck vocal studios and attribute their success to their esteemed teacher.

Dr. Carl Gives Second Recital.

Dr. William C. Carl gave the second recital in the series which is being given under the auspices of the American Guild of Organists, at the First Presbyterian Church, New York, Monday evening, November 16. Dr. Carl played an international program, the works thereon representing composers from Italy, England, France, Germany, Russia, America and Belgium. Two numbers marked "New" were "Peace," by Edwin H. Lemare (England), and "Will o' the Wisp," by Gordon Balch Nevin (America).

Dr. Carl was assisted by Margaret Harrison, soprano, whose beautiful voice was heard to advantage in "Lo, Hear the Gentle Lark," by Sir Henry Bishop (England), and also by Andrea Sarto, baritone, who gave with great effectiveness "Confutatis Maledictus," by Verdi (Italy) and "With Joy the Impatient Husbandman," from "The Seasons," by Haydn (Germany). A large audience listened attentively and with evident enjoyment to this excellent program.

The third concert of the series was given Monday evening, November 23, by T. Tertius Noble at St. Thomas' Church, New York.

Gemünder Announcement.

A. Gemünder and Sons, New York, make the following announcement:

"Due to the disorganization of manufacturing in Europe, advances had to be made in the prices of imported new violins, bows, accessories and strings, but in so doing we have graded the advances according to the amount of stock we have on hand of any certain articles.

"Now as regards the prices of genuine old violins, we wish to say that we have not advanced the same, because before the war we had purchased large collections.

"Any violinist who contemplates buying an old violin, should do so now, because after our present stock is sold, we will not be able to offer such values again, as prices will advance tremendously.

"The famous Gemünder Art Violins made by us sell at their usual prices, as also our Gemünder bows. If any reader of the MUSICAL COURIER has had correspondence with us in the past and has not purchased a violin or bow to date, we would ask them to write to us again, as we are sure to please them thoroughly as violin makers and experts.

Beatrice Gjertsen Gives New York Recital.

The Hirsch Theatrical Agency, of which Ludwig Geismar is the American representative, announces a recital to be given at Aeolian Hall, New York, on Thursday evening, December 3, at which the dramatic soprano, Beatrice Gjertsen, will appear. Mme. Gjertsen is another artist who has transferred her field of activity from the war zone to the United States, and her first appearance in New York is looked forward to with much interest. Mme. Gjertsen has been leading soprano at the Ducal Opera

BEATRICE GJERTSEN.

House, Weimar, for a period of over five years, and enjoys the distinction of having received the title of "Kammersaengerin." She gave a concert on November 10 in Minneapolis and received the most flattering comments from critics and public. The German imperial family has complimented Mme. Gjertsen for her artistic performance of Elizabeth in "Tannhäuser" and Kaiser Wilhelm personally presented her with a diamond brooch.

Francis Rogers at the Schools.

Francis Rogers has a large repertoire of songs especially adapted to the needs of educational institutions. November 5 he sang a highly varied program at Miss Masters' School for Girls at Dobbs Ferry, N. Y., and November 11 a program of English ballads at the Lawrenceville, N. J., School for Boys. In January he will be heard at both the Phillips Academy in Exeter, N. H., and St. Mark's School in Southboro, Mass. November 18 he gave a song recital, assisted by Salvatore Stefano, the harpist, and Bruno Huhn, before an enthusiastic public in Maplewood, N. J.

William A. Enderlin's Recital.

A large and friendly audience attended the recital given by William A. Enderlin, pianist, on Tuesday evening, November 17, at Memorial Hall, Brooklyn. Mr. Enderlin played Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata," a group of five Chopin numbers, "Witches Dance," MacDowell; "Hark, Hark, the Lark," Schubert-Liszt, and the sixth rhapsody, by Liszt. He was assisted by G. O. Hornberger, violoncellist, who received much applause for his finished playing.

STEINWAY

YOU wouldn't expect to buy a very good piano for less than $500. And for that money you can now purchase the one acknowledged as the Standard of the World—the Steinway.

Style V is a Small Upright, designed especially for the modern home. Because of the smaller frame and case, enabling a saving in the cost of manufacture, we can sell this new piano at the lowest price at which a Steinway has ever been offered.

The new Upright has the supreme qualities of every Steinway, and is different only in size and price.

We shall be glad to have you try it.

THE MUSICAL COURIER EXTRA
Published every Saturday by Musical Courier Co.
Devoted to the interests of the Piano Trade.

In Berlin the Royal Opera is giving performances every evening at the same rates of admission as before the war.

Rumors in New York that Franz Lehar has been killed in battle on the Russian frontier are untrue. He has not even been at the front.

Leonard Borwick, the English pianist, has been engaged to play with the Philadelphia Orchestra on December 11 and 12 in place of Ferruccio Busoni, who is detained abroad.

Utterly without foundation is the story printed last week in the daily papers regarding a grand opera company to be formed by Cleofonte Campanini for the purpose of giving performances this season at the Lexington Avenue (Hammerstein) Opera House.

It is pleasant to see musical artists of the many warring nations side by side in amity making music in our orchestras and singing on the stage. War and music cannot be friends. If the war has banished music in some quarters and inflicted much suffering on musicians, it is only right that musicians should retaliate by being friends among themselves and banishing war.

Vaudeville had its first real experience with concert pianism of a high order when George Copeland played classics last winter for two a day audiences. Evidently the vaudeville public liked the novelty, for another pianist now has been secured to carry on the good work started by Mr. Copeland. The newcomer is no less an artist than the well known virtuoso Arthur Friedheim, pupil of Liszt. He is making his entry into vaudeville this week.

An orchestral conductor who cannot lead the score from memory is like a concert singer who cannot deliver the words of a song without reading them from the music. Half the eloquence of the delivery is lost when the performer becomes a slave to the printed page. Pianists, violinists and cellists are required to memorize their numbers; why not conductors and singers also? The few who do merely serve to expose the laziness or inability of the many who do not.

The leading musicians of Leipsic, including Nikisch, Julius Klengel, Hans Winderstein, Otto Lohse, Josef Pembaur and Carl Straube, have formed an organization for the purpose of giving Sunday morning musical entertainments for the benefit of their suffering colleagues in art. A well known wealthy music lover of Leipsic has placed his home at the disposal of the artists and the concerts will begin in his private villa in order to save the expensive hall rent.

After Arrigo Serato's recent debut in New York, one local critic wrote that the player made a "pugnacious attack" on the Beethoven concerto, and that his tone was a "detonation, horrendous," while another commentator remarked that Serato was "if anything, too calm." Henry T. Finck comments sagely in the New York Evening Post: "Music lovers who wish to decide for themselves as to whether Signor Serato plays horrendously or calmly will have a chance to do so at the recital he will give at Carnegie Hall next Wednesday afternoon."

"Much dissatisfaction is being expressed in certain musical circles over the verdict of the judges in the Los Angeles prize opera contest," says the Pittsburgh Sunday Post, and continues: "The disgruntled ones are loudly proclaiming their belief that the composer of 'Mona' could not possibly write an opera worth $10,000, although 'Mona' won that much money in the Metropolitan competition. The opera was a bleak failure so far as its reception by the public was concerned. And now the composer has earned another $10,000 prize! Let not the disgruntled ones take this prize competition too seriously. It has little value outside its monetary rewards. The music of the past that has endured was never written in the hope of winning a prize. Bach never won a prize, nor Beethoven, nor Brahms, nor Wagner, nor Chopin, nor Schumann, nor any other among the great composers."

A libel suit against the London Mail by Mark Hambourg, the pianist, for calling him a German, was won by the plaintiff with a £500 ($2,500) award for damages sustained. It appears that professional loss to Mr. Hambourg followed the Mail's mistaken announcement, as the general English public could not be expected to know that he is a Russian.

At the Palladium, in London, a new revue entitled "Hullo, Everybody" was presented recently. The music of the piece is by—Leoncavallo. Why does not the New York Winter Garden secure Puccini, Debussy or Richard Strauss to do the score of one of our local revues? These are topsy turvy days and nobody seems to blame any one else for trying every means to catch the quick and easy penny. As a matter of fact, New York is soon to hear an operetta, "The Swallow," by Puccini.

From Dresden, Leipsic, Halle, Munich, Bremen, Cologne and many other important German towns come reports of musical activities, which, considering the times, are very remarkable. The question as to who is to be the permanent successor of Steinbach at the celebrated Gürzenich concerts at Cologne has not yet been definitely settled. During the winter different guest conductors will be heard. Wendel, of Bremen, and Abendroth, of Essen, are mentioned as two of the most probable candidates for the prominent position.

A cablegram has been received by Loudon Charlton from Josef Lhevinne that sets at rest any doubt as to the Russian pianist's American concert tour this season. Lhevinne wires from Copenhagen that he will sail December 10 or earlier if possible. He will, therefore, arrive in ample time for his first American engagement, which will be a recital in New York, December 29. In addition to many important orchestral appearances Mr. Lhevinne will be heard in recital throughout the entire country, his itinerary taking him to California and the Northwest in February.

Bizet's "L'Arlésienne" suite is to head the Philharmonic program at Carnegie Hall on Friday afternoon, November 27. The soloist will be Eleanor Spencer, in the solo part of César Franck's "Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra. Guy Ropartz's fourth symphony and Chabrier's "Espana" also will be heard. Some of the Philharmonic advance notices inadvertently announce the Ropartz performance as "the first in America," but that was no doubt a slip of the pen, for the work has been played several times this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In his always interesting Papyrus, Michael Monahan says: "It seems that New York is to have a very poor operatic season, owing to the war keeping at home in their several countries many of the long haired artists and tremendous fat women who commonly hail with joy the invitation of the American dollar. Which reminds us that there are good things to be said even of this war." As a matter of fact, New York will have its usual opera season, and the war is not keeping away more than two or three members of the regular company. However, the point about the American Dollar is well taken. Mr. Monahan must admit, however, that the invitation of the A. D. is eagerly sought also by some of our best local citizens, musical and otherwise.

THE "CARMEN" REVIVAL.

Much ink has been spilled over the subject of the neglect of "Carmen" at the Metropolitan during the past few years, but now that Bizet's ever popular opera is on the local boards again, it is more to the point to examine into its performance than to discuss the reasons why it did not take place sooner. All such political matters can be left safely to the writers on the daily press, who with one or two exceptions are as much exercised over the inner workings of our opera houses, its administration, its receipts, intrigues and expenditures for singers, as they are over the purely musical matter put forth on the stage of that institution. In the European papers, personal gossip about opera artists and statements about their salaries never appear in the dailies—indeed, European music critics do not take the trouble to inform themselves in that direction—but American operatic life and atmosphere are unique phases, and possibly could not be duplicated anywhere else in any particular.

Be it said at the outset that the "Carmen" revival at the Metropolitan was in every way an admirable one. Musically, much was to be expected, for Arturo Toscanini wielded the baton, and the highest expectations were fulfilled amply, even if at times some of the tempi dragged a bit, a rare occurrence with Toscanini, by the way. Perhaps first night nervousness was responsible or possibly the conductor endeavored to lay dramatic emphasis upon certain phases hitherto treated with less weight. At any rate, the matter of the tempi was not sufficiently glaring to need argumentation, except on the part of those who go to opera with a stopwatch, compass and marked charts. All the beauties known to connoisseurs familiar with "Carmen's" score were realized finely by Toscanini. His orchestra glowed, and dazzled, and stimulated, and charmed. The chorus did the best singing that body ever has vouchsafed us at the Metropolitan. The scenery had all the lavishness customary at our famous edifice of lyric song, and caused especial interest because of the fact that most of it was built in America. (For patriotic or war reasons?) Giulio Gatti-Casazza deserves warm praise for every detail of the "Carmen" production with which he was associated personally.

The selection of the cast was a fortunate one. Geraldine Farrar was suited splendidly in the music of Carmen, which lies well for her voice. She has no high soprano tones to deliver and gets constant opportunity for the employment of her warm and full middle register, the best part of her singing organ. She adhered faithfully to the letter of her music and delivered it musically and with the necessary respect for rhythm, a consideration not always exhibited by some of the Carmens heard here previously. Where piquancy and sensuousness were required, the Farrar voice revealed them in ample measure. She was lacking in force, however, at some of the essentially passionate moments, but when she feels more at home in the Carmen part, doubtless she will be able to give more of herself to it, dynamically as well as temperamentally.

Much fuss and feather usually are made about the histrionic interpretation of Carmen and a great deal of the stuff uttered by way of comment is sheer nonsense. Carmen is not an exceptionally difficult role to portray, but for some reason or other certain critics and a part of the public attach as much importance to it as though it were a female Hamlet or Faust. Always the Merimée novel is dragged in and comparisons are made showing that the operatic exponent does not give a literal reading of the heroine's character as revealed in the book. Why should she? The one is meant to be read, the other to be seen and heard. The difference is obvious. Merimée had a chance to say in several hundred pages what the operatic impersonator must convey in a few brief scenes hampered by music. We do not expect Marguerite in opera to be a faithful reproduction of the Goethe figure. A long list of other literary and historical figures might be cited to show how rarely they keep their exact semblance when transplanted into opera.

Miss Farrar made a fascinating and sufficiently seductive personage of Carmen, and it appeared plausible that she could set afire such susceptible gentlemen as Don Jose and Escamillo. What more is required? She looked beautiful and dressed picturesquely. As remarked before, her delivery of the music answered to all artistic demands, and that after all is the thing one demands from a singer before everything else.

GIULIO GATTI-CASAZZA AFTER THE "CARMEN" REVIVAL.
Drawn for the MUSICAL COURIER by Enrico Caruso.

Enrico Caruso's Don Jose is not a novelty in New York. His delivery of the part bespeaks deep feeling and histrionic sincerity. He shows with uncommon skill the transition from the naive and clean minded soldier to the jealous beast torn by passion and struggling in the tyrannical throes of inescapable moral disintegration. Caruso's singing was ravishing in the "Flower Song" and the other lyrical episodes and eloquently intensive in the stirring moments of the last act.

Pasquale Amato, the Escamillo, seemed to be not entirely at ease in the Toreador role, but he sang his big aria with fire and resonance. His make-up and attire were uncommonly suggestive.

Frances Alda, a sweet toned Micaela, did her numbers with appealing sentiment and unfailingly refined vocal manipulation. In appearance she carried out the traditional idea of sweetness and simplicity.

Sophie Braslau, as Mercedes; Lenora Sparkes, the Frasquita; Reiss, the Dancaire; Bada, the Remendado; Rothier, the Zunigo, and Desire Defrere, the Morales, all contributed bits that helped to maintain the musical balance of the evening and must be given a due share of the real triumph which it established.

"Carmen" should prove to be one of the most profitable works in the winter's repertoire at the Metropolitan Opera House.

At Middletown, Conn., the Middlesex Musical Asociation has been formed for the purpose of "not only arranging for good music for Middletown and Middlesex County, but also to educate the people to a love of better music."

PUBLICITY IN THE ART WORLD.

When an artist has acquired his technic and completed his repertoire, the one thing he most needs then is publicity. Without publicity his art is vain. He is like a farmer without a market or a man with a money order he cannot cash. The sweet instruments hung up in cases, of which Shakespeare writes, are not more useless than the fine artist who is unknown and unable to display his art before the public.

The finest artist in the world will soon deteriorate and lose interest in his art if he does not get before an audience often enough to learn how to establish that subtle but potent magnetic current between himself and his audience which is the distinguishing feature of a great artist's performance. We believe that there are many musical artists who have naturally all the qualifications necessary to make successful and famous performers, but who fail to make a mark in the world because they do not come before the public often enough to learn how to control and direct that magnetic current.

Yet we see clever young artists almost every day, who have been spending thousands of dollars and years of work to acquire their skill, and who, nevertheless, hesitate or altogether refuse to spend a very few hundred dollars on publicity. We do not set a fictitious value on publicity and assert that all a student has to do is to advertise. We know perfectly well that a million dollars spent in advertising will not give a crow the reputation of a nightingale. But of what value is the mastery of an art if no one knows about it? We do not believe that an artist can be an artist long or be at his best with only himself and his immediate friends as his sole audience.

Many of these young artists seem to think that all an artist has to do is get a fine technic and a perfect style. They act as if the great public, of all professions and trades under heaven, is going to discover by some occult and supernatural means that they are splendid artists and worthy of fame and fortune. They utterly ignore the fact that nearly everybody is quite indifferent to the progress of art and the achievements of artists, and that he would never know that such and such an artist existed unless he happened to see the name repeatedly in the newspapers. A thousand explorers might travel to the Antarctic regions and trample to a solid cake all the snow around the pole, and we should never know of it at all unless the story got into the newspapers. Likewise the artist may soar and dive, and explore the shadowy depths and lofty heights of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms for half a century without receiving the least attention unless his name is emblazoned time and again in the newspaper temple of fame.

We are all alike with respect to a name. The first few times we meet with a new name we pay no attention to it unless it is associated with a remarkable achievement or a ghastly crime. A few weeks later when we see the name we say: Have I seen that name before or not? Two or three months later we say: I must have seen this name. Later still we say: This name is familiar. In time we know it well. When enough persons know a name well enough to recognize and remember it, the name may be called famous. And, until an artist has made his name known well enough to a public that is big enough, he is, for all practical purposes, a failure as an artist.

We constantly meet two kinds of musicians. One kind is of second rate merit as an artist, but is always on the lookout for press notices—as if publicity could ever take the place of art. The other kind of musician is thoroughly artistic and perfectly equipped, but neglectful of publicity—as if the busy public could possibly know anything about some one who was not advertised.

Then again, from time to time we meet the world famous artist who has managed somehow to bring his art before the public. He is the only successful artist, for not only is his reputation a source of material wealth to him, but his continual appearances before the public broaden him into a greater artist than he could ever have become in the obscurity of his room.

With all the newspaper publicity an artist can buy, and with all the incessant work he must give in order to back up his paper reputation, the young artist will still have enough trouble left to develop and strengthen his character.

"Waking up famous" is a very pretty thing for sentimental youth to dream about. But the famous artist knows by experience that continual work and persistent newspaper publicity must go hand in hand for months and even years before a solid reputation is established.

VOCAL BENISONS.

When Mme. Schumann-Heink sings one is tempted to paraphrase the Biblical quotation by saying that it is blessed indeed to receive. That must have been the feeling of the hundreds of persons who crowded Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, November 17, to hear the artist in a program of song, for they showed every proof of being supremely happy while the Schumann-Heink voice sounded, and they vented audible expressions of regret when that glorious organ ceased and the afternoon's musical pleasures were over.

Schumann-Heink's tonal equipment is as remarkable as ever in range, power, color and control. Mellow and persuasive when necessary, her voice promulgates also the intensely dramatic or the purely lyric, as the exigencies of the moment require, and always her tone is inspired with that wonderful expressiveness which gives the Schumann-Heink singing its personal appeal and enables her to direct her message straight to the soul of her listener—she touches the Gemüth, as the Germans put it in one of their untranslatable words.

Aside from the striking tonal and emotional aspects of Mme. Schumann-Heink's art, its significance lies also in its musicianship. Possessed of a fine sense of form and proportion, a sensitive ear and a keen understanding, the diva masters fully the notes and construction of a song as well as its spiritual content, and in the union of all those qualities lies the secret of her capture of the critics and the unconditional surrender of her audiences. She truly is a song artist who interprets the masters in the manner they must have dreamed of when they wrote the pieces she performs.

Schumann's cycle, "Frauenliebe und Leben," overshadowed the rest of the program, which contained also Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful," Beethoven's "Ich liebe dich," Schubert's "Die Allmacht," Mozart's Sextus aria from "Titus," Liszt's "Die drei Zigeuner," Brahms' "Sappische Ode," "Therese" and "Ständchen," Rubinstein's "Die Waldhexe," Foote's "An Irish Folksong," Carrie J. Bond's "His Lullaby," and Rudolph Ganz's "Love in a Cottage." Amazing interpretative versatility was displayed by Mme. Schumann-Heink in her delivery of the foregoing numbers. The Schumann cycle in the hands of such an artist becomes a tonal autobiography and she revealed in the deeply felt measures all the inner life and thought of a woman's soul. It was an uplifting reading. The broad strophes of Bach, the majesty of the Beethoven song, the might of "Die Allmacht," the purity of the Mozart music, the passion of the Liszt, Rubinstein and Brahms lyrics, and the charm and whimsicality of the final three songs on the program served further to convince the listeners that in Mme. Schumann-Heink they possessed not only a prophet who could divine the meaning of any product in the singing literature, but also a miracle worker who is able to put into beautiful sound what she sees and feels. She triumphed brilliantly.

CENTURY OPERA RESUME.

Now that the Century Opera Company has left New York it will not be without interest to do a little stock taking and to venture upon a little criticism, not of the performances, but of the public. The repertoire of the company during this season was as follows:

Romeo and Juliet	4	performances.
Carmen	8	"
William Tell	8	"
Traviata	8	"
Traviata (6 English and 2 Italian)	8	"
Lohengrin	8	"
Madame Butterfly	8	"
Jewels of the Madonna	8	"
La Boheme	8	"
Tales of Hoffmann	8	"
Aida	8	"
Lucia di Lammermoor	3	"

Farewell performance, Saturday night, November 21, with acts from "Trovatore" and "Lucia," and the entire opera of "Pagliacci."

In addition to the foregoing there were Hubbard Opera Talks on Sunday afternoons and concerts on Sunday evenings, but those were not the prime object of the Century endeavor and need not detain us here. The main object of the organization was to give New York good, cheap opera. For years some of the worthy people of New York have been voicing their dissatisfaction at the fact that this city was not provided with first class ensemble opera, the pride and the joy of every little town in Europe. The critics proclaimed loudly what they would do in the way of encouragement if such opera were provided for New York.

And what did those worthy people of New York and the critics do, after they had their wish granted?

Nothing.

They neglected the house and its offerings all last season, passed it by with unseeing eyes, noses in the air, on their way to a standing room or a seat at the Metropolitan, where they could witness their favorite stars scintillating in a firmament aglow with golden ducats.

And so the Century Opera Company wends its way elsewhere, and the MUSICAL COURIER wishes every member of the enterprise godspeed and good luck.

What attitude will other cities take toward this attempt to furnish opera for the people? The only reason why they get this chance is because New York would have none of it. Will other cities prove themselves more sensitive and responsive?

While on this subject it may not be out of place to suggest that greater publicity as to the matter of actual paid attendances would prove of inestimable value to future undertakings of a similar character. It is evident that there must always be two factors determinative of gate receipts: the star and the vehicle.

This is true in the theatre and must be equally so in the opera. Now, when the star is eliminated as it was at the Century, the sole determining question, presuming adequate performances, is the vehicle. Certain operas did draw. What were they? What was the actual comparative proportion of drawing power of all the operas given?

Surely the public has a right to know that. And it is the belief of the MUSICAL COURIER that such statistics, if published, would prove that there are not sufficient works possessed of any real drawing power to render non-star opera possible with the present standard of American tastes.

It is a commentary on the state of music in our time that no composer today could complete Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and preserve the spirit of that writer and equal his melodies in charm and simplicity.

SEX OF SONG BIRDS.

A mistake common to many of the old dramatists of England was to make song birds female. Shakespeare himself was wrong when he wrote: "I think the nightingale, if she should sing by day," etc.

Today we know that only the male bird sings. Among birds, too, the male has the more decorative plumage.

Shakespeare's friend and brother dramatist, John Ford, has written a poetical description of a contest between a lute player and a female nightingale. The passage, which we condense, is to be found in "The Lover's Melancholy," first printed in 1629:

One morning early
This accident encountered me: I heard
The sweetest and most ravishing contention
That art and nature ever were at strife in.
A sound of music touch'd mine ears, or rather Indeed entranc'd my soul; as I stole nearer,
Invited by the melody, I saw
This youth, this fair fac'd youth, upon his lute,
With strains of strange variety and harmony,
Proclaiming, as it seemed, so bold a challenge
To the clear choristers of the woods, the birds,
That, as they flock'd about him, all stood silent.
Wondering at what they heard. . . .
. . . A nightingale,
Nature's best skill'd musician, undertakes
The challenge, and for ev'ry several strain
The well shap'd youth could touch, she sung her down.
He could not run division with more art
Upon his quaking instrument, than she,
The nightingale, did with her various notes
Reply to . . .
Some time thus spent, the young man grew at last
Into a pretty anger, that a bird,
Whom art had never taught clefs, modes, or notes,
Should vie with him for mastery, whose study
Had busied many hours to perfect practice:
To end the controversy, in a rapture
Upon his instrument he plays so swiftly,
So many voluntaries, and so quick,
That there was curiosity and cunning,
Concord and discord, lines of diff'ring method
Meeting in one full center of delight.

Ford goes on to describe how the nightingale died of a broken heart and fell on the lute—all very pretty, but, of course, quite impossible.

It will be noted that Ford, like Shakespeare, had a fairly good knowledge of music. His references to division, voluntaries, clefs, modes, notes, melody, indicate a certain familiarity with the music of his period.

John Ford, the dramatist, must not be confounded with his contemporary, Thomas Ford, the composer.

IS RICHTER STILL A DOCTOR?

The story that Hans Richter has repudiated his titles and other honors received in England seems to be generally believed and yet the London Daily Telegraph throws a different light on the subject. That journal says in a recent issue:

No doubt we have all read the story that has been going round that Dr. Richter, who more or less dwelt among us for thirty years, had resigned his two English university degrees and had sent his English order to be sold for the German Red Cross fund. Now, I have no intention of arguing the point of the right or wrong of the matter; I wish merely to point out what I have discovered for myself. No word, I am assured, has been heard at Manchester from Dr. Richter as to his resignation of his Manchester degree, no word whatever. As to Oxford I have no information. Letters have recently been received in London from Madame Richter (who is in Sweden), who steadfastly describes her husband as Dr. Richter, a fact that those who knew the doctor will know could not possibly be had he resigned. Further, in the matter of the order, first, it was sent with a message that any money it might produce would be "used by those angels of the Red Cross who minister also to the English wounded." Secondly, it was renounced under duress. The fact is, Dr. Richter, who now lives, malgré lui, in Bayreuth, had deposited his savings in the chief bank there. The head of that bank, a noteworthy representative of German "Kultur" leading a horde of the Bayreuthian mob, bombarded Dr. Richter with the threat that if he did not follow the example of the German university professors, he, the banker, would offer Dr. Richter's balance to the Prussian war fund! I surely need say no more on that point.

Of course any one who knows the rigor of German banking laws will read with a smile the Daily Telegraph's vivid account of the happening in Bayreuth and the bank head's conversion of the money of a depositor.

A POPULAR TENOR.

John McCormack is a unique artist in many ways. For one thing, he opened his Carnegie Hall recital last Sunday afternoon, November 22, even though an assisting violinist was on the program. However, it really did not matter that Mr. McCormack thus boldly violated "star" traditions, for as far as the audience was concerned they seemed not to be able to hear the popular tenor soon enough or long enough. Of a truth, such a feeling on their part was readily to be understood, for John McCormack is an artist who appears never to fall below the very high musical standard of excellence he set for his work long ago, and the quality, range and power of his voice, instead of becoming impaired through his extraordinarily frequent appearances (due to the incessant demand for his services), in reality seem to have gained immeasurably. He is a lover of the bel canto phrase, and no voice could be adapted better to such a style of singing than his velvety, smooth and admirably emissioned organ. It is a source of keen artistic pleasure to hear him spin a vocal phrase with exquisite legato and breath control, and quite aside from the beauty of the McCormack singing the cultured listener is regaled also with that artist's consummate grasp of the sentiment of a song and with his fine taste and musical understanding in its delivery. No number shall be designated on the program of last Sunday as having been sung better than any other, for such things often are a matter of personal preference. Every song had its individual charm and attractiveness in the compelling utterance of the concert giver. The audience selected no single song for a lion's share of the applause, but gave ungrudging tribute of admiration throughout the afternoon. The vast size of the McCormack audiences and their high pitched enthusiasm always constitute one of the chief features of his recitals here and elsewhere.

The tenor's numbers included a "Rantzau" (Mascagni) aria, Hugo Wolf's "Secrecy," Reger's "The Quiet of the Woods," Schumann's "Hidden Tears," a group of Old Irish songs, Haile's "In the Moonlight," Edwin Schneider's "The Cave," Coleridge Taylor's "You Lay So Still" and Bizet's "Agnus Dei." Of course, there were encores galore.

Donald McBeath, the violinist, played acceptably Cottenet's "Meditation," Kreisler's "Schön Rosmarin," D'Ambrosio's "Ariette," a Mozart gavotte and menuet, and Bach's air on the G string. Edwin Schneider accompanied.

NO CHAUVINISM.

"There is no musical chauvinism in Britain," says Francis Toye in one column of his London Bystander article (November 4), and in another column of the same screed he remarks, commenting on the Queen's Hall Symphony concerts: "Four programs have already been announced; they contain no French music, no English music at all. Russia is represented only by Tschaikowsky and Tschaikowsky in his most familiar possible aspect. Worst of all, the sole living composer honored is . . . who, do you think? Richard Strauss! Were the programs not before me as I write, I should never have believed that what used to be the most enterprising musical organization in England could descend to such a level of musical senility."

Cannot composers and compositions be left out of the war? The spirit of fair play is beginning to revolt at this continual mixing of music and war. It is being done in America, too, greatly to the shame of our intelligence.

DOES SAINT-SAËNS DISLIKE WAGNER?

The following passages, taken from Wagner's autobiography, prove what a great admirer Saint-Saëns was of Richard Wagner more than fifty years ago, and is interesting in view of the French composer's recent attack on Richard I. It was in March, 1860, that Saint-Saëns was introduced to Wagner in Paris. Wagner writes of meeting Frédéric Villot, who was deeply interested in the German's music dramas. Not being a skillful pianist himself, he had the youthful Saint-Saëns play the difficult scores for him. To quote Wagner's own words:

"A very gifted young French musician, Camille Saint-Saëns, played the scores of my operas for Villot as he could not play them himself. The technic and the talent of Saint-Saëns, who seemed to be a protege of Villot, caused me the greatest astonishment. With a quite unexcelled certainty and rapidity he takes in at a glance the most complicated orchestral scores, and he has in addition a memory which is no less admirable. He could play my scores, among them "Tristan," by memory, and he knew them in such minute details that it seemed as if he always had the printed page before him. He possesses a stupendous receptability in taking in all the technical material of music."

Thus do Wagner's own words prove the intense interest that Saint-Saëns had for the master's compositions in 1860, when the Frenchman was twenty-five years old. For who but the most rabid enthusiast would learn a "Tristan" score from memory? No, no, Saint-Saens's recent much discussed anti-Wagner article in the Echo de Paris does not carry conviction.

Of interest in this connection is an answer to Saint-Saëns' attack, which appeared in the German press in the form of an open letter, written by the Committee of the Society of Music Friends in Düsseldorf. This answer reads as follows:

"To Camille Saint-Saëns, Paris.

"It is with astonishment and indignation that we learned that you have not hesitated to join in a most hateful manner in the calumnies of German art. When we made you an honorary member of our society a year ago we did so in sincere admiration of your musical ability and mission, which appealed to us more particularly since you followed in the footsteps of our German classics Bach and Beethoven. We admired in your works the rare combination of Teutonic contents and Latin form. We realize now our error in thinking that we found in the artist also an ideal as a man, and our mistake causes us the more pain as it is not a young inexperienced musician who scorns us. Have you forgotten that the work that founded your fame, your 'Samson and Delilah,' had its first performance in the German city of Weimar in 1877? Was it not in the maligned Germany that the highest decoration, 'Pour le mérite,' was conferred upon you? Were you not received only last year in a most courteous manner at the Berlin palace by William the Second, Emperor of the Barbarians? Well, then, if you have forgotten all this, then we will also erase your picture from our memories. The respect for your white hair is gone, and we herewith revoke your honorary membership of our society."

The writers only mention "Samson and Delilah," but as a matter of fact, Saint-Saëns has for decades had at least ten performances of all of his best known works in Germany to one in France. His compositions always have been very popular throughout the Fatherland.

A Fine Pianist.

When we first heard Olga Samaroff play a concerto with orchestra at Carnegie Hall, less than a dozen years ago, we remember to have felt a distinct thrill, for she got so much and such evident joy from the music and was so filled with the sense of her own power over the keyboard that she seemed to be entirely different from any of the old established virtuosi to whom we were listening here at about that time. Later we had the opportunity to hear Mme. Samaroff frequently with orchestra in an amazingly comprehensive repertoire, but we never missed the same feeling we had at our first public acquaintance with her, that as a player of concertos she possesses a peculiar aptitude owing not only to her thorough musical understanding of her own part and that of the accompanying body, but also because of her masterful keyboard manipulation in a technical and tonal way, which enables her to forget Samaroff's fingers and to let Samaroff's sense of tone blending and interpretative imagination soar untrammeled.

(From the London Tatler.)

The above is a German postcard reproduction. According to the Tatler, the illustration bears the legend: "First of all they grab our German money and now they turn round and abuse us." The figures in the picture are (from reader's left to right) Bernard Shaw, Maurice Maeterlinck, Ruggiero Leoncavallo and Gabriele d'Annunzio.

Last Saturday evening, November 21, we attended the second concert of the sixth pair in the series which the Philadelphia Orchestra is giving this winter at its home hall, the Academy of Music, and we had the great pleasure of hearing Mme. Samaroff play the Tschaikowsky concerto in B flat minor, which she did with a mechanical and musical mastery that left open no opportunity for criticism. The pianist has discovered many graphic moments in the work which she did not set forth so convincingly in former days, admirable as her reading seemed then, and these new phases showed how deeply she has been studying and imbibing art during the past few years which marked her temporary retirement from the concert stage.

First of all, Mme. Samaroff's tone has taken on added fulness and richness and she knows how to nuance it so as to express lyrical and dramatic presentments with equal effect and potency. Glittering brilliancy distinguishes the Samaroff scale passages and cadenzas, resonating power is in her octaves, and as a climax builder she is especially skillful, piling up her structure with deliberate art rather than through stress of speed and resounding dynamics. In the second movement Mme. Samaroff gave forth soulful song mixed with piquant rhythmical contrasts. The finale had exhilarating vim and uplift in the player's portrayal of the tempestuous Cossack dance with its overwhelming octave and chord conclusion. Aided by the sympathetic and particularly close accompaniment of the orchestra under the direction of Mme. Samaroff's husband, Leopold Stokowski, the entire performance was of an incisiveness and homogeneousness which we do not remember to have experienced before in like measure in the Tschaikowsky concerto. The audience seemed to be of our opinion, for tremendous applause rewarded Mme. Samaroff at the end of her singularly impressive performance. She now is a truly significant force in the ranks of our best players.

The orchestra gave delicately tempered readings of the "Lohengrin" prelude, of Mendelssohn's by no means faded "Italian" symphony, and Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture. Stokowski's baton coaxed lovely tonal experiences from all those romantic and melodious pages.

Never Heard of Musical Grammar?

VARIATIONS—The following occurred at a rehearsal of the choir of the P———, Vermont, Methodist Church. They were working on an anthem for the next Sunday, when the director, a man of wealth, who contributed quite largely to the support of the church, and who held his position solely because of this, no one daring to risk offending him by even hinting at his resigning, halted the choir, called their attention to a certain note in the soprano part, which had evidently been misprinted, and said, wishing to impress them with his knowledge of music: "One moment, please; one moment. That note must be changed. It is—er—er—er—grammatically wrong."

Truly yours,

Money Back for Bruckner?

The New York Tribune announces that to any dissatisfied buyer of wares advertised in its columns it will refund the purchase money. This principle applied to concert and opera tickets will lead to interesting developments.

The Story We Didn't Get.

At the Opera the other night George Hamlin discussed the war question with us and suddenly asked whether we had heard Mrs. Richard Strauss' bon mot regarding the situation.

"No," we replied, in the manner of a minstrel interlocutor; "no, George, we have not heard Mrs. Richard Strauss' bon mot regarding the war situation. What is Mrs. Richard Strauss' bon mot regarding the war situation?"

Just then Daniel Frohman joined us with a remark which started a lively discussion. "Why?" he asked, "did 'Carmen' fail at its early representations in Paris?" When various opinions had been advanced, it was time for the curtain to go up on the second act. Just as the group of lobby sages separated we grasped George Hamlin's arm. "What was it," we inquired, "that Mrs. Richard Strauss said regarding the war?"

"Psst!" cautioned tenor Hamlin; "the curtain's up."

During the next intermission we caught sight of him again, and having backed him into a corner, repeated our "What was it that Mrs. Richard Strauss said regarding the war?"

"Well, I'll tell you," he began, and suddenly interrupted with: "There goes Herb Witherspoon. Pardon me, but I must speak to him."

After the third act we got on the Hamlin trail with the fall of the curtain and corraled him near the water cooler. "What was Mrs. Richard Strauss' bon mot regarding——"

Alexander Lambert shot into view. "Hello, hello, hello," he greeted; "do you think the present conditions really are helping the American piano teacher? Of course, personally, I have no cause for complaint—there's Oscar Saenger. Let's ask him how the vocal field is affected." Pedagogue Saenger joined. We drew our man aside. "What was that bon mot of Mrs. Richard Strauss regarding the war situation?" A lady passed, nodded to George Hamlin and he jumped gallantly to her side. We saw him no more that evening.

Now, what was that bon mot of Mrs. Richard Strauss regarding the war situation?

What We Did Hear.

And, by the way, talking of "Carmen," the lay opinions one overheard in the Metropolitan lobby were as overwhelmingly agreed as they ordinarily are when professional criticism seeks to establish an estimate. They ran something like this:

"Farrar is better than Calvé."
"No one ever approached Calvé."
"At least Farrar sings the part."
"It was Calvé's vocalism that made her famous."
"Calvé's Carmen was more seductive."
"Farrar is much more sensuous than Calvé."
"Calvé knew how to make Carmen alluring."
"Farrar's conception is wonderful."
"Farrar does not understand the part."
"I don't like Farrar's costumes."
"Her costumes are the very thing a Spanish girl of the people would wear."
"Farrar makes it plain that Carmen is immoral."
"Pardon me; Carmen is merely unmoral."
"Farrar does not walk Spanish."
"Spanish girls do not swing on their hips all the time; they are extremely modest."
"Do you really like Farrar better than Calvé?"
"Well, in some things she is better and in others she is not. Calvé wore larger combs in her hair, but Farrar certainly has whiter teeth."
"Do you suppose that Farrar is a success?"
"Without a question. I saw one of the ushers applauding."
"Who wrote the libretto of 'Carmen'?"
"Eh? Oh, the libretto? Er—ahem. Let's see. I give it up."
"So do I. It's the music after all that counts, isn't it?"
"You bet. Take that 'Toreador' song, for instance. Ta, ti, di-dum dum."
"Oh, yes. I know the tune. We've got it on our machine at home."
"Whom do you like better, Farrar or Didur?"
"Didur is a man."
"Well, what of it?"

Limited Repertoire.

One of Ossip Gabrilowitsch's most important achievements of recent years was a series of concerts given in Berlin and other German cities, in which he illustrated the development of the concerto from Bach to the present time. In a series of four concerts he played no less than nineteen concertos. Shortly after this series the pianist was engaged for an orchestral appearance in one of the smaller German provincial towns, and a request was sent him for his orchestral repertoire. To save time Gabrilowitsch submitted the list of concertos he had played at his Berlin series. He was amused to receive a reply a few days later, stating that the conductor regretted there was nothing in the pianist's repertoire to serve the purpose of the organization. "In view of the fact that this list covered practically the whole range of concerto literature, I was rather taken back by the reply," says Mr. Gabrilowitsch in relating the incident, "but I finally succeeded in digging up another work which met the conductor's approval."

Cyclic Progression.

Did Debussy really give us anything new in his exotic scale progressions and their vague and shadowy atmosphere? He did not, declares Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull in his new book, "Modern Harmony." The author says:

"Debussy's sequences of sevenths are but a reverberation of the practice of Guillaume de Machault in the fourteenth century. Striking examples of tonal chords may be found in Purcell, and twelve-note scale wrestlings in the Elizabethan pieces for the 'virginals' by John Bull."

Dr. Hull's scheme might be carried even further and made to show logically that Hucbald, the monk, and Abt Vogler, used the self same notes employed centuries later by Wagner, Strauss and Brahms. Undoubtedly, too, Hucbald and Vogler wrote with their right hands, and as Wagner, Strauss and Brahms did likewise, there remains nothing but to regard them as conscienceless and despicable plagiarists.

Musical Candor at Last.

From the review in the London Observer (November 1, 1914) of a recent concert by the London Symphony Orchestra in that city: "The Haydn symphony played, by the way, was not that analyzed in the program notes, though these seemed to fit very appropriately to the substituted work."

Lunga Pausa.

While Harold Bauer was in Australia this past summer he visited Adelaide, which is one of the most conservative of the Australasian cities. To his surprise he was welcomed by the hotel clerk with the greeting: "I'm glad to see you back, Mr. Bauer."

"But I never was here before," said the pianist.

"That's odd. I thought you were here last year."

"MUSIC HATH CHARMS TO SOOTHE THE—GERMAN SOLDIER."

(From the London Bystander, November 4, 1914.)

A snapshot which shows a German patrol whiling away the time.

"No," rejoined the pianist seriously, "I have not been in this part of the world since my last incarnation."

The clerk looked a bit puzzled. "Well, Mr. Bauer," he said at length, "you'll find Adelaide very little changed."

Breadth in Song.

It would not be gallant to tell which stout singer was known in Paris as the Venus de Kilo.

No Musical Bullets.

In connection with a letter addressed to the MUSICAL COURIER recently by Algernon Ashton, which forced this paper to telephone to Kaiser Wilhelm and inquire whether he really was melting up leaden music plates for bullets, it is timely to quote a paragraph from the Monthly Musical Record of London (November 2, 1914):

"Much unnecessary anxiety and controversy have been caused in the musical world by rumors that the German Government has requisitioned engraved metal plates for ammunition purposes. It is surprising to find that such rumors can be treated seriously when every encyclopædia will show that Germany produces over 160,000 tons of lead a year, while the entire weight of music plates in Germany can scarcely exceed 2,000 tons."

All Roads Blocked.

Composer—"I feel inspired today. I shall write a symphony."

Amicus—"What, after Beethoven's masterpieces in that form?"

Composer—"You're right. I'll do a symphonic poem instead.

Amicus—"Do you think you can outwrite Liszt and Richard Strauss?"

Composer—"Well said. No symphonic poem for me, but an opera. I'll start one that——"

Amicus—"Don't you think the operatic field was covered pretty well by Mozart, Verdi, Rossini, Wagner and the new Italians?"

Composer—"Sufficiently. I'll write a song."

Amicus—"And wrest the laurels from Franz Wolf, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms?"

Composer—"How stupid of me. A sonata——"

Amicus—"There's Beethoven."

Composer—"I'd quite forgotten. A rhapsody."

Amicus—"Liszt."

Composer—"Gee! Not for me. How about a nocturne, a waltz, a ballade, a polonaise, an etude, a mazurka, a fantasie, a——"

Amicus—"Chopin."

Composer—"Well, I don't think I'll write today. I'll just practise the piano."

Amicus—"Have you forgotten Busoni, Gabrilowitsch, Godowsky, Rosenthal, Bauer, Borwick, Lhevinne——"

Composer—"Aw! Let's go and play billiards."

Amicus—"Now you're talking."

LEONARD LIEBLING.

Soprano and Harpist in Concert.

Lucy Gates, the young soprano who has created much favorable comment in New York, and Annie Louise David, harpist, were the soloists at the concert of the National City Bank Association on Wednesday evening of last week. Miss Gates has been engaged by the Rubinstein Club for the evening concert at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, on December 8. She will have several appearances in New York this season.

Annie Louise David's Appearances.

Annie Louise David will be the soloist with the Orpheus Club of Philadelphia at its concert in the Academy of Music, December 5, and on the evening of December 16 she will make her twenty-fifth appearance in Newark, N. J., assisting J. H. Huntington, organist, in recital. On December 2 Mrs. David is to be the soloist with the Mundell Choral Club at the Hotel Bossert, Brooklyn.

Pilzer's Program.

Maximilian Pilzer, who will give a recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, Sunday evening, December 6, will play the Bach concerto in E major, the Vieuxtemps grand concerto in D minor, and works of Kolar, Zarsycki, Tschaikowsky and Sarasate. The violinist will also play two compositions of his own. Charles Gilbert Spross will assist at the piano.

Mme. Fremstad Has Recovered.

Mme. Fremstad has fully recovered from the attack of ptomain poisoning from which she suffered while in Tampa, Fla., and will resume her tour in Brooklyn, N. Y., December 3. Her New York recital will be given at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday afternoon, December 16.

Mary Jordan with Springfield Choir.

Mary Jordan will be the soloist with the Schubert Male Choir, of Springfield, Mass., on Sunday, December 6. Arthur H. Turner is the conductor.

GRAND OPERA IN NEW YORK.

"Carmen" Revival Is Event of First Week of Season—Brooklyn Series of Metropolitan Performances Inaugurated at the Academy of Music.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

"Lohengrin," November 18.

On Wednesday evening, November 18, Wagner's "Lohengrin" drew a large but strangely unenthusiastic audience. Although nearly all the artists were in fine fettle and gave a remarkably good performance, the curtain calls for the singers after the acts were neither loud nor long. Johanna Gadski and Jacques Urlus were the superdreadnoughts of the evening. Mme. Gadski always has been an ideal Elsa, and her thorough grasp of the poetry of the part and her finely tempered and musically conceived singing were in as grateful evidence as of yore. She is a joy ever to the discriminative mind and the cultured ear.

Urlus' Lohengrin revealed beautiful upper tones in mezzo-forte, authoritative delivery, and convincing acting. Margarete Ober, the Ortrud, was as sincere and satisfying as usual and sang superbly.

Hermann Weil was the unfortunate Telramund, fortunately for the part, which has little to attract unless an artist like Hermann Weil redeems it. The King was acted by the towering Carl Braun, who seems to be able to sing high baritone and low bass with equal ease. Arthur Middleton, who made his first appearance at the Metropolitan

LUCA BOTTA.
New Metropolitan Opera tenor.

Opera House on this occasion, is the possessor of a musical and brilliant baritone voice which was admirably suited to the Herald. He acted with distinction and used his limited opportunities with skill. It will be interesting to watch his achievements in other roles as the season goes on.

Julius Bayer, Ludwig Burgstaller, Adolf Fuhrmann, Carl Bitterl, Louise Cox, Rosina van Dyck, Minnie Egener, Veni Warwick, completed the cast. Alfred Hertz conducted.

"Carmen," November 19.

A full report of this performance will be found in the editorial section of this paper.

"Rosenkavalier," November 20.

Strauss' marvelously clever and melodiously fascinating opera exerted the same charm it exhibited here last season, and at its first performance this winter again inspired a houseful of listeners to uncommon outbursts of applausive enthusiasm.

The score reveals new beauties at every additional hearing, and that is not to be wondered at, for Strauss' complex system of scoring and his phenomenal mastery of counterpoint bewilder the casual listener at first, and it is necessary for him to know the "Rosenkavalier" well in order to follow faithfully the riches of its orchestration and the resourcefulness of the thematic treatment which form the web and woof of the composition. "Rosenkavalier" is the modern "Meistersinger" in every sense of the word, and the fact that both operas are comic and based on the same broad Teutonic humor, but serves to strengthen the comparison. Those critics who carp at some of the situations in the Strauss opera, accept others of downright vulgarity in the newer Italian works, therefore their strictures must be regarded with amused indifference. Other fault finders cavil at the length of "Rosenkavalier." Is "Meistersinger" not long? It must be admitted that both works could stand a bit of pruning, especially as to repetitions of musical material, but who is to do the pruning? Who so bold as to tamper with such masterpieces or the form in which their creators fashioned them?

An exceptionally strong cast helps the "Rosenkavalier" to score very decisively at the Metropolitan. Otto Goritz, who overacts Beckmesser so painfully in "Meistersinger" finds exactly the right key for Baron Ochs in the Strauss opera. He keeps the audience amused at all stages of his performance. Frieda Hempel as the Feldmarschallin was a veritable delight. Her histrionism reflected a touch as deft as it was charming and her singing never has sounded more pure in timbre or more ravishing in quality. She may truthfully be said to have surpassed her best previous efforts here, and the Metropolitan is to be congratulated upon the acquisition of such an artist in its personnel.

Margarete Ober made Octavian a figure to adore, what with her finished portrayal and her vocal blandishments which exerted the same appeal to the ear and the musical intelligence that caused her singing to be such a joy last winter. Her scenes with Ochs and the Feldmarschallin were gems. Hermann Weil, always master of whatever he plays, did Faninal with keen appreciation of the possibilities of the part and his singing made an excellent impression as well. Elizabeth Schumann, a newcomer in the role of Sophie, has a fresh, well trained soprano voice of useful range and routined flexibility. Other roles were taken by Vera Curtis, Albert Reiss, Marie Mattfeld, Carl Schlegel, and Ruth Weinstein. Alfred Hertz conducted.

"La Boheme," November 21 (Matinee).

The first matinee of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House took place last Saturday, with a production of Puccini's "La Boheme," under the conductorship of Giorgio Polacco, and the following cast: Rodolfo, Luca Botta; Schaunard, Riccardo Tegani; Benoit, Paolo Ananian; Mimi, Lucrezia Bori; Parpignol, Pietro Audisio; Marcello, Antonio Scotti; Colline, Andrea de Segurola; Alcindoro, Paolo Ananian; Musetta, Elisabeth Schumann; Sergente, Vincenzo Reschiglian; conductor, Giorgio Polacco.

There was a large audience present and much interest was evinced in the debut of the new tenor, Luca Botta, hitherto unknown to New York.

In an institution like the Metropolitan it is not an easy task for a tenor to make a debut owing to the fact that the central figure of this organization is the distinguished Caruso, and any new tenor there cannot fail to bear this in mind. Therefore, when a newcomer achieves such a splendid success as Luca Botta did last Saturday it must be designated as a triumph. Botta is a lyric tenor. His voice is best in the upper register, his tone emission always is agreeable and he has full command of all the required vocal resources. In making his debut as Rodolfo he selected a fitting medium, for it gave him ample opportunity to display his lyric qualities. It was natural for the young tenor to be somewhat nervous in the first act, but notwithstanding, he proved himself an experienced artist and grew in favor with each succeeding act.

There was another newcomer in the role of Shaunard, Riccardo Tegani. He has a basso voice of good quality, and in the small role assigned to him showed himself to be experienced and useful.

As Mimi, Lucrezia Bori made her reappearance this season and again scored a resounding success. She sang with considerable charm and acted the role with taste. Her occasional slight departure from the pitch may have been due to nervousness.

As Musetta, the new singer, Elisabeth Schumann, did not altogether fill the requirements, either vocally or dramatically.

There was nothing new in the characters represented by Messrs. Scotti and De Segurola except in their attire, and the old coat so much bemoaned by Colline (De Segurola) in the sentimental song in the last act looked as if it had just come from the costumer for the first time.

Giorgio Polacco conducted with his accustomed skill and discretion.

"Aida," November 21 (Evening).

A popular priced performance drew a goodly audience which spared no pains to show its appreciation of the music and of the singing. Toscanini conducted, and thus the fortunate holders of tickets had an additional artistic treat. "Aida" now heads all other operas in popularity here, and deservedly so, for it combines melody and melodramatics in idcal quantity and proportion. Also the work permits of those spectacular stage and scenic accessories which create so much more effect in grand opera (owing to the musical obligato) than anywhere else.

Emmy Destinn gave her familiar fine sensed and impassioned portrayal of the heroine. Giovanni Martinelli was conventional but painstaking as Radames. Margarete Matzenauer's Amneris had intense dramatic power and was sung with full toned and vocally expert delivery. The Amonasro of Amato is one of his best roles, and as usual, he gave a splendid account of himself, both as a singer and an actor. Adamo Didur did the Ramfis, Giulio Rossi the King, Lenora Sparkes the Priestess and Angelo Bada the Messenger. The chorus was in especially fine form.

Metropolitan Sunday Night Concert.

Frank Gittelson, the young American violinist, was the visiting soloist at the initial Sunday night concert of the 1914-1915 season at the Metropolitan. In the first half of the program he played the Bruch concerto in G minor with breadth of style and the thorough musicianship of an artist. His bowing and double stopping were excellent and dash and brilliancy in delivery, as well as loveliness of tone, won for his performance prolonged and enthusiastic applause. At his second appearance he gave a Brahms Hungarian dance, D'Ambrosio's "Canzonetta" and Kreisler's "Liebesfreud." After each selection he was compelled to add encores, which he did amiably and successfully. He is a violinist who has "arrived" decisively.

Other soloists on the program were Lucrezia Bori and Arthur Middleton. Miss Bori sang an aria from Puccini's "Manon Lescaut" instead of Micaela's song from "Carmen," as scheduled. Her second number was "One Fine Day," from "Madame Butterfly." Regarding her beautiful voice and delightful interpretation, no comment is necessary. Arthur Middleton, a newcomer to the ranks of the Metropolitan Opera Company, gave "O du mein holder Abendstern," from "Tannhäuser," and an aria from Thomas' "Le Caid.' Mr. Middleton has a splendid voice, which he uses with discrimination and excellent judgment, and it will be more than interesting to follow his further career at the Metropolitan, begun so strikingly last week in "Lohengrin." Tomorrow (November 26) Mr. Middleton is to sing Escamillo in "Carmen."

The orchestra played the "Meistersinger" prelude, the ballet suite from Massenet's "Le Cid," and the "Marche Heroique," by Saint-Saëns.

A large and enthusiastic audience filled the house, and apparently enjoyed the excellent renderings greatly.

BROOKLYN ACADEMY.

"Manon Lescaut," November 17.

Brooklyn's grand opera season had a brilliant opening at the Academy of Music, on Tuesday evening, November 17, with Puccini's "Manon Lescaut." The cast included Lucrezia Bori, Antonio Scotti, Giovanni Martinelli, Andrea de Segurola and Albert Reiss, and the opera was conducted by Giorgio Polacco.

Mme. Bori is unusually well suited to the role of Manon and lends to it charm and grace as well as pathos in the latter scenes. Her singing on this occasion was tasteful and effective.

Martinelli, the Des Grieux, did not, in his acting or singing, attain any great height of passion or emotion. The Geronte of de Segurola was excellent and Albert Reiss was humorous and entertaining as the Maestra di Ballo. Antonio Scotti did Lescaut.

The conducting of Polacco was, as usual, entirely in keeping with the composer's intentions, and he succeeded admirably in bringing out the effective parts of the score with temperamental impetus and unfailing musicianship. He is a true artist of the baton.

Special commendation must be given to the work of the chorus, especially the women's chorus in the second act. The auditorium was well filled, and this premiere marked a gala event for Brooklyn's fashionable world.

George Hamlin's New York Program.

George Hamlin, the American tenor, will give a recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, Wednesday afternoon, December 9. He will sing several novelties which he secured in Germany—songs by Posa, Van Eyken and Fleck; also a new song which Rudolph Ganz dedicated to Mr. Hamlin and another written for and dedicated to the singer by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. The song by Rudolph Ganz will be sung from manuscript. Mr. Hamlin adds the alliteration that he will sing some seldom sung Schubert and Schumann songs.

A Bernstein Musicale.

Eugene Bernstein and Mrs. Bernstein gave a musicale at their home, 785 West End avenue, New York, last Sunday afternoon, which was attended by a large gathering of musical people. The program was presented by the Russian trio and Eileen Castles, soprano. Eugene Bernstein has recently opened his conservatory at the above address.

Mme. Frank King Clark Is in New York.

Mme. Frank King Clark, who was to have come to America to begin her tour under the management of M. H. Hanson in September, was delayed by various causes and arrived only last week from Berlin via Bergen by the steamship Bergensfiord, of the Norwegian Line. Except for the fact that she had to go as far north as Bergen to embark, and that the ship is said to have taken an extremely Northern passage so as to avoid the possibilities of striking the mines with which the North Sea is said to be strewn, the passage was uneventful.

Mme. King Clark will remain in New York for the present and will in the intervals of her public appearances during her concert tour, receive pupils. It is understood that she already has a number of pupils with her, either her own pupils who were with her in Berlin or the pupils of her husband, one of the best known of European teachers, whose untimely death caused a shock to the musical world a few weeks ago.

Mme. King Clark is an American by birth, but is strangely enough often taken for a foreigner, possibly because of her appearance, possibly because of the fact that she lived abroad for a number of years. It will be recalled that King Clark and his wife moved to Paris thirteen years ago. They were immediately successful in Paris as teachers, and King Clark's reputation soon became world wide, Mme. King Clark at the same time becoming known as a singer of brilliant gifts and attainments. They remained in Paris nine years and then moved to Berlin, where they continued their teaching with undiminished activity. In the last few years Mme. King Clark has appeared frequently in public and has won unfailing success in Germany, France and England. Because of the flattering comments of the European press, her American tour is looked forward to with great interest. A singer of whom the London Globe could say "It is not likely that the season will bring us many unfamiliar singers who will captivate their hearers as quickly and as surely as did Mme. King Clark," is one whom America may be glad to welcome. She is spoken of by the London Daily Graphic as having "a charming personality and a great power of sympathetic interpretation." The London Morning Post speaks of her as possessing "a delicacy of style wholly fascinating," and says that "she is one of the few singers of the day who really know the fundamental principles of their art." The London Daily Telegraph says that "her mezzo soprano voice is of sympathetic quality and her mezzo-voce singing was beautiful," and speaks of the "perfect smoothness of production." From the Berlin press, Der Tag says that "the concert loomed up considerably above the usual run of events of this kind." The Allegemeine Musikzeitung speaks of "her soulful, richly colored contralto," and so it is with innumerable other papers of high standing, whose criticism is worthy of the greatest consideration.

Mme. King Clark will give a recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on the afternoon of Tuesday, December 8. She selects her programs from all schools, including the American, and says that she is fond of English songs and likes to sing in English, but that she finds the composers of English songs are often at fault in selecting bad words for their settings and leaning too often to sentimentality. Of course, it is needless to say that Mme. King Clark is a linguist, having lived abroad so many years. She speaks all of the European languages with equal ease and facility and sings them with the same fluency as her native English.

Mme. King Clark will open a studio in New York, but has not yet decided upon the location, which will be announced at an early date.

Sundelius with New York Oratorio Society.

Marie Sundelius, the soprano who is creating such widespread enthusiasm with her beautiful voice and sincere art, has been selected by Conductor Louis Koemmenich, of the New York Oratorio Society to create the soprano role in Bossi's "Joan of Arc," a work that will be given its first performance in America, March 24, at Carnegie Hall, New York.

MacDermids in the Middle West.

Sibyl Sammis-MacDermid and James G. MacDermid opened their season in Emporia, Kan., at the State Normal School, November 6, repeating their program at Cairo, Ill., November 10; Streator, Ill., November 12, and at a private musicale at Evanston, Ill., November 14.

Numerous bookings have been made for these artists in the Middle West previous to their departure to the Pacific Coast in January.

Philharmonic Wagner Program.

A Wagner program always is a strong card even in these troublous times, and if there is any anti-German feeling in New York it certainly was not shown at the special concert given by the Philharmonic Society on Saturday evening, November 21, at Carnegie Hall, this being the first of a series of four Saturday evening concerts at popular prices and devoted to the music of Wagner. The auditorium was filled to its capacity and the applause for the Wagner music and for the playing of the Philharmonic Society was prolonged and well deserved.

The program consisted of the preludes to "Flying Dutchman," "Tristan und Isolde," "Meistersinger," "Parsifal" and "Tannhäuser," "Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Träume," the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal" and the "Ride of the Valkyries" as a finale.

The orchestra is very much at home with the music of Wagner and the flowing legato and bel canto of the players made their readings more than usually broad and intense. Orchestras are all too prone to forget that Wagner is first of all a melodic writer, and exaggerate the complexity of his scores without succeeding in bringing out their wonderful tunefulness. It is this that the Philharmonic members do without ever verging on sentimentality or neglecting the necessity of strong rhythms where they are called for. This general criticism applies to everything on this program, but is particularly applicable to the prelude to the "Meistersinger," where the strong opening martial tempo is followed almost immediately by a passage of delicate and tender legato, which is all too often taken at an excessive tempo.

This was a fine concert of music finely rendered, the one possible criticism being that the opening of the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde" was not sufficiently deliberate in the matter of pauses, which are generally counted out to their full value or even lengthened. But where everything else was so excellent it will not do to be hypercritical.

Philharmonic's Brooklyn Concert.

Weber's overture, "Oberon," Dvorák's "New World" symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien," op. 45, and excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" (Berlioz) were the numbers chosen by the Philharmonic Society of New York for the first Brooklyn subscription concert, given Sunday afternoon, November 22, in the Academy of Music.

A large audience showed in no uncertain manner its great enjoyment of the orchestra's splendid reading of every number, particularly of the "New World" symphony.

Julia Culp was unable to appear as advertised because of a sudden indisposition. Eleonora de Cisneros substituted for Mme. Culp on short notice. She sang three songs to piano accompaniment, including the Wagner "Träume" and an aria from "Samson and Delilah" (Saint-Saëns) to orchestral accompaniment. Mme. de Cisneros' eleven years of operatic experience made this stepping into the breach a mere nothing to her. Her singing betokened the thorough artist and disclosed to her Brooklyn audience a contralto voice of wide range and rare quality. She made the most of her songs, bringing out their fine points masterfully. Her appearance was a thorough success in every way.

Death of Russian Musicians.

Annette Essipoff, the famous pianist, died in Petrograd recently, aged sixty-three. She began her successful European concert career in 1874 and in 1876 visited America. From 1893 to 1908 she was professor of piano at the St. Petersburg Conservatory. Her marriage with Leschetizky was not a happy one and the couple were divorced.

Anatole Liadow, the well known Russian composer, passed away a few weeks ago in Petrograd, aged fifty-nine. His early studies in composition were with Rimsky-Korsakoff. Later he became a teacher and conductor in the Russian capital. His works were nearly all for piano and showed melodic fecundity, taste, musicianship and polished facture.

Sara Heineman Sings Before Art Society.

Sara Heineman sang Stephen Foster's "Old Folks at Home" and Nevin's "Mighty Lak' a Rose" before members of the International Art Society, Hotel Astor, New York, Tuesday evening, November 17. Mme. Heineman, who makes a specialty of Southern songs in costume, appeared in a cotton print gown, poke bonnet and curls. She was well received. Grace Anderson is Mme. Heineman's accompanist.

Florence Bridges, violinist, and the Ziegler Quartet, furnished numbers on the same program.

MAKING BANDAGES.

LYCEE PASTEUR, NOW THE AMERICAN AMBULANCE HOSPITAL, PARIS.

ONE OF THE MAIN WARDS.

Paul Draper's New York Debut.

Paul Draper, the American tenor, made his first appearance in his native city at Aeolian Hall, Tuesday afternoon, November 10, in a program of songs by Schubert, Schumann and Karol Szymanowski, a young Polish composer.

Mr. Draper had announced himself in advance as a singer of lieder, and with his very first number he proved that he has an absolute right to that designation. The program was carefully chosen, finely balanced and, above all, it required only one hour to sing it, which is quite long enough for any recital program. He first sang three Gesänge des Harfners by Schubert, following these with Schumann's "Dichterliebe" cycle, and ended with four songs of Szymanowski.

Mr. Draper has a tenor voice of very agreeable quality and under very perfect control. One feels always that he has it absolutely in hand and knows exactly what he is doing and why he is doing it, whether it be in a loud passage or in one of the remarkably delicate pianissimos which he so often used with telling effect in the course of the recital.

As an interpreter he leaves nothing to be desired. Mr. Draper has had the advantage of three years' work with the noted London authority on German lieder, Raimund von Zurmühlen, and what he learned from this coach, together with the additional nice details which his own intelligence and taste have suggested, go to make him one of the most authoritative interpreters of the German lied who has ever appeared in New York. Nobody who heard the recital the other day—especially the singing of Schumann's immortal "Dichterliebe"—can doubt that fact.

With such universal excellence of interpretation it would be extremely difficult to select any one number for special praise, though it is hard to conceive anything finer than "Ich hab' im Traum geweinet." Of the Szymanowski songs, all of which are extremely hard both for the singer and pianist, the first and second, "An Kleine Mädchen" and "Christkindleins Wiegenlied," were the most effective, though the "Einsiedel" is robust and manly and made a very fitting close to the program.

Mr. Draper may well be thoroughly satisfied with the success which he achieved. There was hearty applause after the Schubert group and after the "Dichterliebe" he was recalled enthusiastically no less than half a dozen times, while at the end of the program the audience remained recalling him until he was compelled to add an extra number. As a fine artist in his special line—that of interpreting German lieder—Mr. Draper is heartily welcome to concert giving circles of New York, and is sure to make a distinct place for himself within a very short time.

American Ambulance Hospital Benefit Concert.

An interesting concert was given at the Hotel Plaza, New York, on November 20, for the benefit of the American Ambulance Hospital in Paris, distinction being lent to the occasion by the appearance of Constance Purdy, who was heard both in solos and in concerted numbers. Miss Purdy sang first a duet with Mme. Le Fontenay-Coudert selected from "Le Roi d'Ys," of Lalo. Her next appearance was in a group of American songs: "Youth Comes Dancing O'er the Meadows," Bauer; "Fog Wraiths," Carpenter, and "Song of the Deathless Voice," Farwell, in the last two of which her fine phrasing and breath control and the unusual warmth and beauty of her voice were especially noticeable.

Miss Purdy's further contributions were a duet from "Prince Igor," Borodine, which she sang with George Harris, Jr., a duet from "Madame Butterfly," with Mme. Le Fontenay-Coudert, and a group of three Russian songs, "Daylight May Reign," Tschaikowsky; "Vision," Moussorgsky; "I Must Have Rejoicing," Glière. In these Miss Purdy's breadth of style and sterling musicianship were manifest and she gave particularly a glowing and colorful interpretation of Moussorgsky's "Vision."

Other numbers on the program were a group of songs by Mr. Coudert, two Debussy songs and "Yesterday and Today," Spross, by Mme. Le Fontenay-Coudert, and a group by Mr. Harris.

The concert was largely attended and the artists enthusiastically received.

Rubinstein Club Musicale.

Artists who furnished the program at the first musicale of the twenty-eighth season of the Rubinstein Club (Mrs. William Rogers Chapman, president), held in the Grand Ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, Saturday afternoon, November 21, were: Alice Sovereign, contralto; Cuyler Black, tenor, and Albert Spalding, violinist, with André Benoist, E. Romayne Simmons and Bidkar Leete at the piano.

Albert Spalding, the American violinist, recently returned from a concert tour abroad, which established fame for him wherever he appeared, won by his playing the immediate recognition of the Rubinstein members, as an American artist who has achieved marked distinction. His superb tone, remarkable technic and interpretations place this artist in high rank among violinists. André Benoist was his accompanist. Tschaikowsky, Brahms-Joachim, Dvorák, Spalding, Grasse and Paganini-Spalding were the composers whose selections he played.

Alice Sovereign, contralto, appeared in two groups of songs. These were: "Lungi Del Caro Bene" (Secchi), "Frühlingsglaube" (Schubert), "Hyperions Schicksalslied" (Wolff), "Botschaft" (Brahms), which comprised group one, and the "Mignon" aria, "Non conosci il bel suol" (Thomas), "Before the Crucifix" and "To a Messenger" (La Forge), "Komm lass uns spielen" (Bleichmann). E. Romayne Simmons was Miss Sovereign's accompanist.

That the singing of Cuyler Black won the hearty approval of his listeners showed by the encores demanded. He was heard in the following: Aria from "I Pagliacci" (Leoncavallo), "Love Is Mine" (Gartner), "'Tis Snowing" (Bemberg) and "Come to the Garden, Love" (Salter).

This was an auspicious opening musicale of the club, an unusually large number being present.

The following served on the reception committee: Mrs. Alfred W. Cochran, chairman; Mrs. Robert H. Rucker, assistant; Mrs. Simon Baruch, Jessie Drew Beale, Mrs. Elmer E. Black, Mrs. Henry Smock Boice, Mrs. Laurence B. Braine, Mrs. John J. Brown, Mrs. William Grant Brown, Mrs. Frank G. Burke, Mrs. R. F. Cartwright, Mrs. Walter Gray Crump, Mrs. W. W. Ford, Mrs. Theodore P. Gilman, Mrs. Morrison Gilmour, Mrs. Hartwell B. Grubbs, Florence Guernsey, Mrs. G. B. Howe, Mrs. Arthur H. Leary, Mrs. Junius N. Love, Mrs. Walter H. McIlroy, Mrs. Minor C. Smith, Mrs. Charles E. Sprague, Mrs. Thomas Sloane Young, Mrs. Darwin W. Truss, Mrs. Dudley van Holland, Mrs. Edward W. van Wagenen, Mrs. J. L. Weinert, Mrs. Minthorne Woolsey.

Following are the officers and committees of the club: President, Mrs. William Rogers Chapman; vice-presidents, Mrs. Eugene Hoffman Porter, Mrs. Samuel J. Kramer, Mrs. Samuel Lane Gross; recording secretary, Mrs. Alexander H. Candlish; corresponding secretary and treasurer, Mary Jordan Baker; directors, Mrs. John Hudson Storer, Mrs. Charles F. Terhune, Helen Barrett, Mrs. George Walter Newton, Mrs. W. H. H. Amerman; musical director, William Rogers Chapman; committee for afternoon musicales, Mrs. Eugene Hoffman Porter, chairman, Mrs. T. P. Gilman, assistant, Mrs. G. P. Benjamin, Mrs. George T. Colter, at the door; Mrs. Elias S. Osbon, treasurer; Jean S. Taylor, secretary; Belle D. Chambers, Mrs. Stoddard, Miss S. S. Boice, assistants; introduction, Mrs. J. W. Hedden, chairman; hostesses, Mrs. Geo. H. Danforth, Mrs. Maurice B. Dean, Mrs. L. H. Fechheimer, Mrs. W. Otis Fredenburg, Mrs. John Gilbert Gulick, Mrs. Gustavus A. Humphreys, Mrs. Charles R. Jung, Mrs. F. E. Kavanagh, Mrs. John W. King, Mrs. Louis E. Manley, Mrs. Otto Mattes, Mrs. T. M. O'Connor, Laura E. Ray, Mrs. F. G. Rendall, Mrs. W. L. Scrymser, Mrs. Upton Slingluff, Mrs. Carl A. Spilker, Mrs. W. H. Van Tassell, Mrs. W. H. Van Winkle, Mrs. Geo. L. Walker; ushers, Mrs. John H. Storer, chairman, Mrs. Wright B. Haff, Mrs. Whitman C. Haff, assistants, Dorothy Avery, Madeline Clark, Enid Clute, Florence O. Demarest, Marion Fitch, Winifred Goldsmith, Louie Johnson, Sylvia Mattes, Helen McKinley, Minette Paine, Evelyn Peck, Dorothy Pirnie, Anita Reed, Martha Reed, Lillian Reeve, Emma C. Reichmann, Ethel Rowe, Amy Schaefer, Helen Schreiber, Edith Spolders, Helen Tower, Virginia Tyler, Cora Young, Elsie Weser, Miss Weser.

A Montclair Recital.

An attractive recital was given for the benefit of the Brookdale Reformed Church of Upper Montclair, N. J., by Edna and Elizabeth Harris, on November 20. The program consisted of two readings, "The Lost Word" (H. Van Dyke), "When Men Propose" (M. Cooke), by Edna Harris, and three groups of songs, by Elizabeth Harris, soprano. Four old English songs were the opening group, which was followed by three old Irish songs. The final group consisted of five modern American songs by Lohr, Lehmann, Bartlett, Ware and Spross.

A fashionable audience of music lovers heard this program with evident appreciation, which was shown by enthusiastic applause.

A German-Catholic Maennerchor Concert.

The German-Catholic Maennerchor of Brooklyn, under the direction of Franz Gross, gave one of its regular concerts on Sunday evening, November 22, at Arion Hall, Brooklyn. On this occasion the chorus was assisted by the recently organized Woman's Chorus, this being the first public performance in which it took part. The program was made up of five chorus and five orchestral numbers played by the assisting orchestra. Both of these choruses are well trained and demonstrate that they have some excellent voices among their ranks. A large audience was in attendance and the entire program was enthusiastically received.

Katharine Goodson with Scottish Orchestra.

Owing to the cancellation of numerous dates on the Continent, Katharine Goodson was enabled to accept engagements with the Scottish Orchestra to appear on November 9, in Edinburgh, at the first concert in the Messrs. Paterson's series, and on November 10, in Glasgow, at the concert of the Glasgow Choral and Orchestral Union. On both occasions she was heard in two concertos, playing the Saint-Saëns in G minor in the first part, and the Liszt in E flat in the second part of the program.

A Flonzaley Concert.

At its first subscription concert in Aeolian Hall Monday evening, December 7, the Flonzaley Quartet will play the Tschaikowsky quartet in E flat, op. 30, two movements from the string quartet of Darius Milhaud, and the Beethoven quartet in D major, op. 18, No. 6.

Joseph Pizzarello, whose vocal studio is at Carnegie Hall, New York, has returned from Paris and Nice and reports bright prospects for a good season.

FRIEDA HEMPEL ENGAGED FOR NEWARK FESTIVAL.

Noted Coloratura Soprano to Sing on "Concert Night," May 6—Local Chorus Growing—Jersey City Singers to Hold First Rehearsal on December 3—Musical Notes.

Newark, N. J., November 23, 1914.

Newark music lovers will be particularly interested in this exclusive announcement of the engagement of Frieda Hempel, coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as one of the soloists for "Concert Night," the last program at the coming three-day music festival. Miss Hempel, who is one of the most popular sopranos of the Metropolitan company, will appear on May 6 on the same program with a celebrated instrumentalist to be selected later, and the local girl vocalist who is to be chosen some time in February.

The list of soloists so far chosen is as follows: "Opera Night," May 4—Pasquale Amato, baritone; Anna Case, soprano; Paul Althouse, tenor. (The contralto soloist has not yet been selected.) "Wagner Night," May 5—Herbert Witherspoon, bass. (The soprano and tenor are to be announced later.) "Concert Night," May 6—Frieda Hempel, coloratura soprano. (The instrumentalist and local girl vocalist have not yet been decided upon.)

Last Wednesday evening, the Newark chorus held its fourth rehearsal in the Central High School, the number of singers present being a record one. Next Wednesday evening, November 25, the rehearsal will occupy only half of the evening, the last hour being devoted to a musical program. Those to appear at this time, and all of whom are members of the Newark chorus, are Mrs. Mollie Ely, contralto soloist of the Third Presbyterian Church; Martha Bowman, elocutionist; Arthur Klein, pianist; Edwin Wickenhoefer, violinist; Millard Robaud, bass soloist of the Third Presbyterian Church, in addition to two or three others. A full attendance is expected.

On December 3, the Jersey City Festival Chorus, which is to unite with Newark at the coming festival, will hold its first rehearsal in the Lincoln High School. Nearly five hundred singers have already joined this chorus, and it is expected the membership will soon reach the five hundred mark. The Jersey City Chorus will meet every Thursday night. Singers desiring to join are asked to send the name, address, part sung (stating if voice is high or low) to the secretary, Jessie Lockhart, 17 Brinkerhoff street, Jersey City, or to the office of the association, 593 Broad street, Newark. Membership cards will be mailed upon the receipt of applications.

McCormack Concert.

John McCormack will be heard at the First Regiment Armory tomorrow night, November 24. He will be assisted by Donald McBeath, violinist, and Edwin Schneider, accompanist.

Orange Benefit Concert.

An evening of song for the benefit of the Red Cross Fund (Belgian women and children) drew a representative audience to the Orange Woman's Club, on Friday evening last. Elinor Castle, soprano, was the principal soloist and delighted her hearers with a delightful program. She was ably assisted by Katherine Burritt Deming, contralto.

Music Notes.

An interesting musicale, under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society of the South Park Presbyterian Church, is to be given on Friday evening, December 11. The program promises to be an unusually delightful one, for the soloists are all well known in Newark and the Oranges. Those to appear are: Ethel Cecilia Smith, violinist; Catherine Bryce, soprano; Mary Potter, contralto; Margaret C. Drake, elocutionist, and Mildred Steele Allen, pianist. All but Miss Drake are members of the Newark Musicians' Club.

This afternoon in the hall of the Woman's Club, of the Oranges, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, and his wife, Clara Clemens Gabrilowitsch, contralto, will give a recital.

Under the direction of Louis Arthur Russell, a chorus selected from members of the Schubert Society will give a concert in the Temple B'nai Jeshurun tonight, November 3.

The Arion Singing Society will give the first concert of this season's series in Krueger Auditorium, on December 7. The soloists will be Katherine Eyman, pianist, and Paul Petry, tenor.

The interesting announcement has just been made that nearly all of the subscriptions for the course of two concerts of the Newark Symphony Orchestra, to be held in Wallace Hall, are now in. The first concert will be held on February 18.

At the regular meeting of the Music Study Club on Thursday morning last, the following soloists were heard: Bessie Colt, Jeannette Mulliken, Mary Bradin, Suzanne Bowen, Pauline Scarborough, Caroline Seiler, Mme. Tozier, and Katherine Eyman, assisted by Mildred Steele Allen.

Miriam Arndt-Ardini, soprano, will give a recital in Wallace Hall, on Tuesday night, December 8.

On December 2, in Wallace Hall, a vocal and piano recital will be given by Mr. and Mrs. Paul Petri.

The first concert of the Orpheus Club will be held in Wallace Hall on December 10.

On December 11, the second artist concert will be held in the Eliot Street School.

Ethel Cecilia Smith, violinist, will be one of the soloists at a concert to be given in the Lincoln School auditorium, East Orange, on Wednesday evening next.

Aida Dolinsky, a Parsons Artist-Pupil.

Aida Dolinsky played for Rafael Joseffy when she was in her fifteenth year. He advised her to study with Albert Ross Parsons, to whom Joseffy warmly commended her as showing remarkable talent. After two years with Mr. Parsons she began to play in public. Her playing of

AIDA DOLINSKY,
A Parsons' artist-pupil.

Clementi's forgotten sonata, "Didone Abbandonate," was a revelation to a critical audience of the dramatic power and beauty of the neglected work.

In 1912 the Musical Courier said: "Here is a young girl who has extraordinary technical facility, and this technic is crystalline. Besides, there is the gift of musical interpretation, and Mr. Parsons has indicated the path with such lucidity that she is working in the light. The playing of Bach and Liszt is an excellent basis on which to render judgment. This is the kind of teaching that requires no treatment in Europe." In April, 1914, the Musical Courier said: "The magnificant Beethoven sonata was played with much expression by Aida Dolinsky. This little lady will bring great credit to Mr. Parsons. Verve and finish are hers, as well as an understanding of tonal values."

Klibansky Artist-Pupils Sing.

Lalla B. Cannon and J. M. Sternhagen have been engaged for a series of four concerts in December, under the direction of the Music League of the People's Institute, New York City. G. A. Lehman, first bass and director of the Bluffton College Quartet, has been engaged for concerts in Wadsworth, Ohio, Philadelphia, Allentown, Boyertown, Bally, Schwenksville, Upper Milford, West Swamp, Quakertown and Sonderton, returning to Bluffton for a concert at College Chapel on December 7.

Jean Vincent Cooper is now under the management of R. E. Johnston.

At the new Chickering Hall, Lord & Taylor's, Fifth avenue, New York, November 16, artist pupils of Mr. Klibansky united in a concert of nine numbers. The young artists, who greatly pleased a large audience, were Lalla B. Cannon, Arabel Marfield, Marie L. Wagner, Jean Vincent and Mr. Williams. Alice M. Shaw played accompaniments.

"How many hours a day do you devote to exercises?"

"Half an hour to dumbbells, one hour to scales and arpeggios and three minutes to prayers."

New York College of Music and New York German Conservatory of Music Faculty Concert.

Carnegie Hall, New York, was filled with a fine audience Friday evening, November 20, on the occasion of the faculty concert given by the various specialists in the faculties of the affiliated musical institutions, the New York College of Music, and the New York German Conservatory of Music, Carl Hein and August Fraemcke, directors. The soloists, instrumental and vocal, were assisted by an orchestra of sixty first class players. Under the skilled direction of Carl Hein they played the opening "Phedre" overture and the closing scene from "Geist der Woiwoden," by Friedmann, receiving considerable applause; the orchestra earned it also for various accompaniments the collaboration in the concerted numbers of the evening.

William Ebann, cellist, was the first solo player, giving Davidoff's concerto in thoroughly musicianly manner. Emma Loeffler, soprano, sang the "Tannhäuser" aria; her lovely voice has a bell-like quality, and she displayed artistic interpretation and use of it, winning resounding applause. August Fraemcke played the Schytte piano concerto; he is a thorough master of his art, and draws from the piano a beautiful singing legato tone, with plenty of warmth and brilliancy when demanded. Persistent applause followed his playing, but, like the other artists, he refrained from giving an encore. Harriet Behnee, mezzo-soprano, sang the aria from Beethoven's only opera, "Fidelio," in a voice of unusual range and power. She was presented with a beautiful sheath bouquet of chrysanthemums. Theodore Spiering played the Bruch concerto in G minor for violin, most admirably, displaying always a pure tone and a technic, surmounting all difficulties; especially was the closing movement brilliantly performed.

The two institutions, which are under the artistic and business guidance of Messrs. Hein and Fraemcke, rejoice in large patronage, and are continually in the public eye through the holding of faculty and students' concerts. The various affairs given by them, both in Carnegie Hall and at the hall of the College of Music, 128-30 East Fifty-eighth street, are always noted in the columns of the musical press. The German Conservatory of Music, at 306 Madison avenue, occupies quarters specially fitted for it, with sound-proof walls. This location, between Forty-first and Forty-second streets, is most convenient for subway patrons, as well as for a large contingent of New Jersey people. Regarding the instruction given, the best known judges, both native and foreign, are always ready to call it superior. Concerning the aims and methods of the two institutions, the directors say:

"Rather more than thirty-seven years have come and gone since the institutions were founded. During that time they have gone forward, developing musical taste, moulding musical talent and making such headway, that we feel they can stand alone on their merits without any praise or eloquence on our part. Both institutions have been aided and encouraged in their work by the support of the ever widening class which takes an interest in music. In this the directors and trustees see much more than the assurance of the approval with which their labors and their aims have been regarded, they see inducements and incentives to new efforts, together with the hope of further success. Every care will be taken to maintain the high standard of the conservatories and to keep pace with musical progress. Being equipped with a corps of trained teachers following a thoroughly systematized course of instruction and admitting only the highest grade of music, there are no agencies doing more excellent work in promoting genuine musical culture.

"Free and partial scholarships for the ensuing year have been awarded to talented and deserving pupils who were unable to pay the regular tuition rates. In this respect much good has been done, and to further this worthy cause the proceeds from the sale of reserved seats for the faculty concert will be applied toward the fund set aside for this purpose."

People's Symphony Club Concert.

The second chamber concert of the People's Symphony Auxiliary Club, at Washington Irving High School, New York, Saturday evening, November 28, will introduce the Hartley-Pilzer-Sperandi Trio, a combination of piano, horn and violin. They will play the Brahms trio in E flat. Several solo numbers are also included in the program. A large audience is assured, as the club membership is nearly sold out to the capacity of the hall.

Zoellner Quartet Plans.

Due to a Pacific Coast tour, the Zoellner Quartet will give only one New York concert this season, and this will take place at Aeolian Hall on Sunday evening, December 13.

Marcella Craft Approved by Home State.

Marcella Craft, the American soprano, who has been winning fame at the Munich Royal Opera House for the past five years, is now singing in her native State, California. The enthusiasm of the California press is illustrated by the following notices from the Los Angeles newspapers:

Marcella Craft last night at Trinity Auditorium passed successfully through the most trying ordeal of her brilliant career—the task of facing a "home town" audience. To be sure, Riverside claims the distinction of calling Miss Craft its own, but Los Angeles, in the role of the big brother, usurps the lawful claimant, and what can Riverside do about it?

Since she left Los Angeles, say a dozen years ago, Miss Craft has scored so many triumphs, especially in that most critieal of mnsic centers, Munieh, that one is inclined to expect from her the impossible, and it was a decidedly "show me" audience that gathered last night to greet the little Californian.

If one were writing about musical comedy it would be quite the thing to call Miss Craft "the little girl with the big voice," for her physique impresses one as being inadequate for the tremendous numbers on her program. Yet it is in the most difficult, most exacting selections that she reaches the zenith of her power, causing one to marvel at the clarity and volume of voice coming from so apparently frail a form.

It was the real Marcella Craft who took Italy, France and Germany by storm and won the personal friendship of the Kaiserin, in the "Butterfly" suite, for the role is one of her best, and the audience unbent in a manner that must have delighted the singer.

It was the "Butterfly" numbers and the pair from "The Secret of Suzanne" which were most eagerly awaited, for Miss Craft had been heralded as second to none in them, but her whole program showed an admirable taste in selection and contained many unexpected and delightful features.

There were the two numbers, "Exaltation" and "Song of Love," by Mrs. Beach, for example, which took immensely, while the Italian numbers, from Gluck, Scarlatti and Giordano, proved quite a bit more popular than her four German lieder. All, however, were generously applauded, and the flowers with which the little Californian was showered were only outnumbered by the encores she was compelled to give in return for the appreciation of probably the most unsympathetie and skeptical audience she ever faced.—Los Angeles Daily Times, November 13, 1914.

Some—how many? Why only a few—years ago, Frank Miller, of Riverside, headed six other interested men of that city in providing means for the musical instruction of a little girl there named Marcella Craft.

For the past five years Miss Craft has been the leading lyric soprano at the Royal Opera House in Munich and Mr. Miller recently heard her sing there to a house bedecked with the nobility of family and of intellect of the country.

She sang last night at Trinity Auditorium, opening the Behymer Philharmonic season.

A song recital is a very poor medium for judging a diva; ballads have their charm of beauty, but the great singer should have the accessories of stage settings and emotional operatic surroundings to bring out combined greatness of drama and voice; Miss Craft, though, can well afford to rest her standing on a concert, for the young woman reeks with dramatic power; she has a quality of personal detachment, gracious lack of consciousness of herself, and in the simplest songs she implants a throbbing sense of proportion that places drama in every tone.

Her first group was four ancient Italian songs, all tender, simple in effect, but tremendously intricate in voice requirements; all were sung with marked beauty and momentary delight of expression; two were particularly effective, "Se Florindo e Fedele" and "Caro Mio Ben."

Miss Craft was so applauded that she responded with a little song that had all the carcless lilt and emotion of a Neapolitan street song, which quite enchanted the audience; not alone by the charm of tone and expression, but as well by the spontaneous acting that accompanied the singing.

A couple of American songs and four German lieder were all delightful, though not comparable to what followed when she gave two arias from "The Secret of Suzanne" (Wolf-Ferrari), and four from "Madame Butterfly."

Then we understood her great vogue in Europe, for she was then the artist of song and action; there was nothing of operatic acting, but Miss Craft has that incomparable faculty of merging herself mentally and thereby to a degree, physically, in her singing; there she was Butterfly herself, with no kimono costume, no aroma of cherry Blossoms, no Japanese atmosphere of scene, no mise en scene.

This is bewildering, for her voice is indubitably purely lyrical and the domination of her power must rest on her temperamental vigor.

Reviewers elsewhere have compared her to Sembrich and Eames and Patti; she is not any of them; she is herself; no diva ever has been great or ever will be by being like any predecessor; but still the comparison to Patti can be made in that Miss Craft possesses the same innate vivacity of comprehension, the same brilliancy of combined thought and sound that made Patti incomparable; those of us unfortunately old enough to be fortunate enough to recall Patti when she was the real Patti feel sure there will never be another like voice, but we can enjoy Miss Craft quite as much with her complete reviving of the same thrills that were formerly aroused by the great voice that now is not.—Los Angeles Examiner, November 13, 1914. New Work for a Pianist's Fingers.

Jean Verd, the young Parisian pianist and teacher, is shown in the accompanying picture in his hospital uniform busily engaged in knitting woolen neck mufflers for the French soldiers. M. official military hospitals, where he is on duty every night and where his intimate knowledge of the English language has enabled him to be of great assistance. To while away the tedium of the long hours before dawn, he learned knitting, and his fingers are now nearly as expert with the needles as on the keyboard.

Anna Baugher to Tour.

Among the younger American contraltos, Anna Baugher is destined to win a high place, for not only has she been trained thoroughly for recital, oratorio, and concert work by so accomplished a teacher as David Melamet, of Baltimore, but also Miss Baugher's public career has resulted so far in an unbroken list of successes, as testified to by the applause of her audiences, the praise of the newspaper critics, and reengagements from the local managements under whose auspices her appearances were made.

Miss Baugher made some of her most striking hits in New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore. In the last named city she took part last year in the "Faust" performance of the Melamet opera class and sang the part of Martha with notable results. The MUSICAL COURIER wrote of her at the time: "She evinced unusual command of stage routine and her rich contralto sounded to great advantage."

In New York, Miss Baugher made a decided impression at the New Assembly concerts in the Plaza Hotel. "Handsome of person and possessing luscious tones and animated interpretation she sang so well that she might have given several encores" was written of her on that occasion. As a member of the Philadelphia Quartet, Miss Baugher won this tribute on one occasion: "She was most artistic in her rendering of the alto part. Her voice is a rich, warm contralto of good range, her upper tones being particularly sweet and beautiful. Her charming stage presence, also, is no mean asset toward her success." Other newspaper encomiums refer to the singer's "organlike tone," "fine voice," "real authority and delightful spirit," "distinctive art," "beautiful renditions," "grand success," "expressive timbre," etc.

Miss Baugher has a large collection of explicitly flattering press notices, some of which will be published in full in the MUSICAL COURIER shortly.

Possessed of magnetic personality and an exceptional degree of temperament besides being gifted with voice and singing art, Anna Baugher should find her road to wide fame neither a long nor a difficult one, especially as she has placed herself under the able direction of Foster & Foster, who now are booking an extensive tour for her.

Dufault's Australian Notices.

Appended appears the prelude to a series of press notices contained in a folder issued by Paul Dufault, referring to his trip to Australia and published by him:

There is the greatest pleasure in recording the extraordinary successes of Paul Dufault in the Southern hemisphere, since they grew from purest merit, and without advance proclamations. It can safely be said that no male singer, who has visited this country, has been so immediately recognized and so universally appreciated as this great dramatic tenor. Coming here last year with Mme. de Cisneros, Dufault achieved a sensational success, which has been even eclipsed on his recent tour with Mme. Nordica, where his triumphs have been so unequalled and he has won such tremendous acclaim from both press and public, that all music lovers will welcome the announcement that he is to make a tour of Australasia at the head of his own company.

Paul Dufault occupies a niche distinctively his own among the well known concert and operatic singers of this generation. Although admirably fitted for an operatic career, he has refused many tempting offers, preferring to devote his life to the more interesting work of the concert platform. His voice is a pure tenor of superb quality, and even the most captious critic fails to find fault with his method and art, while his stage presence and manner are wholly fine.

Dufault's work is the acme of vocal art, and he sings with rare dramatic fervor. His fine impassioned utterances create a sort of dramatic atmosphere, and convert his songs into a vivid tone painting. No matter how widely divergent the moods of his progress may run, Dufault is yet able always to present the work in hand convincingly, hence his audiences are held in the hollow of his hand, and tears and smiles are brought at will.

Elise Kutcherra in New York.

Elise Kutcherra well known as an operatic soprano, who some years ago sang in America, has arrived in New York.

Martha S. Steele Appreciated.

On Thursday evening, October 29, Martha S. Steele, the contralto, gave a varied and interesting program before the Philharmonic Society, of Somerset, Pa. Her program was made up of five selections by American composers, two groups of songs in German, one in English and the aria from Goring Thomas' "Nadeschda," "Oh, My Heart is Weary," completed her program. She held the attention of her audience from the first song and admiration for her singing increased with each number. Mrs. Steele is continually meeting with success, as may be seen from the following press notices, which refer to her appearance at Somerset, Pa.:

Mrs. Steele has a voice of unusual power and flexibility. The singer was at her best in the aria, "Oh, My Heart Is Weary," by Goring Thomas.—Somerset (Pa.) Herald.

Martha S. Steele, the contralto, of Pittsburgh, pleased our people most thoroughly. A return engagement will be welcomed by the concert goers.—Somerset (Pa.) Standard.

Martha S. Steele's magnificent dramatic alto voice responded most beautifully to the wide range of songs on the program. Her interpretation, ranging from the old song, "Lungi dal Caro Bene," by Secchi, to the more modern songs, as "In the Time of Roses," by Reichardt, was beyond criticism. But special mention should be made of her singing, "Die Lorelei," by Liszt, which was most dramatically and artistically sung, and likewise the Schumann song, "Ich grolle nicht," was given in full effective outburst of woe and despair. Her German enunciation and diction is that of a master.—Somerset (Pa.) Democrat.

Bauer to Play Chopin.

Harold Bauer's all-Chopin program will take place at Aeolian Hall, New York, Saturday afternoon, December 5. The list of selections is as follows:

Etude in C minor, op. 25.
Three Posthumous Etudes.
Fantasia, op. 49.
Sonata, op. 35.
Ballade in F minor.
Ballade in A flat.
Barcarolle.
Nocturne in C minor.
Scherzo in B flat minor.

Chicago Is Proud of Bloomfield Zeisler.

Attached are some press notices relative to Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler's recent Chicago recital:

Mrs. Bloomfield Zeisler clearly is the most popular pianist in Chicago. An audience which attended her first recital of the season given at the Illinois Theatre yesterday demonstrated that exhilarating circumstance to her, not only by packing the building with as many people as apparently could be stuffed into it, but by applauding louder and longer than any other pianist had been applauded there before. . . .

The program that was set forth stood well within the border line of a conservative attitude toward the newer manifestations of art. Mrs. Zeisler—if she is to be judged by her tastes as they were disclosed in the selection of her pieces—is apparently a reactionist. Not for her has the excellent Mr. Debussy molded strange creations in his laboratory of sound. Not for her the curious experiments of Ravel, of Scriabine, of Erik Satie. The pianist's most courageous excursion into modernity did not carry her further than a presentation of a composition by Mr. Paderewski, and for the greater part of her program Mrs. Zeisler intrenched herself behind the bulwarks of Beethoven and Frederic Chopin.

The recital giver drew from the literature of Beethoven the second of the six minuets which, written by that master for piano, has been popularized in the form of an arrangement for violin, and she was heard also in the so called "Sonata Appassionata." Having made previously a careful calculation as to the amount of time which it would be necessary to spend at the two other concerts of the afternoon in order to arrive at Mrs. Zeisler's performance after she had disposed of one of Beethoven's most hackneyed compositions, I was led by enthusiasm for the pianist's admirable art to discover the Illinois Theatre too soon. Mrs. Zeisler was still engaged in unfolding the oft repeated message of the sonata; she had not indeed proceeded further than the slow movement of it.

It appeared that the interpreter of the work by Beethoven also was rather tired of it. Mrs. Zeisler's playing of the notes was admirable, to be sure, but it did not carry the listener to the empyrean. Of different quality was the performance of a group of works by Chopin. In this, loveliness of tone and poetry of feeling made the player's offering one of fascinating charm. A more imaginative reading of the first of the five mazurkas, op. 7, of two etudes from op. 10 and of the familiar C sharp minor valse could not have been desired. Beautiful, too, was the playing of the F minor ballade—a work which too long has been neglected by pianists.

Paderewski's theme and variations was well worth performing as well as the concert giver performed it. Not a great masterpiece, the composition is melodious and brilliantly written for the instrument. Mr. Paderewski has played it here, but not with the restraint nor with the perfect execution that was put into it by Mrs. Zeisler. Brilliant, too, was the execution of the paraphrase of the "Beautiful Blue Danube" made by Schulz-Evler; but that composition is considerably too long.—Chicago Herald, November 16, 1914.

For the first time in many seasons, the great pianist, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, announces two recital appearances here. The first took place at the Illinois yesterday; the second will not come until the end of March, and, if it is at all comparable to that of yesterday, it will be one of the notable musical events of the season.

It would seem that the more seasons this superwoman of the piano appears in public the more fire she puts into her performances. Most of her playing yesterday was inspiring, some of it was of the kind that leaves the hearer breathless. Her program contained nothing new; it was entirely of the conservative, safe and sane order, but there is a vast difference between these familiar pieces as Mrs. Zeisler plays them and as other pianists play them.

The big "Appassionata" sonata by Beethoven could not be heard; the Chopin group following it was ideally lovely. For a conclusion there was a revel in virtuosity for its own sake, and a constant appearance of the Schulz-Evler paraphrase of the "Blue Danube" waltz, which glittered so brilliantly that one could almost forget its essential worthlessness as music. Following the program there were several encores.

The measure of a great pianist lies not in the number of false notes struck—there were a few yesterday—but in what he has to say and how he says it. Mrs. Zeisler says big things in a big way. She even gives an air of plausibility to the numbers which have nothing but display in their makeup. In many cases she makes them sound better than they are.—Chicago Journal, November 16, 1914.

In the afternoon the Chicago pianist, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, delighted a large audience at the Illinois Theatre with a program in which Chopin and Beethoven were most prominent. She displayed her chief characteristic, which is to read a composition as no one else would read it, but nevertheless compel her audience to believe and stoutly maintain that her conception and execution are the only ones possible for that particular piece, that all other performers have missed the idea of the composer and instead have borrowed from their own unworthiness.

The Beethoven menuet in G major was thus played, with a lofty disdain for those sections of it on which lesser artists are wont to lavish close attention, and with an exaggeration of feeling that actually put humor into the stately tread of the dance. A wonderfully clear reading of the "Appassionata" sonata followed the menuet, and then Beethoven made way for Chopin. Mme. Zeisler's comprehension of Chopin is less warm than it is intelligent. As encores she played the Strauss waltz, "Blue Danube," and the "Marche Militaire."—Chicago Daily News, November 16, 1914.

Enthusiasm, refinement of style and technical mastery were some of the distinguishing traits of Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler's piano recital yesterday afternoon at the Illinois Theatre before a large and appreciative audience.

Mrs. Bloomfield Zeisler, of whom Chicago is justly proud, has always a potent and interesting musical message to deliver at her recitals, and with every year there is an added power, a stronger personal appeal, a clearer and more faithful interpretation in the selections which she presents from the master works of piano literature.

Oft repeated hearings of the "Appassionata" sonata of Beethoven, of the F minor ballade, and the C major and C minor etudes by Chopin, of the Schulz-Evler arrangement of Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz, impress one not only with the musical value of these works, but also with the artistic presentment which they receive at the hands of this gifted pianist.

The sonata of Beethoven was rendered with a great variety of dynamic shadings, and the ballade of Chopin was made not only [illegible] important, but also dramatically significant.

There were also selections by Schubert, Paderewski and Schleezer on the program, which won much applause of the listeners.—Chicago Examiner, November 16, 1914.

Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler did what was expected of her yesterday afternoon by giving a popular recital without making inartistic concessions to popular taste. Most of the numbers on the program at that are the same which have been hacked at by music students for years; a fact which added to the pleasure of the recital. It is always a joy to hear familiar things played extremely well.

One is always hearing about Mme. Zeisler's lack of emotionalism. It has become a kind of habit to say that she is an intellectual, that she does not develop fire. The saying would not have been valid for the "Appassionata" sonata.

Six Chopin numbers quite disposed of it. Five were on the program. The sixth, the "minute" waltz, was played as an encore. The seventh etude, op. 10, she was compelled to repeat.—Chicago Tribune, November 16, 1914. (Advertisement.)

A Cadman Tribute to Donaldson.

Gay Donaldson, baritone, whose work at the Euclid Avenue Baptist Church, Cleveland, Ohio, is well known to readers of the MUSICAL COURIER, justly deserves the tribute which was given him by Charles Wakefield Cadman. That musician and composer said: "The work of Gay Donaldson is thoroughly artistic and of high calibre. In addition to his vividly interpretative powers, Mr. Donaldson is endowed with a broad musicianship which is an important reinforcement to his vocal equipment. He is a singer that any critical body can rely upon and his work should take him into the best musical circles of the land."

Press opinions are herewith presented:

Gay Donaldson has won himself an enviable place here as a worthy singer. He has a resonant baritone voice which somehow, somewhere, he has learned to use in a masterly manner. And whether in ringing volume, as in his "Invictus," in variety of mood as in the "Pagliacci" prologue, or in tender pathos, as in Homer's "Uncle Remus," he seems equally at home.—Youngstown (Ohio) Indicator.

Mr. Donaldson, who has a good voice, knows how to use it and sings with rare expression. He is most convincing and sings with splendid vocal effect. In climaxes and the more powerful passages his voice is compelling.—Pittsburgh Leader.

Mr. Donaldson is a baritone of rare qualities. His voice is vibrant and possessed of unusual power, but yet capable of subdued tones of charming timbre.—Canton (Ohio) Repository.

Mr. Donaldson has two valuable assets to a musical career, a voice of luscious quality and richness and great volume, and a very easy and charming stage presence.—Akron (Ohio) Times.

Mr. Donaldson possesses a rare and beautiful voice.—Warren (Ohio) Chronicle.

Mr. Donaldson is the possessor of a splendid, highly cultivated voice, which he uses at all times with artistic discrimination. His easy grace and fine appearance on the stage and delivery show him to be an artist of real merit.—Steubenville (Ohio) Gazette.

Zoe Fulton's Nicklausse.

Zoe Fulton, the Pittsburgh contralto, was accorded these encomiums by the press of her home city following her appearance as Nicklausse in "The Tales of Hoffmann," performed there by the Aborn Opera Company:

Zoe Fulton in the role of Nicklausse maintained the standard of singing which prevailed during the night.—Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph.

Zoe Fulton as Nicklausse, the poet's friend, quite outshone him. She was a satisfaction to the eye and sang the role in a smooth, rich voice well suited to the part. Her acting was free from self consciousness. Miss Fulton, who was formerly with the Aborn Company, but is at present a resident of Pittsburgh, is filling a number of engagements with the company during this local season.—Pittsburgh Post.

One of the features of the performance was the singing and acting of Nicklausse, Hoffmann's friend, interpreted by Zoe Fulton, contralto, of Pittsburgh. Miss Fulton's voice is of beautiful quality, her tones full and round and her singing always sure. She enacted her part with spirit and a fine poise.—Pittsburgh Sun.

Zoe Fulton made a fine impression by her singing of Nicklausse, Hoffmann's companion.—Pittsburgh Dispatch. (Advertisement.)

From Wellington, New Zealand.

Wellington, N. Z., October 12, 1914.

The many American artists who have visited in New Zealand in recent years will be interested to learn what a change has come over the capital city of New Zealand as the result of the Armageddon in Europe. The air is full of music here, but it is mostly "It's a Long Way to Tipperary," which is most popular with the troopers, "God Save" and the inflammatory "Marseillaise." This week we are to hear Walter Kirby, who gives us a personal assurance that he is one of the greatest tenors, and really believes it. When he whispers "Aren't my top notes lovely?" you have to agree with him. If you did not he would burst out crying. Still Kirby, who is a well known "at home" singer in London, has a very beautiful lyric tenor voice, of singularly pure and limpid quality. Melba is still piping up for the empire in Australia and raising thousands like the dear old witch she is. At a recent concert in Sydney she sold by auction a number of bright new farthings—a rare coin in these parts—and they fetched big prices as souvenirs. One Samuel Hordern paid as high as £10 ($50) for one of those glittering quarter pennies.

The Royal Choral Society are to sing Coleridge-Taylor's cantata, "A Tale of Old Japan," next month. We are keen on the late negro composer out here, but his "Tale" is not to be mentioned in the same breath as his "Song of Hiawatha," where music is wedded to words in perfection.

Following the policy of America we are to have a big revival of the Gilbert-Sullivan operas, possibly at Christmas, by a specially organized English company imported by Williamson, Ltd. Among its members, as leading contralto, is a Wellington girl, Ethel Morrison (formerly Ettie Maginnity), who originally played most of the parts here with the amateurs. HARCUS PLIMMER.

Stanley and Harrison in Pittsburgh.

Pittsburgh, Pa., November 21, 1914.

Last evening the Art Society of Pittsburgh gave its second concert of the season at Carnegie Music Hall, and an audience that completely filled the hall heard Helen Stanley, soprano, and Theodore Harrison, baritone, sing a well arranged and most exacting program.

Harold Osborn Smith accompanied.

Miss Stanley is probably just as great a favorite in concert as in opera, and her success on this occasion was shown by the applause and the demand for numerous encores. Miss Stanley's flexibility of voice and her interpretative ability showed to the best advantage. She was especially enjoyed in her lieder group. Harold Osborn Smith's "The Place of Dreams" was well received and necessitated the composer's acknowledgment of the applause and a repetition of the song was demanded of Miss Stanley. Charles Wakefield Cadman's "Call Me No More" was finely sung and, of course, particularly well received, as Pittsburgh was formerly Cadman's home.

Theodore Harrison is gifted with a baritone voice, which has good resonant quality. He was enjoyed mostly in his Italian songs and as an encore following this group he sang Schumann's "Frühlingsnacht," which brought forth much applause; in fact, following each group it was necessary for Mr. Harrison to add encores. His program was well arranged, showing careful thought, and the audience plainly showed that he will be sure of a welcome when he again sings here.

Mr. Smith, as usual, accompanied with excellence.

The program was as follows: "Lungi" (Gallone), "O Cessate di piagarmi" (Scarlatti), "Che Fiero Costume" (Legrenzi), Mr. Harrison; aria de Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue" (Debussy), Miss Stanley; "Der Neugierige" (Schubert), "Biterolf" (Wolf), "Am Sonntag Morgen" (Brahms), "Botschaft" (Brahms), Mr. Harrison; "Nachtigall" (Brahms), "Wie Melodien" (Brahms), "Ständchen" (Brahms), "Nacht" (Strauss), "Cæcile" (Strauss), Miss Stanley; "Wind and Lyre" (Harriet Ware), "A Winter Song" (Rogers), "When the Roses Bloom" (Louise Reichardt), "A Birthday" (Cowen), Mr. Harrison; "The Hour Glass" (Burleigh), "Down in the Forest" (by request) (Ronald), "The Place of Dreams" (dedicated to Miss Stanley) (Smith), "Call Me No More" (Cadman) Miss Stanley; duet from "Pagliacci" (Silvio and Nedda) (Leoncavallo), Miss Stanley and Mr. Harrison.

J. ALBERT RIKER.

Jonas' Work Here.

There is no doubt but that the European war will benefit the standard of music in this country permanently. Already many important musical people have come to this country, some of whom will be sure to remain. Among those who have arrived is Alberto Jonas, the piano pedagogue, who, however, intends to be here only temporarily, but during that time he will personally conduct a special normal class for piano teachers, in which the principles and the system of his teaching will be imparted theoretically and practically, and the successful students will receive certificates at the end of the course.

Mr. Jonas has brought out a number of successful piano virtuosos and his pupils during his stay in Berlin have come from all parts of the globe, some of whom have now followed him to New York. Under ordinary circumstances Mr. Jonas would not have been here during the season unless he had been engaged for a tour of concerts. That is how the war benefits us musically.

Marguerite Dunlap Bookings.

Marguerite Dunlap, the contralto, who is under the management of Gertrude F. Cowen, will make her next appearance at Yonkers, N. Y., on November 29. Other interesting announcements regarding Miss Dunlap's bookings this season will be made in next week's issue of the MUSICAL COURIER.

Victor Wittgenstein's Recital.

There was a manliness and a sincerity of purpose in the playing of Victor Wittgenstein, who gave his second New York recital at Aeolian Hall on Friday evening, November 20. He gave a program made up of works by standard composers, opening with a group by Brahms, including ballade, op. 10; rhapsodie, op. 79, and cappiccio, op. 76. His second group included Scarlatti's "Presto," played with dash and verve, and Beethoven's third sonata, from op. 31. Of this sonata he gave an interpretation vibrant with delicate passion, which was especially marked in the second movement. Cesar Franck's prelude, aria and finale, which formed his third group, was played with a breadth of dignity and a maturity of conception quite unusual in so young an artist. His fourth group consisted of works by Chopin, including two etudes, the scherzo in B minor and the Liszt arrangement of the "Chante Polonais," while two works of Goldmark and MacDowell's "Etude de Concert" marked the finale of a splendid program splendidly rendered.

It is almost impossible to select any particular number and designate it as the best, for the artist seemed at his best in each selection until the next one was played, when that assumed the first position. Mr. Wittgenstein possesses adequate technic, which, combined with a thoroughly grounded musicianship, makes him an artist who is sure to maintain a high position among the brighter lights of the pianistic world.

His audience was large and very enthusiastic.

Bispham in Sunday Evening Concert.

David Bispham was heard at the Belasco Theatre, New York, Sunday evening, November 22. His selections consisted of two groups to piano accompaniment. Group one was made up of excerpts from the Forest Festival Plays, California, the prologue from "The Atonement of Pan" (Hadley), and the "Flint Song," from the "Cave Man" (McCoy); the second group of Woodman's "I Am Thy Harp," Homer's "The Pauper's Drive," Elbel's "Calm Be Thy Sleep," Gilbert's "The Pirate Song." Ward Stephen's new work "Ecstasy" was sung by the baritone to accompaniment of the Barrère ensemble, with the composer at the piano.

Mr. Bispham's numerous recalls again substantiated his popularity with a New York audience.

The Barrère ensemble furnished the remaining numbers: "Suite in the Olden Style" (new), Hill; "Two Pieces" (new), Chadwick; "Eclogue," Brockway; "Solitude," "Humoresque," Herbert, conducted by the composer.

Mme. Melville-Liszniewska Arrives.

Marguerite Melville-Liszniewska, the Viennese-American pianist and Leschetizky exponent, arrived in New York a week ago from Rotterdam and will make New York her home, spending her time teaching here and (one day each week) in Boston. Mme. Liszniewska has a considerable class of pupils in both cities In addition to her musical work, the pianist also is interested in Red Cross Relief work and has been empowered by Princess Montenuova to accept contributions, especially for the succor of Polish-Galicia. The Princess gave Mme. Liszniewska an official book in which all contributions are to be recorded and donors will receive a formal acknowledgment from the committee in charge.

Mme. Liszniewska has taken a studio in Carnegie Hall, where she teaches twice a week.

CINCINNATI ORCHESTRA PLAYS IN COLUMBUS.

Dr. Kunwald and His Musicians Score Heavily in Ohio Capital City—Marcian Thalberg Makes His First Appearance in This Country as Soloist with Orchestra.

Columbus, Ohio, November 18, 1914.

A splendid program was presented to a large audience in Memorial Hall, Tuesday evening, November 17, on the occasion of the first concert of the season here by the Cincinnati Orchestra, Dr. Ernst Kunwald, conductor. Seldom does a season pass without at least one visit from this organization, which always has something interesting and pleasing to offer, and it is to be doubted if the work of Dr. Kunwald and his player was ever more crowned with success than on this brilliant occasion.

Dr. Kunwald was particularly fortunate in his choice of numbers, the first being "Variations On An Old Norwegian Romance," by Grieg. An interludio by Pierre Tirindelli proved to be a most melodic composition, written mainly for the strings and woodwinds. Mr. Tirindelli is head of the violin department of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, and has written many beautiful things, this interludio being one of his best works.

The symphony chosen was Beethoven's "Eroica," which was given a masterly and sympathetic interpretation. Dr. Kunwald is a great Beethoven exponent, and one can always expect novel and beautiful effects in his treatment of that composer. Especially inspiring was the second movement, "Marche Funebre."

Deep interest was manifested in the appearance of Marcian Thalberg, the Swiss pianist, as soloist. This was Mr. Thalberg's first appearance with orchestra in America, although he has been a resident of this country for two years, being head of the piano department of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music. By special request he performed the Saint-Saëns G minor concerto, which happens to be a favorite here, and scored an instant success. A clean, clear cut technic, prodigious strength and great brilliancy are the chief characteristics of his playing. Mr. Thalberg was tendered quite an ovation and responded by playing a barcarolle by Rubinstein. E. C. B.

Mme. de Pasquali's New York Concert.

An exceedingly attractive and pleasing presence and a wealth of personal magnetism do much to enhance the pleasure of Bernice de Pasquali's singing. The Metropolitan Opera soprano was greeted by a burst of applause from the large and fashionable audience at her appearance on the stage at her recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on Sunday afternoon, November 22. Genuine enthusiasm was aroused by her first aria, a brilliant selection from Thomas' "Hamlet," with much coloratura, which this gifted artist executed with virtuosity and ease. This was followed by a group of classics of the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, selected with a good taste that indicates a wide knowledge of the song literature of that early period and a genuine musicianship. They were charming selections and were rendered with delicacy and finesse and with tone color as well as facial expression closely adhering to the musical and poetic contents. These songs may be said to be novelties in New York and were greeted with much enthusiasm both as compositions and as exhibiting the high quality of the singer's inspiration and skill.

The program contained several numbers with flute obligato, these being "O'Dolce Contento," from the "Magic Flute," and the waltz song by Kohler. But it would be an error to compare the quality of Mme. de Pasquali's voice with the flute, for although she accomplishes all of the customary feats of vocal technic with unexcelled mastery, her voice possesses a wealth and depth which no flute can equal. In the coloratura passages with the flute, the beautiful clarity of the singer's vocal technic was shown.

But her most valuable musical contributions from an artistic standpoint were not these coloratura arias, but the two sets of song selected from modern European and American composers. Of these, particularly worthy of mention were "Rispetto No. 111" (Wolf-Ferrari), "Le Papillon," an exquisite selection of extremely modern tendency by the well known French operatic composer, Felix Fourdrain, and "Wär ich nicht ein Helm auf frischem Wiesengrund" (Tschaikowsky), of which Mme. de Pasquali gave a singularly effective and emotional interpretation. The group of American songs opened with Campbell-Tipton's lovely "Spirit Flower," which is one of the most beautiful songs by any American composer and also one of the best known. This was followed by "The Last Dance," by Harriet Ware, which was so beautifully done that it had to be repeated, the "Persian Serenade," by

BERNICE DE PASQUALI.

J. Francis-Cooke, with a brilliant and difficult cadenza, especially written for Mme. de Pasquali, and MacFadyen's "Spring Singing."

The singer was the recipient of magnificent floral tributes at the end of almost every group, one of these consisting of a tall, tastefully decorated stand, supporting a gilded rustic cage in which was a live canary, symbolical, no doubt, of Mme. de Pasquali's own beautiful vocalization.

Kreisler Arrives in New York.

Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, arrived in New York Tuesday, November 24, on the steamship Rotterdam, and is in good health and spirits.

Wight Neumann at the Illinois Theatre, Sunday afternoon, December 13.

Mr. and Mrs. Theodore S. Bergey presented twenty vocal and piano pupils in recital at the studios of the Bergey Chicago Opera School, Sunday evening, November 15.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra will give another concert next Tuesday afternoon, November 24, under the auspices of the University of Chicago, at Leon Mandel Assembly Hall.

The Spry-Kortschak-Steindel Trio, assisted by Mrs. Clarence Eddy, contralto, and Clarence Eddy, accompanist, will give a program at the Fine Arts Theatre, on Sunday afternoon, December 13.

Alma Gluck will make her only Chicago recital appearance at Orchestra Hall next Sunday afternoon, November 29, under the direction of F. Wight Neumann.

An informal reception to the non-resident pupils of the American Conservatory was tendered by the president and faculty at the Conservatory Assembly Hall, Wednesday afternoon, November 18. Readings by Walton Pyre and vocal selections by Marie S. Zendt contributed much to the enjoyment of the afternoon.

Nikolai Sokoloff, the young Russian violinist, will make his first appearance in Chicago in recital at the Illinois Theatre, Sunday afternoon, December 6, under the direction of F. Wight Neumann.

New Musical Association.

This year has marked the organization of the Middlesex Musical Association, which purposes to give a series of high grade musical offerings during the season at Middletown, Conn., and "to educate the people to a love of the best there is in music." The officers of this association are: G. Ellsworth Meech, president; E. Kent Hubbard, Jr., vice-president; Mrs. Edward G. Camp, vice-president; Laura F. Philbrook, secretary; Harold M. Meech, corresponding secretary; Harold A. Williams, treasurer, and Joseph I. Lawton, assistant treasurer. These officers, together with sixteen other music lovers, make up the governing board.

A chorus has been formed under the direction of Karl P. Harrington, which will give a concert some time in February, assisted by three soloists and an orchestra.

The first concert under the auspices of the association was given by the New York Symphony Orchestra with Felice Lyne, soprano, as soloist, on Monday evening, November 23. The program was made up of selections from the works of Weber, Schumann, Verdi, Liszt, Grainger, Beethoven, Meyerbeer and Goldmark. The second concert is announced for Thursday, January 14, when the soloists will be Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, Valentina Crespi, violinist, and Frank la Forge, pianist. In addition to the concert by the chorus in February, a fourth concert will be given by the Kneisel Quartet on Thursday, March 4, while the series will be completed by an April concert by Mabel Garrison, soprano, and Eleanor Spencer, pianist.

BOSTON HONORS MAJOR HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

Eightieth Birthday of Distinguished Music Patron Fittingly Observed—An Active Week of Concerts and Recitals in the "Hub"—Harvard's New Concert Hall Dedicated.

11 Boylston Road, Fenway,
Boston, Mass., November 20, 1914.

The eightieth birthday of Major Henry Lee Higginson was paid elaborate tribute on Wednesday evening, November 18, in a banquet tendered him at the Copley-Plaza Hotel. Among the guests and speakers present were: Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, who acted as toastmaster; Brooks Adams, William S. Bigelow, George W. Chadwick, H. A. Garfield, George C. Lee, Justice W. C. Loring, Col. Charles F. Morse, Dr. Karl Muck, Gen. Morris Schaff, Hon. John W. Weeks and over three score others. Guests unable to attend were former President Taft, Presidents Eliot and Lowell, of Harvard University; Justice Holmes of the United States Supreme Court; former Mayor Seth Low, of New York, and Charles Francis Adams. A musical program was furnished by more than half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and twenty-five members of the Appollo Club added vocal selections throughout the celebration.

Samaroff-Werrenrath Joint Recital.

Olga Samaroff, pianist, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, appeared in a joint recital at Symphony Hall, last Sunday afternoon, November 15, and, needless to say, it was a most interesting event. These two fine artists attracted a capacity house and enthusiasm ran high throughout the afternoon. Mr. Werrenrath was in the best of form and his opening group of German songs representing Brahms, Grieg, Weingartner and Sinding served to reveal the richness of his vocal equipment. The baritone's second group contained Italian selections, followed by the concluding group of English songs, splendidly delivered.

The MacDowell "Eroica" sonata was brilliantly performed by Mme. Samaroff. The pianist's other program offerings comprised two Polish songs by Chopin-Liszt, an A minor mazurka and an A minor prelude by Chopin, "Soirees de Vienne, No. 6," and the fifteenth rhapsodie by Liszt. Both artists were obliged to respond to many encores and shared equally in the honors of the afternoon.

Laeta Hartley with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Laeta Hartley was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Thursday evening, November 12, when the second of the Cambridge series of concerts was given. Dr. Muck's program included the MacDowell D minor piano concerto, played by Miss Hartley, also the Ropartz C major symphony and symphonic sketches by Chadwick. Both of these compositons have been played this season at the symphony concerts in Boston. Much interest centered in the appearance of Miss Hartley with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as her teacher, Carl Stasny, is one of this city's prominent piano pedagogues. The MacDowell concerto served as an ideal setting for the young artist's pianistic and musicianly attainments. This pianist possesses an extraordinary talent If Mr. Stasny has any more such gifted pupils, he should certainly lose no time in bringing them before the Boston public.

Harvard's New Concert Hall.

Harvard's new building, the "John Knowles Paine Concert Hall," was dedicated last Friday evening, November 13, when Hans Ebell, the German-Russian pianist, gave the initial recital before a large and enthusiastic audience. Mr. Ebell is new to this country, but judging from his work on this occasion, he promises to create a brilliant career for himself here. He is well known abroad, having appeared throughout Europe in recital and concert. He is only twenty-seven years of age. Mr. Ebell's program on this evening represented selections by six composers. Beginning with Brahms' sonata in F minor, he next played the "Kinderscenen," by Schumann. Four Chopin numbers followed and then in bold contrast, two preludes by Rachmaninoff. The Rosenthal "Papillons" came before the concluding number, which was Liszt's tarantella, "Venezia Napoli." Mr. Ebell played throughout his program in masterly manner. He is a disciple of the modern school of players and, naturally enough, since he at one time studied with Rachmaninoff. During the past several years Mr. Ebell was at the head of the piano department in the Cracow Conservatory, but the war necessitated his coming to America. He is making Boston his headquarters at present and will soon give a recital at Steinert Hall.

A New York Cantor Heard in Concert.

Bernhard Steinberg, the baritone cantor of Temple Beth-El, New York, was heard for the first time in Boston when he appeared in concert at Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, November 15. The cantor was assisted by a choir of twelve singers from Temple Israel, Boston, a quartet of soloists, and Carl Webster, cellist. The program was rather long and confusing, but it was not without interesting points. Bernhard Steinberg has a marvelous voice, and one could but wonder why a baritone with such brilliant dramatic qualities has not sought operatic fields. His musical gift is truly rare, and presumably the great service he renders the Jewish community is appreciated. The assisting artists performed their individual parts satisfactorily, and especially interesting was the group of Jewish folksongs, sung by a double quartet from the choir. Here life, joy, pathos and sparkling individuality all came forth in the youthful effervesence of Jewish temperament. The quality of voice displayed by these singers was surprising in its clearness and charm.

Sousa and His Band Appear.

Sousa and his Band formed the powerful attraction at the pair of benefit concerts given in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon and evening of this week in aid of the restoration and endowment fund of Wellesley College. The Sousa programs are filled with variety, spontaneity and delight, and the great bandmaster certainly never fails to cater to the desires of the public. A Sousa concert means that all those who hear it are sure to be satisfied to their heart's content, experience a good many thrills and go home feeling that the entertainment was complete and satisfying in every way. The "March King" is a veritable genius in his line, and his superb band responds to his every desire. Sousa's capable assisting solo artists were: Virginia Root, soprano; Margel Gluck, violinist, and Herbert L. Clarke, cornetist.

Last Sunday evening Sousa and his Band gave their own concert to an audience that packed the Colonial Theatre.

Ruth Deyo's Piano Recital.

Ruth Deyo, a local pianist, gave a recital at Jordan Hall, Thursday afternoon, November 19. The young artist is well liked in Boston, and deservedly so, for her playing on this occasion proved to be that of a finished performer. The program comprised the MacDowell "Eroica" sonata, the D major toccata by Bach, two intermezzi by Brahms, the Chopin fantasie in F minor, and a final group containing Albeniz's "El Albaicin," "Clair de Lune" and the "Danseuses de Delphes" by Debussy, and "Islamey" by Balakirew. A good sized audience was present and much enthusiasm was aroused by the splendid work of the young lady.

RAMON BLANCHART IS TEACHING.

Ramon Blanchart, the Spanish baritone, who for the past five years has been a member of the Boston Opera Company, is rapidly becoming prominent in the Boston teaching world. In consequence of the absence of our opera this season this splendid art is now at liberty to accept the many requests for his tutelage which in past years could not be considered. Mr. Blanchart's wide experience in the operatic field, both here in America and in all parts of Europe, makes him especially valuable as a coach, and in this particular line I found him engrossed when enjoying the pleasure of visiting him at his charming home in Brookline last week. Mr. Blanchart is now identified with the vocal faculty at the New England Conservatory of Music, where his services are already in demand.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At the fifth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon, November 20, and Saturday night, November 21, Dr. Muck outlined a program surprisingly light, that is, light in comparison with the usual symphony programs heard. There was quite a little comment among the learned ones as to his purpose in constructing a scheme of the Strauss symphonic fantasia "Aus Italien," Ravel's "Espagnole" rhapsody, and the Scheinpflug "Overture to a Comedy of Shakespeare," but be that as it may, the program certainly was interesting, and the orchestra performed in its usual excellent style. The Ravel number was unconventional, and I am afraid that his message reached only a few of the listeners at these concerts. Heinrich Warnke, first cellist of the orchestra, appeared as soloist playing two Dvorák pieces, the "Waldesruhe" and a "Rondo." An impressive feature of the Saturday evening concert was the impromptu greeting extended to Major Higginson in honor of his eightieth birthday, which occurred on Wednesday of this week. Just before the concert began a short address was made outlining Boston's appreciation for the assistance the major has given to the orchestra, and as the players sounded a fanfare the audience applauded for several minutes.

BOSTON NOTES.

At the concert for the people next Sunday afternoon in the Boston Theatre, Tina Lerner, the Russian pianist, will play short pieces by Mozart, Bach, Weber, Chopin and Liszt. The other feature of the program will be the appearance of the resident Swedish singing society (Gustaf Sundelius, conductor) in a series of Swedish folk tunes.

The second of the series of artists' recitals which are being given at Wellesley College took place this Friday evening, with Dorothy, Rosalind and Cynthia Fuller, of Dorset, England, appearing in their recital of old English folksongs.

VICTOR WINTON.

Nielsen-Martin Press Tributes.

A large and fashionable capital city audience greeted Alice Nielsen and Riccardo Martin with marked enthusiasm, when these two artists appeared in joint recital in Albany, N. Y., recently. Here is what the members of the press had to say regarding this joint recital:

Mr. Martin was in fine voice, and here is an artist of unquestioned ability. He uses his powerful tenor with a high degree of skill and has the power to meet the requirements of the music well and with many great points of beauty. His notes are true and he not only sings well, but acts with marked success. In his number from "I Pagliacci" he was exceedingly vigorous and dramatic, forcible and possessing the power to carry the house with him. Moreover, he has the fullest sympathy with the great parts, and last night there was a gratifying and frequent tribute to his art. His interpretation in both the "Madame Butterfly" and "Carmen" excerpts was strongly magnetic in appeal, and he has won many admirers here. Mr. Martin sang two groups of songs, thus proving beyond a doubt his versatility as the great American tenor, the first to be signed for leading roles at the Metropolitan Opera House.

ALICE NIELSEN.

Miss Nielsen came forward like the gracious person that she is, and before the program was completed won all hearts with her English songs. She might be a creature full of spirit and impudence; or a naive, sweet girl babbling over with delicate tenderness, so wistful and sure voiced is she in her artistic trend. She has a pleasing personality that grows surely as she progresses with the advance of her numbers, and her numbers both in groups and excerpts from the exquisite Butterfly were charmingly sung. Almost above her ability to sing, shines her power to act and interest. She never poses or imitates—always is she natural—and when she sang "When Love Is Kind" and Brewer's "The Fairy Pipers" she won all hearts instantly with her simplicity. . . .

Her singing of Arensky's Russian tone poem, "Lately in Dance I Embraced Her," added greatly to the enjoyment of the evening.—Albany Evening Journal.

The program, ranging from Butterfly's soul searing sobs and Pagliacci's terrible laugh through Sigmund's soaring love notes to that elfin confection, "The Fairy Pipers," of which Miss Nielsen's delicate artistry was alone enough to convince the skeptic, gave both Miss Nielsen and Mr. Martin the opportunity to display all the varied aspects of their abilities. And not only were they able, but they were agreeable. Mr. Martin forever brands as a base calumny that definition of a quartet which speaks of "three men and a tenor." His voice carries with it all the fire and higher character that the register demands, yet his personality is refreshingly masculine and robust. And he and Miss Nielsen worked together in an atmosphere of bon camaraderie only too rare among those who dwell with the stars and singing spheres.

Miss Nielsen beautifully exemplifies the truism that genius consists not in doing what no one else can do, but in doing supremely well what others do but indifferently. In aria or in chanson her singing was perfect. The audience smiled as one over her pretty tricks and sat silent and tense through her more serious efforts. Delicate and fine as were the little silver brush strokes of the voice with which she gave new beauty to familiar themes, again and again a rich broad slash of tone color showed that same voice to possess the power requisite to work on a grander scale.—Albany Times Union. Praise for David Dubinsky.

Regarding the violin recital of David Dubinsky, in Griffith Hall, Philadelphia, Pa., recently, a review was published in last week's issue of the MUSICAL COURIER. What the members of the local press had to say concerning this event may be seen from the appended critiques:

David Dubinsky, a violinist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, in a recital given in Griffith Hall last night observed the spirit of strictest neutrality, at least, in his selections from composers. The sonata in G major of Brahms (German) was followed by concerto in A minor by Vieuxtemps (French). Russia was represented by a melody from Tschaikowsky, Italy by Tartini's sonata in G minor, and Spain by one of Sarasate's incomparable Spanish dances.—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

The work of Brahms was set forth with painstaking sincerity and clear enunciation of its meaning on the part of both artists. Mr. Dubinsky draws from his instrument a satisfying quality and quantity of tone. He appears to better advantage in long drawn cantabile passages, but he plays in tune, and generally carefully, and any player who puts Brahms foremost instead of serving "sugar water" and musical delicatessen to capture an easy popularity earns the gratitude of the discerning. He draws his bow straight across the strings—a thing some players are too lazy to do.—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Mr. Dubinsky was heard at his best, perhaps, in two works which few violinists are able to place upon their programs. They were the Vieuxtemps A minor concerto and the G minor sonata of Tartini. The soloist gave a striking demonstration of his command of his instrument when his E string snapped just as he began the first movement of the Vieuxtemps number. Notwithstanding this, he finished the movement on three strings.

Three short and very attractive selections in which he was heard to great advantage were Kreisler's arrangements of Martini's andantino, Couperin's "La Precieuse and Boccherini's allegretto.—Philadelphia Evening Telegraph.

Mr. Dubinsky was obviously careful in his first number, but in the exquisite old world pieces he threw off undue restraint, and played Martini, Couperin and Boccherini with the easy indifference they demanded. A clear tone, straight forward and clean drawing of the bow, and no trace of sentiment were the excellent characteristics of his work. The adagios of both sonata and concerto were best played, and indicated both Mr. Dubinsky's strength and his limitations.—Philadelphia Evening Ledger. (Advertisement.)

"Schumann-Heink sings with the soul as well as the throat and brings the classics as near to the people as 'Old Folks at Home' or a patriotic song."—New York Evening Post.

Forsyth and a Pupil.

Arthur Singer is an extremely gifted young pianist, who has received his entire musical training from W. O. Forsyth, of Toronto, Canada, with the exception of one year with Prof. Xaver Scharwenka in Germany. Mr. Singer was to have given a concert with the assistance of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, under Professor Scharwenka's baton, this month, and also a recital in January, but owing to the war he has returned to Toronto, and is again pursuing his studies with Mr. Forsyth, who has brought out so many fine pianists.

Mr. Singer probably will appear in recital several times during the season. He is a player of authority and has a very large repertoire.

W. O. FORSYTH,

The accompanying characteristic picture of Mr. Forsyth, posed with an admirable eye for the artistic, was taken last July at Lake Louise in the Canadian Rocky Mountains.

South and West Praise Williams.

On October 26, Evan Williams was heard by a large audience at Jacksonville, Fla., and on November 8 music lovers of Portland, Ore., had an opportunity to listen to this Welsh-American's beautiful tenor voice.

Herewith is an opinion of his work from a daily paper of each of these cities:

Jacksonville music lovers enjoyed their first visit from Evan Williams, the great tenor singer, last night. . . . It has been a great many years, and perhaps never before, that a singer of Mr. Williams' standing presented an entire program in English in the city. Those who know of his extraordinary ability to sing in other tongues can appreciate his special effort to give his audience last night, not only beautiful songs but words that not alone the few but all could understand.

Mr. Williams sings as though he enjoyed it thoroughly, and his wonderful interpreting powers, coupled with his unusual brilliancy of tone production, makes his efforts that of a true artist. He possesses a voice of unusual range, full of mellowness and warmth, which appeals in no unspeakable measure to his audience. His program was so varied that he was given a wide range in which to show the various qualities of his voice.

The singer had as an accompanist his son, Vernon Williams.—Jacksonville Daily Journal.

Tremendous is the power—and also the charm—of a great tenor singer.

Evan Williams, the Welsh-American dramatic tenor, has every right to be acclaimed as "great" when he opens his mouth in song. He was the soloist at a concert in which he appeared yesterday, and delighted the large audience that comfortably filled the theatre. Evan Williams will be remembered in this city for these qualities as a first class concert singer. . . .

He sang, yesterday, Handel's "Sound an Alarm" with fine declamation, and "A Perfect Day" (Bond) and "My Pretty Jane" with lovely tenderness. In rendering "Open the Gates of the Temple" (Knapp), Williams' voice was magnificent, and, with his head thrown back, he sang the last note, in thrilling fashion, up to high B natural, above the staff. . . .

"If With All Your Heart" (Mendelssohn) and "All Through the Night" were sung with tonal beauty. Many of the songs sung were really sermons in disguise. Williams was good natured and even prodigal with his encore numbers, and won warm praise throughout. His son, Vernon Williams, is an admirable accompanist.—The Morning Oregonian.

"You can't go to the concert in that hat," said the husband.

The wife, agreeably surprised, answered with a note of joyful expectancy in her voice, "How good of you to think of it!"

"I thought of it so much," continued he, "that I booked only one seat!"—Tasmanian Mail.

KANSAS CITY EVENTS.

Local Orchestra Enters Upon Fourth Season—Prominent Artists Heard in Recent Concerts.

Kansas City, Mo., October 30, 1914.

The Fritschy concert series of nine concerts opened auspiciously Tuesday afternoon, when Johanna Gadski and Clarence Whitehill appeared in joint recital. Practically the entire house was sold to subscribers for the entire series, a compliment to the unabated fairness with which Mr. Fritschy has dealt with this public from the beginning of his managerial activities here. The program was of special interest, being practically a Wagnerian one. Mme. Gadski gave Elsa's admonition to Ortrud from "Lohengrin," Sieglinde's song from "Walküre" and the call of the Valkyrie.

Mr. Whitehill endeared himself to this public last Easter Sunday as Parsifal. He sang Wotan's "Abschied" and Hamlet's soliloquy from "Hamlet"; also Sidney Homer's song, "Uncle Rome," which was so heartily enjoyed that Mr. Whitehill was obliged to repeat it. The program ended with the duo from "The Flying Dutchman."

NOTES.

William A. Bunsen presented his violin pupil, Norma Troje, in recital at the Temple on Wednesday evening. Mr. Bunsen is setting a new pace for student players of the violin. Miss Troje's best work was done in the second Bach concerto, though she played the Schubert-Wilhelmj "Ave Marie" very well.

Among the newcomers in the musical colony is Madeline Belle Prosser, pianist, who has just returned from eight years' study and teaching in Paris. At the beginning of the war Miss Prosser decided to return to Kansas City, where years of teaching had endeared her to a host of pupils and friends. In Paris she was associated with Thuel Burnham as pupil and assistant teacher.

Michael Posner Returns to New York.

Michael Posner, the young American violinist, who was compelled to return to the United States owing to the war, has for the past few years been active as violinist and teacher in Berlin, where he enjoyed a large following. Mr.

MICHAEL POSNER.

Posner studied with such celebrities as Alexander Fiedeman, Andreas Moser (professor at the HochSchule für Musik in Berlin), and later with Franz Wilczek. During the past season Mr. Posner appeared at a number of public and private concerts in Berlin and Dresden, where his playing won instantaneous recognition.

Mr. Posner is available as teacher and concert violinist, and has opened a New York studio at 25 East 112th street.

Stevenson Artist-Pupil Sings.

Helen Meseritz, soprano, pupil of Anna Stevenson, made a fine impression by her rendition of "Una Voce Poco Fa," from "Il Barbiere di Seviglia," at the annual benefit concert given November 14 by the Ladies' Aid Society of the German Hospital, at Hotel Biltmore, New York. A velvet tone, perfect execution, exquisitely clear diction and a charming personality are Miss Meseritz's assets, and a brilliant career is predicted for her. She was compelled to respond to two encores and sang with lovely grace Hallet Gilberté's "Minuet la Phyllis" and Hammond's "Cupid's Wings."

England's Music Revives.

[From the London Monthly Musical Record.]

Despite the trying times, it is encouraging and cheering to hear from day to day of the increased resumption of musical activity. Choral executives and musical committees are restoring their fixtures, in many cases only slightly modified, and the public are becoming more sensitive to the needs of the artists, who cannot be expected to give their services gratuitously very often, and this only in the localities where they are personally known, and desirous of doing their share in lightening national burdens in this way. While many musical educational centers have lost on the male side, most of them report an increase in the number of students. This is as it ought to be. It would be a poor return to our men on active service if we untrained, and over-age homesters, were to let things artistic slide. For to an ever increasing number of people now, the value of music is far other than that of the old Victorian theologian who regarded it as "a mere tapping of keys, a blowing of pipes, and a scraping of catgut with the hair of a horse's tail."

Frances Alda's Recital Program.

Frances Alda has arranged an interesting and attractive program for her New York recital, to be given in Carnegie Hall, Tuesday afternoon, December 1. The starred numbers indicate the novelties in the songs of the following list which the popular Metropolitan Opera soprano will sing on that occasion: "Venez, agréable printemps," Old French; "The Plague of Love," Dr. Arne; "Polly Willis," Dr. Arne; "Nel Cor Più," Paisiello; "M'ha preso alla sua ragna," Paradies; "Liebeslied," Dvorák; "Haste to Silv'ry Moonbeams,"* Dohnanyi; "Tausend Sterne." Blech; "Schlaflied," Moszkowski; "Spinnlied," Moniuszko; "Les Cloches," Debussy; "A des Oiseaux," Hüe; "J'ai pleuré en rêve," Hüe; "Mélodie Arabe,"* Borodine; "Fleur Jetée," Fauré; "O, Bocca Dolorosa,"* Sibella; "Impressione,"* Sibella; "Bimba, Bimbetta,"* Sibella; "I Came with a Song,"* La Forge; "In Pride of May,"* La Forge.

Frank la Forge will accompany Mme. Alda.

Portland Symphony Orchestra Program.

The Portland (Ore.) Symphony Orchestra, with Harold C. Bayley conducting, gave its first concert of the season at the Heilig Theatre, that city, on November 1. The following program was rendered: Symphony No. 7 in C major, Schubert; "Mignon" overture, Ambroise Thomas; "Evening in the Mountains" (for oboe, horn and strings), Grieg; Moorish fantasie and "Malaguena," Moszkowski, and "Wotan's Farewell" and "Magic Fire," Wagner.

In response to numerous requests the audience was asked to join in singing "America."

The next concert will be held on December 6, with Carl Denton conducting. The following program will be rendered on this occasion: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; symphony No. 1, B flat, Schumann; "Der Schwan von Tunuola," Sibelius; "To a Wild Rose" (string orchestra), MacDowell, and ballet divertissement, Henry VIII, Saint-Saëns.

Mlle. Verlet's Program.

The following program has been arranged for the forthcoming recital tour of Alice Verlet, the Belgian coloratura soprano:

Chanson de Solveige	Greig
Chanson Grisc	R. Hahn
Chanson Triste	Duparc
Le Mariage des Roses	C. Franck
Gwendoline (ballad)	Chabrier
Alleluia (Cid)	Massenet

Bispham Before University Audiences.

David Bispham gave a song recital in the Extension Course at Columbia University, New York, recently. Inasmuch as the baritone has set for himself a propaganda for singing in the English language he gave his program in English much to the delight of all present. An audience which filled the Horace Mann Auditorium to the doors listened to and applauded heartily not only his beautiful singing but the sparkle and the humor of the remarks which accompanied his offerings.

"From Hell Gate to Golden Gate there are no more popular artists than Mme. Schumann-Heink and David Bispham" has been written of these singers. This was obviously true at his Columbia University appearance, as one could feel the warmth and the cordiality that existed betwen the great artist and his audience.

In his group of modern songs by American composers Mr. Bispham sang selections from Henry Hadley's "The Atonement of Pan" and "The Flint Song" from "The Cave Man," by William J. McCoy. Both works were written for the High Jinks of the Bohemian Club of San Francisco, and both chief roles were created by Mr. Bispham. He also sang numbers by Louis Elbel and H. H. Wetzler.

During the same week Mr. Bispham gave a program in the Extension Course of the University of Pennsylvania and one at Wilson College, Chambersburg, in both of which he appeared before houses filled to the utmost capacity, as he did at Columbia. Notwithstanding the fact that he had sung three recitals during the week, he was in his best voice on Sunday evening, when he sang at one of a series of sacred concerts at the Baptist Temple in Philadelphia. This is the church of the celebrated Russel Conwell. His numbers were "It Is Enough," from Mendelssohn's "Elijah"; "Omnipotence," by Schubert; "Let Us Have Peace," by Ball, and "A Perfect Day," by Carrie Jacobs Bond. The last two songs were dedicated to Mr. Bispham.

Mme. Gerville-Réache Sings for Nuns.

Jeanne Gerville-Réache, the French contralto, is singing in the Middle West. The cities in which she gives recitals include Topeka, Omaha, St. Louis, Kansas City, St. Paul, Minneapolis and Chicago. While in Omaha, Mme. Gerville-Réache was invited to sing at the mass in the chapel of the Sisterhood of the Perpetual Adoration. The contralto sang "Panis Angelicus," by Cesar Franck, and "Agnus Dei," by Bizet. Mme. Gerville-Réache is said to be the first outsider ever allowed to visit the convent, and after the mass many of the nuns spoke to her, telling her how they enjoyed the unique privilege of hearing her sing.

Florence Macbeth Praised by Press.

Florence Macbeth made her bow to a New York audience at the Century Opera House recently as the Doll in "Tales of Hoffmann." That she met New York press approval is convincingly shown in the following excerpts:

Florence Macbeth made her debut with the Century Opera Company last night as Olympia, the Doll, in Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann." She made a decidedly pleasing impression and disclosed a voice of beauty.—New York World (morning), November 4, 1914.

Florence Macbeth, latest new member of the Century Opera Company, made her debut last evening as Olympia in Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann." While the election crowd was celebrating nearby the coloratura soprano, who found much favor in London, was winning a popular success.

By far the comeliest Doll this city has seen, and with a most engaging personality, Miss Macbeth found herself accepted before she concluded the one air of importance which Miss Macbeth sang last night, and which she was obliged to repeat on the insistent demand of a large audience. The voice she disclosed, while light, has a charm of quality, a freedom and a flexibility that sound promising.—New York World (evening), November 4, 1914.

As the Century Opera season draws to a regretted close the performances seem to gain in brilliancy. Last night Offenbach's "Tales of Hoffmann" was presented.

The feature of the performance, however, was the debut of a new coloratura soprano, Florence Macbeth, who made a sensational success as the Doll.—New York Evening Telegram, November 4, 1914.

Florence Macbeth, who is winning new laurels by her singing as Olympia at the Century, is hardly out of her 'teens.

As her name indicates, Miss Macbeth is of Scotch ancestry, although her parents were born in America. She attended the public schools in Mankato, Minn., and when she was eleven years of age began the study of music.

After her voice had been placed, Miss Macbeth went abroad and was thoroughly coached in acting and stage deportment. She studied interpretation in Paris, and finally came to the notice of Daniel Mayer, the famous London impresario, under whose auspices she made her memorable debut in London. During this past summer she made a concert tour of England.—New York Evening Telegram, November 5, 1914.

In one respect it was more than excellent; so far as it was in the power of a single singer to do, so Florence Macbeth made it admirable. It was this singer's first appearance in New York, and she introduced herself most successfully. Winsome in appearance, clever and gracious in action, exhibiting as much originality and ingenuity as the imitation of an automaton would permit, she disclosed a bright, fresh voice, true in intonation, and a considerable skill and finish in vocalization. She won the audience from the start, and invited something more than curiosity as to ability in operatic singing of a different order.—New York Tribune, November 4, 1914.

Florence Macbeth, formerly of the Chicago Opera Company, had the part of the mechanical doll, in which she did clever work and received liberal applause.—Brooklyn Standard Union, November 5, 1914.

Another new soprano was presented last evening. Florence Macbeth, who sang the part of the doll, Olympia, made her first appearance, and was a decided success. She was quite the prettiest Olympia New York has seen for some time.—New York American, November 4, 1914.

An election night throng witnessed the triumph of a new American star, Florence Macbeth. No Doll in all the years of the gayest little grand opera known has ever captured a New York house like that. Her birdlike singing was a delight, and her acting of the odd mechanical creation kept everybody in ripples of laughter that grew to a roar. The funniest thing of all was the surprised Doll's puppet-like bow.—New York Times, November 4, 1914.

Florence Macbeth made her debut here in the role of the moving and singing Doll. Though Miss Macbeth comes hither primarily as a coloratura singer of such accomplishment that nothing less than the Lucias, the Aminas, and the Gildas are worthy of her mettle, it was still as an actress that she made the strongest impression last night. . . . To sing the doll is an exacting and not too grateful role. Miss Macbeth displayed some lovely tones last evening. Globe and Commercial Advertiser, November 4, 1914.

A soprano new to this city, Florence Macbeth, formerly of the Chicago Opera Company, was heard in the first act as Olympia, the doll. She kept the pitch always; her coloratura work was smooth and true, and the quality and range of her voice were excellent. She presented a charming appearance and acted acceptably, and after the curtain had dropped received many recalls and flowers.—New York Herald, November 4, 1914.

Florence Macbeth carried off the honors at the Century Opera House concert last night by her singing of "Caro Nome," from Rigoletto," and, later, by her part in the quartet from the same opera.—New York Evening World, November 9, 1914.

A debut in the part of Olympia, the mechanical doll, is hardly a fair test of the voice of a coloratura soprano. Florence Macbeth, who has won some extravagant praise both here and abroad, seemed to deserve all of the good things that have been said of her. Her voice is light, but very true and flexible. Certainly a more convincing portrayal of the marvelous doll has never been seen in New York.—New York Evening Mail, November 4, 1914.

Morgan Kingston in "Traviata."

Ever since the beginning of his career as an opera singer Morgan Kingston has won high praise for the beauty of his voice and the excellence of his enunciation. He has scored no failures. He has shown no inequality or capriciousness. In the New York Century Opera he has appeared in many roles, a partial list of which shows the following: Radames in "Aida," Lohengrin, Mario in "Tosca," Samson in "Samson and Delilah," Don Jose in "Carmen," Rudolph in "La Boheme," Turiddu in "Cavalleria Rusticana," Canio in "Pagliacci," Alfred in "Traviata."

MORGAN KINGSTON.

This last was one of his most recent efforts, and his success is shown by recent comments culled from the daily press of New York:

Morgan Kingston's efforts as Alfred rose above the pervading level of ineffectiveness.—New York Press.

Mr. Kingston gave a creditable performance of Alfred.—New York American.

"Traviata" has had worse tenors than Morgan Kingston, even at three times the price charged last night. The young Welshman was in fine voice.—New York Evening World.

Morgan Kingston used his beautiful voice with sureness. His modest demeanor consorts well with the character of the gentle Alfredo.—New York Globe.

Morgan Kingston was the Alfred. His voice is a good one and he sang the music very well.—New York Commercial.

As the young lover Alfred, Mr. Kingston did some of the most satisfactory singing since making his New York debut. He sang with freedom and with a warmth of tone and quality that made a favorable impression on the audience. As usual, his enunciation was intelligible, even though the text teemed with difficult and unpoetic expressions.—New York Journal of Commerce.

As Alfred, Morgan Kingston did some good singing.—New York Times. (Advertisement.)

The Millers Buy a Bale of Cotton.

Reed Miller, tenor, is one of the first of the prominent concert artists to subscribe to the "Buy a Bale of Cotton" movement. The tenor was singing recently in his home town, Anderson, S. C., and there he and his wife, Nevada van der Veer, each bought a bale to help out the situation.

Haarlem Philharmonic First Musicale.

At its opening musicale of the season, the Haarlem Philharmonic Society of New York, listened to an especially well presented and entertaining program furnished by George Dostal, tenor, and the Trio de Lutèce.

George Dostal, formerly of the Theatres Bellini and San Carlo of Naples, possesses a voice of excellent timbre, sympathetic and vibrant. His personality is pleasing and he succeeds in arousing keen interest in his singing without apparent effort. The insistent demands for encores showed that the Philharmonic members approved and enjoyed the singing of this comparatively new comer to New York musical circles.

The musicale was given in the usual place, the Astor Gallery, Waldorf-Astoria, New York, Thursday morning, November 19.

This was the program in full:

Pièces en concert: "La Pantomine," "La Timide," "L'Indiscrete," "Tambourine," J. Ph. Rameau, Trio de Lutéce; "Ballade," Hasselmans, "La Danse des Sylphes," Godefroid, Salvatore de Stefano; "Sicilienne" from "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni, "Bella Siccome un Angelo," from "Crespino e la Comare," Ricci, George Dostal; "Chants Russes," Lalo, "Allegro Appassionnata," Saint Saëns, Paul Kéfer; "Danse Sacree," Massenet, "Serenade," Saint-Saëns, Trio de Lutéce; "If Thou Wert Blind," Noel Johnson, "Love, I have Won You and Held You," Landon Ronald, "Life," Oley Speaks, "Until," Sanderson, George Dostal; "Madrigal," Wormser, "Scherzo," Widor, George Barrère; Petite suite: "En Bateau," "Cortege," "Menuet," "Ballet," Debussy, Trio de Lutèce.

The artists for the December musicale are to be Henriette Bach, violinist, and Oscar Seagle, baritone.

Below is given a list of the board of directors and the various committees of the Haarlem Philharmonic Society of New York:

Board of directors: Mrs. Rastus Seneca Ransom, president; Mrs. William H. Laird, first vice-president; Mrs. Henry Winter Davis, second vice-president; Mrs. Herman W. Frederic Martin's Engagements.

Frederic Martin, the American concert and oratorio basso, whose popularity is steadily increasing, has recently returned from a tour in Virginia, where he had appearances at the Normal School in Harrisonburg; Washington and Lee University, in Lexington; the Normal School at Farmville, and at Intermont College, in Bristol. In the near future he is to appear at the University of Wisconsin, in Madison; with the Philharmonic Club, of Minneapolis; the Oratorio Society, of Worcester, and with the New York Oratorio Society. Those who were so fortunate as to hear this artist in the "Messiah" with the latter society last season will be pleased to know of his re-engagement. He has also been engaged to sing for the Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston, in their spring centennial festival, his eighth appearance with this organization. Mr. Martin's thorough knowledge of the "Messiah" is evidenced by the fact that he sings it equally as well in German as in English. He is engaged to sing this work in German with the Music Verein, of Milwaukee. Below are given some press comments of his recital appearances:

Mr. Martin's contributions were distinguished by much tonal beauty and their admirable style. His voice is rich and warm in timbre and used with commanding and telling power. Of wide scope were his selections, ranging from the fine "Son and Stranger" of Felix Mendelssohn and the lovely aria of Massenet down to the quaint songs of his encores. All were treated with rare insight and artistic skill, the MacDowell song being among the most effective, sung as it was with a dramatic breadth and pathos that made it a thing of intense vocal beauty. His stage presence and fine manner added much to the impressive delivery of his numbers.—Daily Press, Portland, Me.

Mr. Martin is a real musician, as wholesome in his music as he is as a man. It is his bigness of heart and his breadth of mind which are truly reflected in his musical messages, and which make his singing always so satisfactory. His voice is an adequate medium of expression, too, for as one who known said, "Martin's voice is the most musical bass voice almost ever heard." What is more, it is exceptionally flexible. His genuine artistry is always evident. He is one of the few artists who sings uniformly well at all times.—Herald-Courier, Bristol, Va.

It is not often that a bass singer is heard who can be called "really great," but this characteristic can surely be found in the singing of Frederic Martin. His voice is well pitched over a wide and finely developed range, while the clearness and richness of his tones are most pleasing. He has perfect command of himself, and his easy and natural way of singing make it especially delightful. His enunciation is excellent and he maintains through his singing a distinctive dignity, while at the same time he imparts a certain atmosphere and dramatic power of interpretation that appeal in a way that is seldom possible with a bass voice.—Daily Press, Utica, N. Y. (Advertisement.)

"Samanatha, what's thet chune the orchestry's a-playin' now?"

"The program says it's Choppin,' Hiram."

"Waal—mebbe—but ter me it sounds a deal more like sawin'."—Winnipeg Town Topics.

LIVERPOOL CONCERT NOTES.

22 Fern Grove,
Liverpool, October 31, 1914.

Owing to the war the prospective programs of our premier society have been interfered with, but not very materially, and the season opened brilliantly with a fine list of works, the most striking being Rachmaninoff's second symphony, which was heard here two seasons ago under the composer's direction. On this latter occasion Landon Ronald was in charge, and he obtained an excellent performance. He was not, however, so happy in his treatment of Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," which was taken at unusual speed. Other items of importance were Grieg's "Lyric Suite" (op. 54) and Balfour Gardiner's engaging "Shepherd Fennel's Dance." It is a pity that a more helpful title could not have been chosen for this brightly scored specimen, as (although I regret to say it) not too many people are acquainted with Thomas Hardy's "Wessex Tales."

The second concert was under the conductorship of Safonoff. Brahms' Variation on Haydn's Chorale, "St. Anthony," Mozart's delightful serenade in G for strings, and Beethoven's second symphony showed the close affinity of conductor and orchestra. The choir sang the Russian anthem and Pierson's "Ye Mariners of England," and Herbert Brown offered versions of Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," "Pilgrim's Song" (Tschaikowsky), "Sword Song" (Elgar) and Hatton's "To Anthea," the last one accompanied by Helena McCullagh, one of our best local pianists. I must also add that the post of choral conductor, vacated by the lamented death of Harry Evans, has been accepted by R. H. Wilson, of Manchester, whose experience and capacity in connection with the Hallé and other Manchester choirs should make him a fitting man for the post. H. A. Branscombe still retains the post of organist.

Rodewald Concert Club.

Owing to the detention of Dr. Adolf Brodsky and Carl Fuchs in Germany (the one being a Russian subject and the other a naturalized Englishman), the personnel of the Brodsky String Quartet, that had been engaged by the committee to inaugurate the fourth season of this society, was somewhat interfered with by the absence of its leader and cellist. This was, however, atoned for by the presence of the Rawdon Briggs Quartet, which combination gave satisfactory renderings of works by Mozart, Debussy and Brahms. Mr. Briggs was assisted by his wife (viola), S. Speelman (viola), the second violin and cello being respectively held by John Bridge and Walter Hatton.

The program of the second meeting was entrusted to the Henkel Piano Quartet, a party led by Lily Henkel (piano), the other components being Arthur Beckwith (violin), Raymond Jeremy (viola) and John Mundy (cello). Chausson's quartet in A minor was the initial item, followed by William Y. Hullstone's quartet in E minor, and Beethoven's in E flat (op. 16). There is practically no alteration in the constitution of the committee, of which Ernest Bryson is chairman and H. E. Roberts, honorary secretary.

Hallé Orchestra.

The absence of Michael Balling has induced the committee to imitate the action of the London Symphony Orchestra and other metropolitan concerns, to say nothing of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, and adopt the "guest conductor" principle. The following have been engaged: Sir Edward Elgar, Sir Frederic Cowen, Granville Bantock, Thomas Beecham, Hamilton Harty, Landon Ronald, H. Verbrugghen and R. H. Wilson, the latter a choral conductor.

Thanks to the initiative of Rushworth & Dreaper, whose palatial establishments in Islington and Basnett streets are depots for the New York Musical Courier, Liverpool amateurs were afforded an opportunity on October 24 of hearing this famous band, under the direction of Beecham, who is without doubt one of the elite, especially where modern music is concerned. The program contained Debussy's "Spring Suite," Balakirev's "Thamar," Granville Bantock's "Fifine at the Fair," d'Indy's "A Day on a Mountain," and Berlioz's "Hungarian March." The audience might have been larger, but, of course, the European situation overshadows everything. W. J. Bowden.

BUFFALO EVENTS.

Telephone, North 1445 J,
819 Richmond Avenue,
Buffalo, N. Y., November 2, 1914.

The annual series of subscription concerts under the direction of Mai Davis Smith was inaugurated on Tuesday evening, October 27, with Felice Lyne, the young American prima donna, and Edmund Burke, the baritone, as participating soloists.

Newcomb-Hambourg Trio.

The Newcomb-Hambourg Trio, consisting of Ethel Newcomb, pianist; Jan Hambourg, violinist, and Boris Hambourg, cellist, gave a concert at the home of Mrs. Porter Norton, on Gates Circle, Tuesday afternoon, October 20, a large audience being present. Breadth of interpretation, well marked rhythms and delicate tone shadings characterized their playing. The next concert in the series will take place at the home of Mrs. Walter H. Schoellkopf, 864 Delaware avenue, on Tuesday, November 17.

Sousa's Band Concert.

Sousa and His Band gave two delightful concerts on Sunday, November 1, at the Teck Theatre, attracting large audiences. The soloists were Herbert L. Clarke, cornetist; Virginia Root, soprano, and Margel Gluck, violinist.

Chromatic Club Season.

Following is an outline of the program announced by the Chromatic Club for the Saturday afternoon meetings this season: November 7, Boris Hambourg, assisted by a club soloist; November 21, program by club members, arranged by Jane Showerman McLeod; December 5, Oscar Seagle, baritone; December 19, program by student members of the club; January 9, chamber music program by Mme. Blaauw and string quartet or trio, assisted by a club soloist; January 23, Heinrich Gebhard, pianist; February 6, exchange program by Syracuse Morning Musicale; February 20, Chromatic Club Orchestra, assisted by a club soloist; March 6, program by club members, arranged by Evelyn Choate; March 20, Bach cantata, with small chorus, soloists and orchestra, directed by Dr. J. Fred Wolle, conductor of the Bach festivals at Bethlehem, Pa. Dr. Wolle will give a short talk on Bach and Mrs. Wilhelm Oncken will play a Bach-Busoni piano concerto with the orchestra. Cora Julia Taylor.

Morristown Notes.

Morristown, N. J., November 7, 1914.

The second concert of the Warford School of Music Artists' concerts was given last night by Harold Bauer, pianist, and Caroline Hudson-Alexander, soprano, to a capacity house. Mr. Bauer was enthusiastically greeted, and after each group was accorded tremendous applause. His numbers included Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata," Schumann's "Papillons," and familiar pieces by Chopin and Schubert. He closed the concert with Saint-Saëns' "Etude en forme de Valse."

Mme. Alexander was in excellent voice and sang delightfully the aria from Mozart's "Idomeneus," and a group of songs by Rogers, Chadwick, Foote and Henschel. As an encore she sang a song which was written for and dedicated to her by Mr. Warford. It is amazing to see this busy man get so much work done in Morristown, with three days each week devoted to his classes in New York. Beside the concerts of the Artist Course, a special concert is also given each month at the school.

The Warford School Concert Bureau has booked the following artists for Morristown functions during the month of November; Mabel Beddoe, contralto; Mildred Dilling, harpist, and Leo Troostwyk, cellist.

The third concert of the artist series will be given Friday evening, January 29, by Beatrice Harrison, cellist, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone.

DETROIT CONCERTS.

Detroit, Mich., October 31, 1914.

Saturday evening, October 24, the DeVoe-Kelsey management presented Pasquale Amato and Anna Case in a joint recital at the Light Guard Armory. It was the first concert of the Philharmonic Course, and if the rest of the series measures up to the standard set by the opening one, the management will have given Detroit a noteworthy season. Neither artist had been heard in Detroit, but that Amato's splendid work in the Ann Arbor Festivals was remembered was apparent from the reception accorded him upon his appearance. No singer has ever aroused greater enthusiasm here. Recalls, encores and double encores were the order of the evening. In addition to the numbers on the program he sang the well known aria from the "Barber of Seville" and the "Toreador" song from "Carmen." Edward Falck accompanied Mr. Amato.

Anna Case found immediate favor with the audience and her numbers were most satisfactorily rendered. The "Will o' the Wisp," by Charles Gilbert Spross, who acted as her accompanist, was an exquisite gem. The one duet on the program was so well sung that it was a matter of regret that it was the only one.

Hildegarde Brandegee in Recital.

Thursday evening, October 22, the Ganapol School of Musical Art presented its new violinist, Hildegarde Brandegee, in recital. Much had been promised for Miss Brandegee, but even the most critical felt before the evening was over that all promises had been fulfilled. Her tone possesses clarity and warmth, and her interpretations are marked by imagination and intelligence. Mrs. Boris L. Ganapol, at the piano, ably assisted Miss Brandegee. She is always heard with pleasure, but her work of that evening is especially worthy of mention. The program follows: Preludium and allegro, Paganini-Kreisler; "Sicilienne," Bach-Auer; introduction and rigaudon, Francouer-Kreisler; "Symphone Espagnole," Lalo; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Tambourin Chinois," Kreisler; "En Bateau," Debussy; Hungarian dance, Brahms.

Faculty Concert of Detroit Institute.

Tuesday evening, October 20, the Detroit Institute of Musical Art presented William Wrigley, violinist, at the Cass Avenue M. E. Church, with Mrs. Wrigley at the piano. The program was a most taxing one, including the "Kreutzer" sonata, Beethoven; nocturne, Chopin-Wilhelmj; "Pierrot's Serenade," Randegger; polonaise, A major, Wieniawski; concerto, D major, Tschaikowsky.

Vera Poppe in Recital.

Friday evening, October 30, Vera Poppe, the Australian cellist, who has been engaged on the faculty of the Ganapol School, gave a recital in the Ganapol School Hall, Adelaide street. Miss Poppe has been heard in recital before in Detroit, and her work on Friday evening served to confirm opinions as to her high rank among artists. Mrs. Boris L. Ganapol assisted at the piano.

Notes.

Mrs. Maurice Macfarlane, contralto, has returned from a successful concert tour in the East, where she gave several recitals for women's clubs.

Victor Benham, the pianist, opened the series of Sunday afternoon concerts at the Art Museum Auditorium.

The various choral societies of the city have begun rehearsals and all announce the prospects of a successful season. There are three large choral bodies at work at present. Jennie M. Stoddard.

Alberta Carina Liked in Europe.

Alberta Carina, a high soprano, who has been singing in Germany, Holland and France, recently arrived in the United States. Mme. Carina will be heard in concert during the season.

Below are some of her European press criticisms:

Alberta Carina was the star of the performance. Her interpretation of the role of Susanne ("Marriage of Figaro") was a charming portrait of the attractive maid. Graceful and vivacious she rendered the character to perfection. She revealed in an incomparable manner the exquisite grace and poetry of the Mozart music. Her fine voice production was greatly admired.—Tageblatt, Amsterdam.

In the role of Susanne, admirably suited to fully reveal her personality, Alberta Carina approved herself as an artist of first rank. Her voice is of rare quality and very well trained.—Westphälisches Tageblatt.

Alberta Carina sang the role of Gilda ("Rigoletto") with superior art. That which distinguishes her voice from other sopranos is her wonderfully pure intonation. One is impressed with her unusual fine voice production and her artistic delivery. Her singing offers a true sample of the often spoken of, but seldom heard, old Italian "bel canto." Her fine musical phrasing and marked rhythmic feeling reveal a superior musicianship.—Volksblatt, Rotterdam.

Alberta Carina's Gilda was charming. Her excellent tone production enables her to bring out the various shades of coloring and contrasts of this interesting role. In the lyric parts one can enjoy the beauty and rich quality of her high soprano voice, while the dramatic scenes afford her ample chance to manifest her strong dramatic tendency. Her coloratura passages were sung with wonderful facility and perfect ease.—Westdeutsche Volkszeitung.

ALBERTA CARINA,
As Violetta in "Traviata."

Her conception of the role of Martha and her exquisite rendition of the "Last Rose of Summer" stamped Alberta Carina as an artist of rare poetic feeling.—General Anzeiger, Elberfeld.

Alberta Carina's interpretation of the Doll in the "Tales of Hoffmann" proved her to be not only a very fine coloratura soprano, but an unusual actress as well.—Täglicher Anzeiger, Elberfeld.

Alberta Carina was very pleasing as Philine and fortified our former impression of her marked ability as an actress. Vivacious and charming, she sang the florid music with great ease. Her interpretation of the light and frivolous coquette produced a strong contrast to the sad and melancholy Mignon. Great applause greeted her after the brilliant rendition of the polonaise.—Hagener Zeitung, Hagen.

For the end—the place of honor—I reserve my praise for the fascinating and charming young artist, Alberta Carina, who sang the Page from the "Huguenots" with delicious freshness and brilliancy, revealing her exquisite art in the difficult aria, "Nobles seigneurs." She received a veritable ovation which she certainly merited.—L'Echo, Bordeaux.

Alberta Carina introduced herself very favorably in her joint recital with Edouard Clement, the favorite tenor of the Opera Comique, Paris. In the "Bell Song" of "Lakme" she fascinated her audience by the pure silvery quality of her voice and her marvelous technical facility. . . . The second part of the program contained duets of "Lakme" and "Manon," sung by Alberta Carina and Edouard Clement. These numbers seemed especially well suited to the temperament of these two artists who rendered the music with such dash and brilliancy as to bring forth a salvo of cheers and applause as is but rarely heard.—Courrier, Bruxelles.

Alice Verlet Receives Good News.

Alice Verlet, the coloratura soprano, was relieved the other day of grief that has weighed heavily upon her since her arrival in the United States. Mlle. Verlet is a Belgian and has for some weeks been in absolute ignorance of the fate of here property and of her brother, who is an officer in the army. Last week the prima donna received a letter from an officer of her acquaintance who had been transported to England to recover from his wounds. It contained the cheering information that her home in Uccle, near Brussels, had not been injured in the least, that her mother, who lives there, is well, and that her brother had sustained no injury in battle.

Elsa Lyon Praised in Opera Abroad.

One of the many artists whose operatic career was interrupted by the war, is Elsa Lyon, recently returned to America from Berlin. She has a deep, rich contralto voice and her appearances in Germany have met with excellent favor. In speaking of her work in the role of Azucena, one of the Bromber newspapers calls it a "performance of lasting impression," while another speaks of her delineation of the Witch in Humperdinck's "Königskinder," as "a splendid performance, dramatically and vocally." Other roles in which she has been successful include Fricka in "Walküre," Carmen in the opera of that name, the Fortune Teller in "The Masked Ball," Brangaene in "Tristan and Isolde," etc.

Various German papers have spoken thus of her work in various operas:

"CARMEN" (BIZET).

The title role that Bizet has written with variations for soprano and alto was taken this time by the alto. Miss Lyon, a slender and flexible Carmen in appearance, took the part away from the coquettish side and portrayed rather the passionate. The acting, in gesture and facial expression, the musical declamation, disclosed very strong moments wherein the fullness of her organ showed splendidly to advantage; and as a whole this Carmen earned recognition and proof of diligent study and broad stage routine.—The Ostdeutsche Presse, April 30, 1913.

"THE MASKED BALL (VERDI), THE POSEN MUNICIPAL OPERA HOUSE.

The role of the Fortune Teller lies in the different registers between the lower voice and the highest for the mezzo, not easier than Wagner's Ortrud; Miss Lyon disclosed in the high voice, strength and power.—The Posener Lezte Nachrichten.

The part of the Fortune Teller, a master accomplishment, was given by Miss Lyon. It was an esthetic pleasure to listen to this beautifully trained and even voice.—The Posener Zeitung.

"TRISTAN AND ISOLDE" (WAGNER).

Everything that was brought forth in the field of our own talent is surely first class. In the first place I name the Brangaene of Elsa Lyon. The young lady rose to sun heights in everything from a vocal standpoint and also through her tasteful acting.—Posener Zeitung, November 19, 1912.

Miss Lyon will give a recital in Newark, Ohio, on December 1, and judging from the large list of patrons who already have subscribed for tickets, there seems to be no doubt but that she will be well received. (Advertisement.)

Indianapolis Violinist Plays with Orchestra.

Alfred Troemel, who was graduated last year from the Indianapolis Conservatory of Music under Gaylord Yost, the violin pedagogue, was soloist, October 11, with the Indianapolis Orchestra, playing the Wieniawski concerto. He received a veritable ovation, the applause being so great that he was obliged to add three extra numbers. The following are excerpts from the Indianapolis press:

His playing is marked by intelligent surety, a fine sense of rhythm and considerable feeling. The concerto and encores gave an excellent opportunity for showing the character and style of his playing.—Indianapolis News, October 12, 1914.

Perhaps the most distinctive feature of yesterday's program was the fact that the soloist was not brought here from another city, but was a local musician, who heretofore has been content to occupy one of the chairs in the first violin section of the orchestra. This young man is Alfred Troemel, and, judging from the excellent account he gave of himself yesterday, he is destined to hold an enviable position in local music circles before he is much older. As his programmed number he gave Wieniawski's famous second violin concerto, handling it with inspiration, technical precision and a maturity which displays not only careful training, but a natural and spontaneous musicianship.—Indianapolis Star, October 12, 1914.

NEWS FROM VARIOUS CITIES

Lincoln.

Lincoln, Neb., October 20, 1914.

Temple Theatre was filled at the opening meeting of the Woman's Club, seven hundred members having enrolled. The president, Mrs. Lees, greeted them in a charming manner, predicting a year of splendid efforts. The program for this meeting, under the direction of Hazel Gertrude Kinscella, of the University School of Music, marked an innovation, a piano recital representing three ages, one hundred years ago, half a century past and the present day. To make this more realistic, Miss Kinscella had arranged a pageant from among club members to represent these various eras, all being dressed in the quaint old gowns, hoop skirts, powdered hair, patches, etc., while the stage settings were faithfully carried out with antique furniture, row upon row of candles and the inevitable spinning wheel. Miss Kinscella played the difficult program with an ease delightful to witness. For this, as well as in the succeeding divisions, Miss Kinscella was exquisitely gowned and decked with jewels to suit the particular period. For the second part of the program, representative of music of fifty years ago, Liszt's "Gondoliera" and Schubert's "Military March" were played with brilliant effect. The dancing of the minuet by eight of Lincoln's society buds added variety and charm to this section. Part III was devoted to modern music, and was presented with an abandon delightful to hear. The "Cradle Song," by Joseffy, Miss Kinscella's teacher, was a gem in itself, the soft, soothing melody being charmingly played. Louis Snader asisted Miss Kinscella with three violin numbers. The Junior Orchestra of the University School of Music, under the direction of Mr. Loeb, played with pleasing effect during the intermissions.

The Matinee Musical Society opened its twenty-first season with every indication of an interesting year. Following are the officers: President, Mrs. Phil Easterday; vice president, Mrs. Joseph Grainger; recording secretary, Mrs. H. J. Lehnhoff; corresponding secretary, Mrs. A. S. Raymond; treasurer, Miss Zumwinkle; librarian, Mrs. Ross Curtice; auditor, Mrs. John Wright. The object of this club, which numbers four hundred members, is "to advance the interests and promote the culture of musical art in the city of Lincoln." Two delightful concerts have been given under its auspices this fall; the first was a violin recital by August Molzer, of the Molzer Violin School, who was assisted by Wave Whitcomb, soprano. Mr. Molzer studied for four years with Sevcik, and has coached with him throughout two summers since. His playing gave very great pleasure, and he was obliged to respond to encores, which he most graciously granted. The second event in the Matinee Musical series occurred on Monday, October 19. Edith Lucille Robbins, soprano, assisted by Floyd Robbins, pianist, gave the program. Miss Robbins, in excellent voice, sang such numbers as the Rodc variations, the Rossini aria and the "Nymphes et Sylvains," by Bemberg. Her voice is unusually flexible and shows the results of the years of training she has received. Her brother accompanied her sympathetically. Mr. Robbins, who has studied abroad a number of years, is at present director of piano in the Hoener Institute of Fine Arts in Kansas City. His reading of the Debussy prelude was a treat. He reached a great climax in his last number, the Liszt polonaise in E major.

The Morning Musical Club deserves the distinction that clings to it, that of being an organization of faithful workers, who belong to it for mutual benefit. This year will be devoted to French music. The first meeting, held at the home of Mrs. H. J. Lehnhoff, on Thursday, was devoted to the early French music, particularly the folksongs. A comprehensive paper was presented by Beulah L. Foster. Mrs. Morris and Mrs. Funke were the accompanists. Mrs. H. P. Alexander then gave a paper on "How to Study and Interpret Debussy's Music" as an aid to future programs. The hostess served a delicious three course luncheon. The next meeting will be held with Mrs. Carl Stein the second week in November. The officers for this season are: President, Mrs. Fred. Foster; vice president, Mrs. Morris; secretary-treasurer, Mrs. Callanan; program committee, Mrs. Morris and Mrs. Schloss.

Musical people of Lincoln are indebted to the University School of Music for the opportunity of hearing once more one of the famous concerts by Cecil Fanning and H. B. Turpin. This was their third concert here and, if possible, was better than ever. Perhaps enough is said, when "par excellence" is attached to everything presented during the entire evening. There were sixteen recalls and many encores were given, including Homer's "Last Leaf," Wright's "I Dream," and Schumann's "Nussbaum." A special feature was the presentation of songs by a Lincoln composer, Flora Bullock, which were enthusiastically received.

An undergraduate recital was given by Mrs. Charles W. Fleming in Curtice Recital Hall before a large gathering of friends and music students. Mrs. Fleming is a pupil of Aloys Kremer, of the Lincoln Musical College. The pianist showed a fine memory, splendid command of technic, a sympathetic touch and a thoroughly charming platform appearance. With such temperament and a wisely selected program it is not surprising that she was accorded merited praise and that she was the recipient of beautiful flowers. The program held works by Beethoven, Chopin, Vogrich and Liszt.

The dramatic department of the University School of Music gave its first performance on Friday, under the direction of Mr. Prince. presented Byron's "Our Boys."

An evening's entertainment, quaint and highly interesting, was furnished by Grace Greenwood Gore at Curtice Recital Hall, Saturday evening. The surroundings were typical of outdoor Indian life and Mrs. Gore's costume was most appropriate. Her selections, from Cadman and Stewart, were sung with fine feeling and her powerful voice was heard to advantage. She was recalled and sang the "Yosemite" lullaby and was obliged to repeat it. She was assisted by Misses Cox, Emery and Eakin and Mme. Cosgrove, of Chicago, was her accompanist.

The Wesleyan Choral Union has been organized with Mr. Kerns as director. It is planned to give "The Messiah" before the holidays.

Carrie B. Raymond has organized the glee club at the State University and practice has begun in earnest. Stanley Maresh, a graduate under Edward S. Luce, has been selected as pianist. Under the careful leadership of Mrs. Raymond, a good glee club is assured.

Aloys Kremer, of the Lincoln Musical College, will give a piano recital in Temple Theatre, November 5. Mr. Kremer has been heard in four complete programs since coming to Lincoln and the approaching recital will doubtless prove an important event among concert goers.

Many Lincoln friends are mourning the death of Frank King Clark. He was well known here, having married Maud Oakley, of Lincoln, a number of years ago.

Cotner University has just celebrated its twenty-sixth anniversary, when the new concert orchestra made its first appearance and delighted the large audience present.

All are looking forward to the organ recital to be given by Clarence Eddy in the near future, under the Artists' Course of the University School of Music.

437 Fifth Avenue New York City

Hartford.

Hartford, Conn., October 28, 1914.

This city's musical season opened on October 19 with a song recital by U. S. Kerr, the popular basso-cantante. This singer has made many friends here and Unity Hall was well filled on this occasion. The vigorous applause following each song was conclusive proof that the program was greatly enjoyed. The program was as follows: "Kypris," Holmes; "Du bist die Ruh," Schubert; "Die Lotosblume," Schumann; "Widmung," Schumann; "Der Asra," Rubinstein; "Der Sieger," Kahn; "Faith," Chadwick; "I Pagliacci" (prologue), Leoncavallo; "The Gull," Sinding; "The Nightingale," Stephens; "The Night of Love," Schutt; "A Swan," Grieg; "In the Moonlight," Haile; "The Two Grenadiers," Schumann. A. W. Burgmeister was at the piano and rendered as a solo number Liszt's twelfth rhapsody.

A benefit concert for the relief of stricken Belgium was given at Parson's Theatre on October 26. The management of the theatre, the soloists and the Hartford Choral Club very generously gave their services. The soloists were Frances Alda, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; George Rogovoy, cellist; Aladar de Sio, violinist, and Frank Ormsby, tenor; Frank la Forge, accompanist. The program: "At the Altar of Truth" (Mohr), Choral Club; cello soli, andante (Golterman), fantasia (Servias), George Rogovoy; soprano soli, "Je ne suis gu'une Bergere" (Philidor), "Nymphs and Shepherds" (Purcell), "Polly Willis" (Dr. Arne), "The Lass with the Delicate Air" (Dr. Arne), Mme. Alda; violin soli, "Meditation," from "Thais" (Massenet), "For Love of You" (Aladar de Sio), Aladar de Sio; "Songs My Mother Taught Me" (Dvorák), "The Way of the World" (Hatch), Choral Club; soprano soli, "Im Kahne" (Grieg); "Lauf der Welt" (Grieg), berceuse (Moszkowski), "Spinnlied" (Monruszko), gavotte, "Manon" (Massenet), Mme. Alda; cello soli, nocturne (Chopin), "Chanson Neapolitan" (Cascalla), George Rogovoy; soprano soli, "Ouvre Tes Yeux Bleus" (Massenet), "A Des Oiseaux" (Hue), "I Came with a Song," first time (Frank la Forge), "In Pride of May," first time (Frank la Forge), "An Open Secret" (Woodman), Mme. Alda; "Aida," "Celeste Aida" (Verdi), Frank Ormsby; cello soli, cantabile (Cui), tarantelle (Popper), George Rogovoy; soprano soli, "Prayer," from "Tosca" (Puccini), "Un bel di," "Madame Butterfly" (Puccini), Mme. Alda; "Omnipotence" (Schubert), Choral Club and Frank Ormsby, soloist. This was Mme. Alda's first appearance in Hartford and the enthusiasm which followed her first numbers kept steadily increasing until after the La Forge songs, when she was repeatedly recalled. In the Puccini arias the climax of the evening's enjoyment was reached. The splendid work broke down all the reserve of the audience and the singer added still another La Forge song to the list of added numbers. Those who have heard Frank la Forge before as accompanist realize the great inspiration and assistance which he is to an artist. Always playing without notes, he was watched by hundreds in the hall almost as closely as the singer herself. That his work was enjoyed at all times was plainly evident, but after the singing of his two songs there was tremendous applause. The Choral Club of Hartford usually gives a good account of itself and this occasion was no exception. "The Way of the World" was so delightfully done that the audience called for it again. George Rogovoy, cellist, added no small part to the evening's success. His artistic work was listened to with visible enjoyment by the audience and he played Schumann's "Traumerei" as it has seldom been played in this town. The entire concert was satisfying artistically and it is to be hoped financially.

Hartford's most enterprising concert manager, George Kelley, announces the following artists in the World Famous Artists Series at Foot Guard Hall: January 26, Francis Macmillen, Tina Lerner; February 9, Evan Williams, Herbert Witherspoon, Louis Siegel; March 9, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Edward McNamara; April 6, Alma Gluck, Efrem Zimbalist.

H. D. PRENTICE.

Louisville.

Louisville, Ky., October 22, 1914.

The Louisville Music Teachers' Association held its first meeting in Baldwin's Hall on Tuesday evening, the subject for discussion being the standardization of music in the public schools. Caroline Bourgard, supervisor of music in the public schools, assisted by Louise Hollis, was the leader, and the subject was found so interesting that it was continued at the next meeting. The Louisville School Board has accepted the standardization plan, and the teachers of the city have been requested to put it into operation. The officers of the association are Clement Stapleford, president; Emily Davison, vice-president; Sarah McConathy, secretary, and William Conen, treasurer.

On the evening of October 13 the Louisville Quintet Club gave its first concert in the Woman's Club, with the following program: String quartet, op, 27, G minor, Grieg; piano quintet from "Jewels of the Madonna," Wolf-Ferrari, arranged by Karl Schmidt; and piano quintet, vorspiel and "Isolde's Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde," Wagner, arranged by Karl Schmidt. This is the eighth year of the Quintet Club's existence in its present form, and its success is a source of gratification to the music lovers of the city.

An operatic recital was given at the Watterson Hotel on Thursday evening, the program including selections from "Faust," "Tales of Hoffmann," "Otello," "Queen of Sheba" and "King Arthur." A part of Del Riego's song cycle, "Gloria," was also given, and selections from the compositions of Schubert, Rubinstein, Liza Lehmann, Van der Stucken, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Millilotti, Bullard and Wilfred Sanderson. The singers were Mrs. L. E. Daniels, Mrs. C. V. Scavo, Katharine Whipple Dobbs, Lucile Bretney, Ida May Shwind, Laura Beilstein, Dorothy Beilstein, Stella Whitener, Agnew Demarest, Howard E. Jones, Norman Simon and J. E. Hehmann. The performance was enjoyed by an audience that filled the auditorium to the doors.

Louisville, Ky., November 11, 1914.

Myrna Sharlow attracted a large audience to the Woman's Club on October 29, and this was one of the most interesting musical events of the season. Since Miss Sharlow's concert here a year ago, she has had experiences that have broadened her in every way, and her achievement is rapidly justifying the flattering predictions made for her then. As a member of the Century, Boston and Covent Garden Opera Companies she has become well known to the musical world, and her performance of Mimi, when she substituted for Mme. Melba in that trying role, has won for her an enviable position. Her program covered a wide range. The operatic excerpts were "Batti! Batti!" from "Don Giovanni," Antonia's aria from "Tales of Hoffmann," "Bird Song" from "Pagliacci," the prayer from "Tosca," and two arias from "Boheme," in costume. Besides these she offered a group of modern Russian, French, German and English songs, a group of songs by American composers, and a group of old and new folksongs.

The second concert of the Louisville Quintet Club on November 10 was heard by an audience that filled every seat in the auditorium of the Woman's Club. The program included the string quartet, op. 18, No. 5, by Beetboven; two movements from string quartet, op. 13, by Ippolitoff-Ivanow, and Brahms' F minor quintet, op. 34. The members of the Quintet Club are: First violin, Charles Letzler; second violin, Alinde Rudolf; viola, Victor Rudolf; cello, Karl Schmidt; piano, Mrs. J. E. Whitney.

The regular meeting of the Woman's Club on November 11 was devoted to the study of Richard Strauss' opera, "Der Rosenkavalier," the meeting being in charge of Caroline Barbous, chairman of the music committee. The story of the opera was read by Mrs. Ben Atchison, and selections were played on the piano by Miss Barbour and Mrs. Whitney, and sung by Mrs. Richard Bean and Maria McDonald.

Henry Bethuel Vincent gave an organ recital at the Church of the Messiah on the night of November 11, which was enjoyed by a large audience. Mr. Vincent gave an interesting talk on "The Seattle.

Seattle, Wash., November 1, 1914.

This season promises to be very active, although there will be fewer visiting artists than last season. The Ladies' Muical Club will present its series, as usual, the opening number of which was a concert by Mme. Fremstad, who appeared October 1, at the Moore, to a sold out house. This was also the first concert of Mme. Fremstad's tour.

The first concert of the series to be given this year at the University was a song recital by Mme. Claussen, at Meany Hall, October 30.

The Standard Opera has promised four weeks of grand opera, the first occurring October 5 to 11.

Elgar's "King Olaf" and Parker's "Harold Harfargar" have been announced for the People's Chorus, under the direction of W. H. Donley.

The symphony orchestra, under Mr. Spargur, will give at least five concerts beginning in early December. This will be Mr. Spargur's fourth season. These concerts, as before, will feature a soloist.

The Arion, the Amphion, the Maennerchor and other singing societies are rehearsing regularly and will give interesting concerts and a number of our soloists are planning recitals.

One of the most gratifying successes was the first week of opera, given by our own Standard Grand Opera Company at the Metropolitan Theatre early in October. This company composed entirely of Seattle singers and musicians gave "Trovatore," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci" in a manner that would have done credit to an older and more firmly established opera company. The principals in these operas were: Montgomery Lynch, Mrs. Russel, Mrs. Romeyn-Jansen, Mme. Hesse-Sprotte, Theo. Karl Johnston, Neal Begley, G. A. Hastings, Mrs. West, A. A. Nordskog, H. A. Owen, Mrs. Hopper, G. A. Hill, Mrs. McKinstry, Mrs. McGregor, Hiram H. Tuttle, Walter Echart, W. F. Paul, Miss Parker, Miss Greary, E. C. Morck. The chorus, too, did excellent work and contained better voices than are usually heard in chorus. The orchestra, though given only a few rehearsals, was very good. Those upon whom rested the greatest responsibility are B. Sprotte, business manager; Montgomery Lynch, president; John M. Spargur, musical director, and Mme. Hesse-Sprotte, stage director. It is entirely within the mark to say that but for Mme. Hesse-Sprotte there could have been no opera at this time. This gifted, thoroughly routined singer devoted herself unselfishly and enthusiastically to the work of coaching the principals and drilling the chorus and became the keystone of the whole arch. Mrs. Huenkins and Mrs. Montgomery Lynch were the accompanists, whose important work is always an unknown quantity to the layman. The scenery was by the Metropolitan Studios according to plans and designs by B. Sprotte, and the costumes were from Lueben Costuming Company.

The next week of opera will be in January, when "Lohengrin" and "Haensel and Gretel" will each be given four performances.

The Krinke Piano School, which gave up its location in the Empress Building for larger quarters in the Booth Building at the corner of Broadway and Pine street, has added two exceptionally good musicians to its faculty. One is Carl Presley, the other being Mary Carr Moore, the composer, who will have charge of the harmony and counterpoint classes. Mr. Krinke is to be congratulated upon these acquisitions.

Last week the Seattle Federation of Music Clubs gave its first community concert at the Collins Playfield House. The Firemen's Band gave three popular selections. Mrs. H. H. Lemmel sang two numbers and Eugenie Argiewicz, violinist, played one solo. The audience sang "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," "We're Tenting Tonight," "The Battle Cry of Freedom" and "The Old Folks at Home." Milton Seymour was the accompanist.

An evening with Edwin Cahn at the First Presbyterian Church proved to be a talk on the history of the violin and its predecessors, interspersed with violin solos such as "La Folia," Corelli; "Obertass," Wieniawski; "Les Adieux," Sarasate; "Souvenir de Haydn," Leonard, and "luminous views" cast upon a screen. Mr. Cahn plays the violin quite well. Mrs. Cahn was at the door.

Julia Claussen, the Swedish contralto, assisted by Boyd Wells, the Seattle pianist, appeared at Meany Hall, University of Washington, October 30. Mme. Claussen scored a triumph here last season with the Chicago Grand Opera Company. Accordingly we expected much and were not disappointed. Her superb voice, her refined temperament, her inherent good taste, and her queenly bearing makes anything she sings, whether a simple folksong, an operatic aria or a German lied, a positive delight. Each number of her well arranged program was an artistic masterpiece. She was recalled many times and sang four encores which were: "Annie Laurie," "Skogsdufvors Toner," by Merikanto, the Finnish composer; "Aspakers Polska," by Peterson-Berger, and "Ro, Ro, Oegensten," by Sjoegren, both Swedish composers.

Dc Wolf Hopper appeared for a week at the Moore Theatre, in Gilbert and Sullivan operas. There was no substitution, no modernizing nor Americanizing. They were given as they were written.

Columbus.

Columbus, Ohio, October 30, 1914.

The musical season opens formally tonight with a concert in Memorial Hall by Mme. Schumann-Heink. This is the first of a series of concerts which Kate M. Lacey will manage this winter, and the advance sale promises a well filled house to greet the great contralto, who has not appeared in Columbus for several years.

Next Tuesday evening in Memorial Hall, the Women's Music Club will offer as the first attraction of its series, Olive Fremstad, who makes her initial bow to Columbus on that occasion.

Lou McIntyre presided at the Memorial Hall organ on Sunday afternoon, October 18, in the second free municipal concert given by the Women's Music Club. She was tendered a warm reception, as was also Olive Carroll, contralto, who contributed two sacred numbers to the program.

J. B. Francis McDowell, organist of the Central Presbyterian Church, announces a series of free organ recitals the first Friday evening of each month, the first program to be on Friday, November 6.

Last Sunday afternoon at four o'clock Mrs. Wilbur T. Mills gave a most enjoyable vesper organ recital at Broad Street Methodist Church. Her assistant was a singer new to Columbus, Mrs. Forest G. Crowley, soprano.

Next Monday evening in the Public Library Auditorium, Prof. Ludwig Lewisohn, German instructor at Ohio State University, will speak on "The Wagnerian Musical Drama." This is the first lecture of the Women's Music Club extension course for the season. Wagnerian operatic records by Olive Fremstad will serve as illustrations.

The First Congregational Church has secured the services of Rowland W. Dunham, of Boston and Washington, as organist this winter, to succeed Philip Schlich. Mr. Dunham will also open a studio for piano, organ and composition work.

Columbus, Ohio, November 15, 1914.

This afternoon in Memorial Hall, the fourth municipal organ recital will be given under the auspices of the Women's Music Club by Nina Dennis Beatley, organist; Virgilia I. Wallace, contralto, and Ethel Hill Combs, violinist.

Tomorrow (Monday) evening the Extension Department of the Music Club offers Dr. Arnold Gantvoort, lecturer, at the Public Library Auditorium, as a preliminary to the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra concert on Tuesday evening. Dr. Gantvoort will speak on the symphonies of Beethoven, and illustrations will be given on two pianos by Ethel Harness, Hazel Swann, Lulu Aler and Clara Michel.

The Women's Music Club offers as its second artist attraction of the season the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, with Marcian Thalberg, pianist, on Tuesday evening in Memorial Hall. Mr. Thalberg makes his first appearance in Columbus on this occasion, and by special request will play the Saint-Saëns G minor concerto.

John McCormack will be heard on Friday evening of this week in Memorial Hall, as the second attraction in the Kate Lacey series.

Helene Pugh, one of the most talented pianists of this city, returned home last week from Berlin, where she spent the past three years studying under Franz Wilczek. Prior to that time Miss Pugh was a pupil of Fräulein Prentner and Theodore Leschetizky in Vienna. She expects to spend the winter at home, giving concerts and teaching.

Monday evening, November 9, Gounod's "Faust" was given in the Hartman Theatre by the New York Grand Opera Company.

Francis Macmillen, violinist; Edmund Burke, baritone, and Marie Hertenstein, pianist, are to be heard in Memorial Hall, Wednesday evening, November 25.

Two young Columbus musicians, Jessie Peters, pianist, and Georgia Peters, soprano, who recently returned from foreign study, are to give a concert in the Knights of Columbus Hall on the evening of December 7.

The first matinee recital of the Women's Music Club is to take place Tuesday afternoon, November 24. Emily Church Benham.

Denver.

2735 East Colfax Avenue,
Denver, Col., November 9, 1914.

Two noted pianists appeared in Denver during the past week: Rudolph Ganz as soloist with the Denver Philharmonic Orchestra, and Germaine Schnitzer as soloist with the Cavallo Orchestra. An interesting feature of the two concerts was that both artists played the same concerto, Tschaikowsky's, in B flat minor. Both concerts drew large audiences, notwithstanding they were given in the same week. The program given by the Philharmonic Orchestra included the overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," by Gluck; "Orientale," by Cui; berceuse from "L'Oiseau de feu," by Strawinsky; "Danse des Sylphes," by Berlioz, and fantasy, by Tschaikowsky, besides the concerto and a piano group by Mr. Ganz. In the latter group were included his own composition, "The Pensive Spinner," Korngold's "Elves' Dance," Liszt's "Mignon's Lied" and "Rakoczy March." Two encores were added, "Liebestraum," by Liszt, and a Chopin valse.

The Cavallo Orchestra, presenting Germaine Schnitzer, pianist, gave a fine program, composed of Mozart's symphony in G minor; Goldmark's scherzo; "Dich Theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," sung by Alice Brown MacNutt; the Tschaikowsky piano concerto in B flat minor, and a group of solos by Miss Schnitzer. The orchestra did particularly fine work in the concerto. This was verified by Miss Schnitzer in an interview with the writer after the concert, in which she spoke most enthusiastically of Mr. Cavallo and the adequate support given her by the orchestra. Miss Schnitzer will appear in recital at Colorado Springs, Des Moines and Mason City, Ia., before returning to New York.

Announcement is made of the appearance in this city of Charles Wakefield Cadman and Princess Tsianina Redfeather, the young Indian mezzo-soprano, in their American Indian Music-Talk, at the Central Christian Church on Tuesday evening, November 17. Mr. Cadman's recently published trio in D major for violin, cello and piano will be given its first public performance here on this occasion.

MUSICAL COURIER

VOL. LXIX.—NO. 22. NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1914. WHOLE NO. 1810.

BERLIN'S WARTIME CONCERTS CONTINUE WITH REGULARITY.

Musical Performances Draw Large Audiences and Are Received with Enthusiasm—Richard Strauss Conducts—Lilli Lehmann's Remarkable Powers—Willy Hess' Quartet Concert.

Jenaer Str. 21,
Berlin, October 25, 1914.

The concerts of the week included several of great interest, as the opening evening of the series of ten given by the Royal Orchestra, under Richard Strauss; the first of Hausegger's concerts with the Blüthner Orchestra; the soirées of the Arnold Rosé Quartet, of Vienna, and the Willy Hess Quartet; also the opening concert of the season of the Berlin Society of Music friends, which was conducted by Ernst Wendel, of Bremen, with Franz von Vecsey as soloist; finally a concert given by Fritz Steinbach with the Philharmonic Orchestra and Lilli Lehmann as soloist. The "Eroica" symphony was played in Berlin no less than six times in two days, on Sunday and Monday, twice each by the Royal, the Philharmonic, and the Blüthner Orchestra under Strauss, Steinbach and Hausegger.

The Strauss Concert.

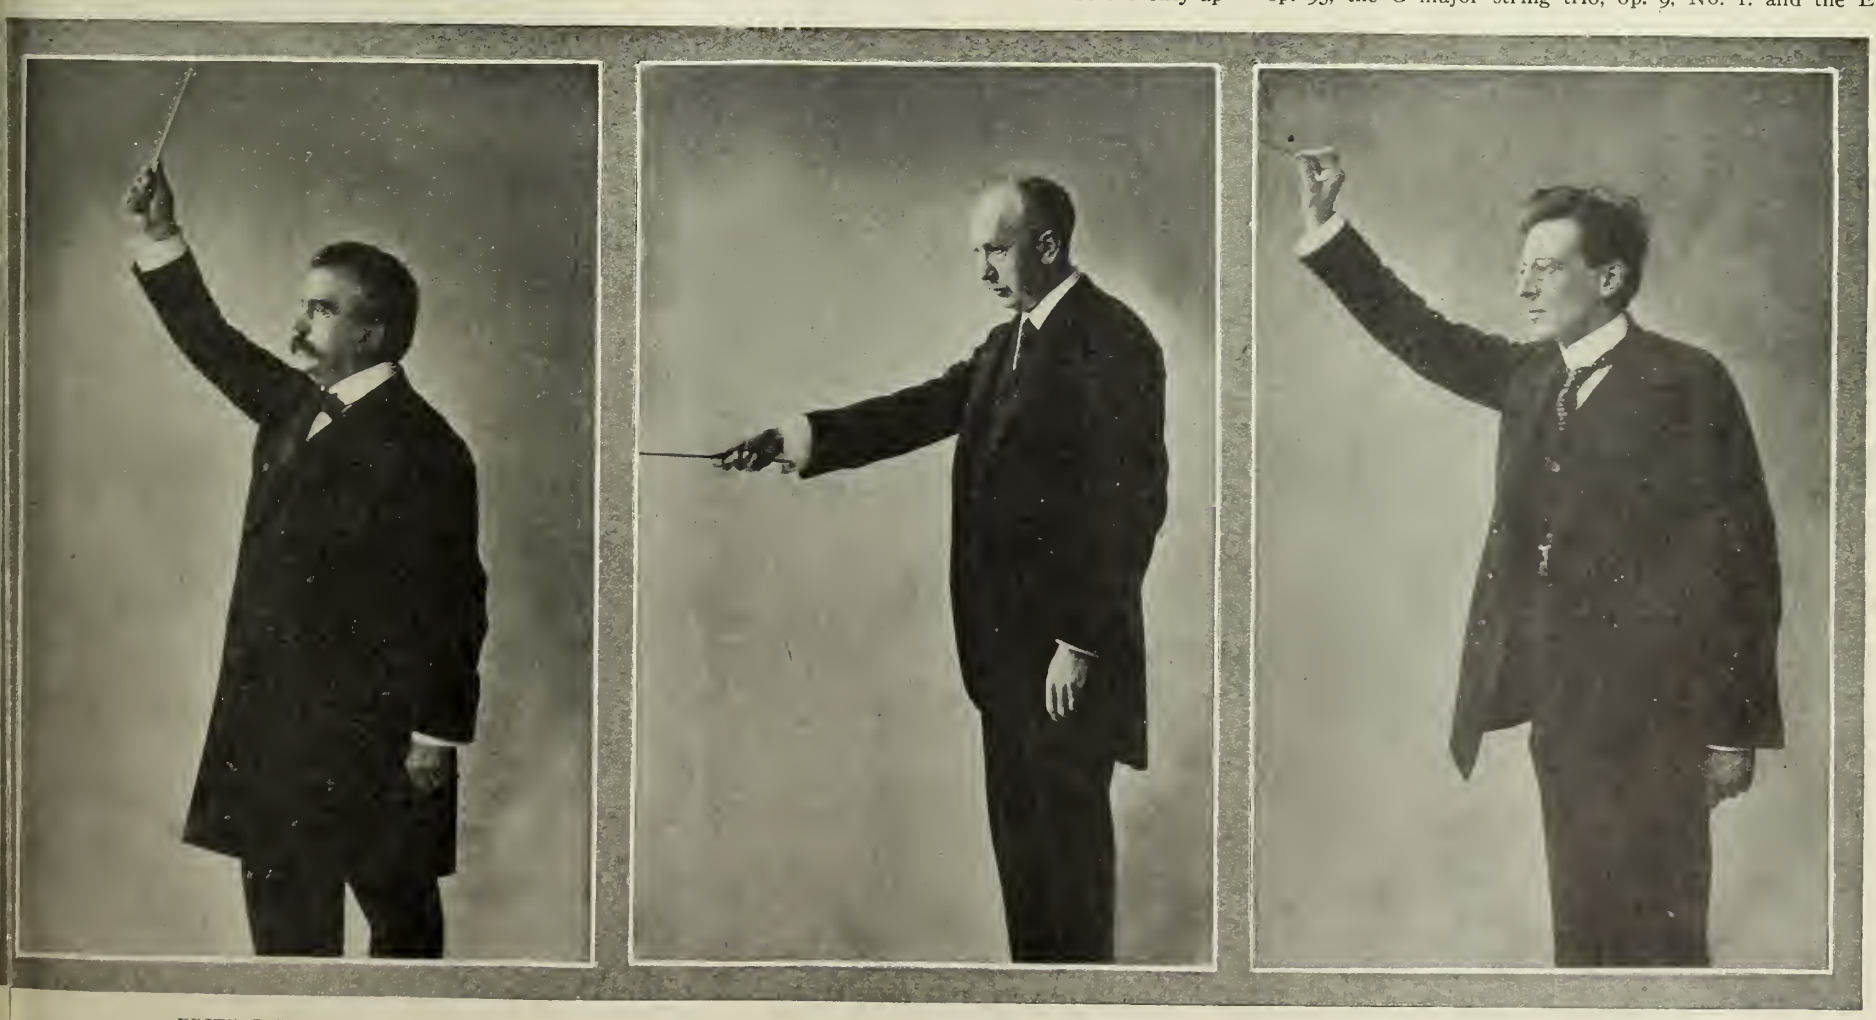
Just as in times of peace, the first concert of the Royal Orchestra was sold out. Strauss presented a typically German program, consisting of the "Freischütz" overture, the "Eroica," Haydn's "Military" symphony and Wagner's Kaisermarsch." The orchestra was in fine form, and Strauss seemed at his best. He gave a magnificent performance of the "Freischütz," in particular. In the funeral march of the "Eroica," the tragic grandeur was missed that Nikisch makes one feel through and through. But very effective was Strauss' performance of the "Kaisermarsch." On the whole it was an impressive concert.

Lilli Lehmann Sings.

Lilli Lehmann, according to Riemann, was born in 1842, she now is seventy-two years old. When she appeared the platform of the Philharmonie on Monday evening, she did not look a day over sixty, and she sang like a woman of thirty-five. The celebrated diva seems rejuvenated. The "Ocean" aria, from "Oberon," by Weber, and "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio," were her selections, and rarely have they been heard so impressively. That was vocal art of the highest order. What breath control, what superb phrasing, what beautiful portamenti, and what a fine attack. That was real bel canto. Mme. Lehmann received a well deserved ovation. The orchestral numbers embraced Bach's "Brandenburg" concerto in G major, the Brahms-Haydn variations, and the "Eroica." Steinbach is not a Nikisch, a Strauss, or a Hausegger, but he is a conductor possessing many strong and individual attributes. He gave an admirable performance of the Brahms variations. The concert was well attended.

Rosé Quartet in the Classics.

When Arnold Rosé and his three associates appeared on the stage of the Singakademie on Wednesday evening, they received a welcome such as never before was given them in Berlin. The venerable Singakademie was filled to overflowing, and it was a typically German audience which expressed its sympathies for the Austrians. It was one of the heartiest ovations I ever have witnessed in Berlin. The Vienna players very appropriately began their program with Haydn's "Kaiser" quartet. The familiar tune to which the Germans sing: "Deutschland, Deutschland über alles" and the Austrians' "Gott erhalte Franz, den Kaiser" was beautifully delivered amid a most impressive silence. Each of the four men from Vienna is an artist of the first rank and a master of his instrument. I never have heard the "Kaiser" quartet under more ideal conditions. The other numbers were Beethoven's E flat (op. 24) and Mozart's B flat quartets, both of which were played with consummate finish and a perfect ensemble.



The program announced that this would be the only appearance of the Rosé Quartet during this season, but the hearty reception and the large audience of the concert will, it is to be hoped, induce the four artists to come again.

Hausegger Conducts.

To gain a strong and lasting foothold in Berlin is a difficult matter for any musician, even in times of peace, and now it is of course doubly hard. Sigmund von Hausegger, however, is making his way here, and this is as it should be, for he is a conductor of rare abilities. The opening concert of his series with the Blüthner Orchestra was better attended than was his first concert of last season, and the conductor was received with marked enthusiasm. His program embraced Gluck's overture to "Iphigenie in Aulis," Mozart's D major symphony and the "Eroica." In the funeral march of the "Eroica," Hausegger on Sunday noon did the very opposite of what Strauss did on Sunday evening. Hausegger read it with almost too much feeling, if such were possible. The Mozart symphony was played with charm and delicacy. Hausegger is above all a musician of refinement. The beautiful "Iphigenie" overture was given with the Wagner finale.

Willy Hess in Chamber Music.

On the following evening the first chamber music concert of the Willy Hess Quartet was given at the same hall. Albert Stoessel, the second violin of this organization, is an American; the other members are Richard Heber (viola) and Max Baldner (cello). Under the admirable leadership of Willy Hess, who is a first class quartet player, the artists have developed their ensemble to a remarkable degree of perfection. They play with great refinement and warmth of expression. They were heard in a Beethoven program, consisting of the F minor quartet, op. 95, the G major string trio, op. 9, No. 1. and the E

CINCINNATI ORCHESTRA VISITS SEVERAL CITIES.

Dr. Kunwald and Players Score Success on Tour—Recent Happenings in Local Musical Circles.

Cincinnati, Ohio, November 19, 1914.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Ernst Kunwald, conductor, is on tour this week, playing in Cleveland, Toledo, Zanesville, Columbus and Springfield, Ohio. Glowing reports of the orchestra's success have reached Cincinnati. The soloists appearing at the various concerts on tour are: Marie Hertenstein, pianist; Edmund Burke, baritone; Francis Macmillen, violinist; Marcian Thalberg, pianist; Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, and Florence Hinkle, soprano. The orchestra returns Saturday and the first popular concert will be given Sunday in Music Hall.

FRIEDBERG TO GIVE RECITAL.

The announcement is made that Carl Friedberg, pianist, who lately appeared here with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, achieving a brilliant success, will return for a recital in Memorial Hall, December 9.

AN ORGAN RECITAL.

The event of the week at the College of Music was the organ recital of Lillian Arkell Rixford, last Tuesday night. Mrs. Rixford was assisted by Giacinto Gorno, a member of the College of Music faculty, whose rich and well placed baritone voice was heard to good advantage.

SAAR COMPOSITIONS FEATURED.

Louis Victor Saar was honored by the Pleasant Ridge Musical Club last week, when the club gave an entire afternoon of his compositions, with the composer at the piano. The versalitility of Mr. Saar was well demonstrated in the program, which included six groups of songs: "Gondoliera," for two violins and piano, six Swedish folksongs, trios for women's voices and three selections from Mr. Saar's suite, op. 27, for piano for four hands, played with splendid ensemble by Mr. and Mrs. Saar.

STILLMAN KELLEY BACK FROM NEW YORK.

Edgar Stillman Kelley returned to Cincinnati yesterday, after an inspiring week in New York, where he attended the annual meeting of the National Institute of Arts and Letters, of which he is a charter member. President William Dean Howells was successful in making the session just closed one of the most important events in the history of the institute. Mr. Kelley was the guest at a large number of interesting gatherings, bringing together the leaders in science, art and literature of this country, in addition to attending the regular sessions. Mr. Kelley's composition class at the Cincinnati Conservatory this season embraces considerable leading talent and he plans for splendid results.

CURRENT NOTES.

John A. Hoffmann will present his gifted young pupil, Helen Portune, soprano, in recital at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, Wednesday evening, December 2. Particular points of interest in her program will be a group of Strauss, Debussy and Tirindelli, and an aria from Charpentier's "Louise."

Marcian Thalberg won high honors as soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra at Columbus last Tuesday evening. Mr. Thalberg is a virtuoso of international reputation and his playing always evokes a high pitch of enthusiasm, as demonstrated again in Columbus. Combining brilliancy, refinement and poetry with authoritative musicianship, he commands the qualifications which make for continued and permanent success. Mr. Thalberg accepted a professorship on the artist faculty of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music last season, since which time he has made himself deeply felt in this section of the country.

Thursday evening, December 3, is announced as the date of a piano recital to be given at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music by Leo Paalz. His program, presenting eighteenth century compositions of Bach, Daquin, Rameau and Paradies, a group of Haydn, Schumann and Chopin, and closing with a modern Russian group, offers an interesting variety.

Chevalier Tirindelli, John A. Hoffmann, Helen May Curtis, Marcian Thalberg and Dr. Fery Lulek presented pupils in a highly creditable recital at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music yesterday afternoon. Those taking part were: Emelie Rose Knox, Lena Palmer, Lida Fuhr, Emily Martin, Adele Angert, Hazel Clinger, Constance Baur and Lilias Fry.

Chester Moffett, a baritone of exceptional promise at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, will be heard in recital on Tuesday evening, December 15.

Yvonne de Tréville in Washington.

Atmosphere—the atmosphere of three periods of song—is the keynote of interest that centers in Mlle. Yvonne de Tréville's performances. In her appearance at the Columbia Theatre yesterday afternoon, these periods, the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth centuries were represented in costume and in song.

In the eighteenth century representation, the highly elaborate costume of the Louis XIV period was in pleasing harmony with the pretty conventional sentiment of the "Menuet Chante" of Lulli, the "Phillis" of Anthony Young, and Henry Carey's "Pastorale," and the quaint curtsy of perfect grace of Mlle. de Tréville was but a convincing element to an already perfect eighteenth century atmosphere.

In the songs of the nineteenth century, the "Theme" with variations of Proch, and the mad scene from "Camp of Silesia," of Meyerbeer, gave Mlle. de Tréville an opportunity to take those remarkable vocal flights for which she is celebrated. Trills and roulades, rapid flights up and down the scale; every difficulty known to coloratura was displayed with ease and facility. In contrast with these flights of vocal gymnastics were three beautiful Scandinavian folksongs. In this group of songs Mlle. de Tréville wore a costume reminiscent of the Jenny Lind period.

The twentieth century was represented by an aria from Charpentier's "Louise," Cadman's "Thistledown," Frances Wyman's "Song of Spring," "Auf der Bleiche" of Bungert-Carmen Sylva, and a "Chanson Provencale" of Dell' Acqua. These were given in a costume of ultra contemporary style. In the last named song the clarity and beauty and the flexibility of Mlle. de Tréville's voice was greatly enhanced by style and diction. It was one of her best performances of which Wymann's "Song of Spring" was another.—Washington Herald, November 18, 1914.

The costume song recital given at the Columbia Theatre yesterday afternoon by Mlle. Yvonne de Tréville, and which she called "Three Centuries of Prime-Donne," presented quite a new page in music to her hearers; new, in paradox, because it was so old. Then, too, Miss de Tréville is a coloratura soprano of a type that is rare today and . . . the facility of her art, her phrasing and style, and the warmth of her lower register all combine to make her a very interesting artist. . . .

But the Jenny Lind period was the most distinctive for novelty, and the Meyerbeer aria, the mad scene from "Camp of Silesia," which was composed for Jenny Lind, was beautifully handled, her trills being particularly fine. In response to an encore Miss de Tréville accompanied herself in a "Shepherd Song," on old Swedish folksong that surely belongs to song birds, not peasants, with its difficult echo effects. The three Scandinavian folksongs were full of beauty, and the Proch theme and variations were well executed.

In Charpentier's air from "Louise," "Depuis le jour," . . . the reading and the dramatic spirit made it a most artistic interpretation. Two songs in English by Cadman and Frances Wyman showed the Miss de Tréville "as herself" to be quite as much a picture as the dames of other days. The Bungert song which Carmen Sylva, Queen of Roumania, arranged for this artist, was most dramatic, while the "Chanson Provencale" (Dell 'Acqua) was a spirited close to the program.—The Washington Post, November 18, 1914.

Mlle. de Tréville has a sweet and resonant voice of high culture, which she uses exquisitely in pianissimo effects, with quaint witchery as an actress. . . .

While every selection was warmly applauded, the second group of songs, which gave the best display of Mlle. de Tréville's technic, and the last group, which served to present her in the most attractive light, were possibly the favorites. The very hearty applause following the second group won from Mlle. de Tréville an encore, for which she played her own accompaniment.—The Evening Star, Washington, November 18, 1914. Giulia Valda Coming to New York.

Giulia Valda, singing teacher of the Lamperti-Valda School of Singing in Paris, sailed for New York on November 28 on the steamship Rochambeau. Mme. Valda, who has a large number of American pupils who have not been able to go to Paris owing to the war, comes to New York for the purpose of locating here temporarily. Most of her pupils have been hoping to return to Paris, but at present that is impossible, and hence they have petitioned her to come to this country, as they wish to continue their studies with her. Mme. Valda is well known on this side of the ocean, having formerly been connected with important opera organizations.

bration of her own on Thanksgiving Day, November 26, because she was not "among those present."

Miss Willard had a successful school at her Michigan summer home in Union City, which closed with a reception given to 150 guests, at which her talented Battle Creek pupil, Veda Roe, was heard in a program.

It may be interesting to mention that Miss Willard has prepared some interesting French and Russian novelties for her programs this season. Her pupil, Clara Len, started in October on a transcontinental lyceum tour, but on the third date of the season was struck by a train in Madison, Wis., and thrown into Lake Winona. She was unconscious for several days, but has had a miraculous recovery.

Horatio Connell in Olean.

Mr. Connell is the possessor of a magnificent vocal organ of splendid range, mellow and rich even when pitched to the highest notes. He brought to his hearers the true oratorio style compelling in dignity, and held the large audience in perfect quiet to the dying out of the last note.

In Schubert and Schumann selections Mr. Connell again commanded his audience, singing with consummate art, which means breath control, phrasing and depth of feeling. Mr. Connell is a singer of serious work, and has the voice and art to give an evening of Schubert and Schumann and compel attention—a rare ability. It is a voice and art that grows on his hearers even after the evening is past and which leaves a happy chord vibrating in the memory.—Olean (N. Y.) Times, November 19, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Schumann-Heink's Washington Tribute.

That Mme. Schumann-Heink is dear to the hearts of the public was shown by the capacity house that greeted her at her song recital at the New National yesterday afternoon when a large number of persons stood throughout the concert. Probably no other contralto ever has made so strong an appeal, and the wondrous depth of her great voice, though it has lost some of its breadth and volume, yet interprets with the same dramatic purpose and spirit that always have infused her singing and have made her beloved, whether it be for the warm glow of the music of her Fatherland, or the charming diction in the tongue of this her adopted country.

Except for the "My Heart Ever Faithful" (Bach) in oratorio style, her first group was composed of opera arias, the "Che Faro Senza Eurydice" from "Orpheus" of Gluck, which she sang in German, and three arias from "Samson and Delilah" (Saint-Saëns), a delightful selection, for it put one into the spirit of the opera and sustained the atmosphere, culminating in a beautiful rendition of "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice," to which she responded, for encore, with an old seventeenth century "Spinner Liedchen," which brought out her delightful genial humor.

One seldom hears now the Schumann cycle "Frauenliebe und Leben"; it takes wealth of imagination to give it, and Mme. Schumann-Heink, after the rich depths of the final "Forsaken," received recall after recall, but she never adds to this cycle. The Wolf song in her final group brought out the big and deep voice that we love to hear. Its climax was splendid, and the dramatic dignity of "Dawn in the Desert" (Gertrude Ross) was impressive. Three other English songs completed the program. "His Lullaby," by request (Bond), "An Irish Folksong" (Arthur Foote), and "Good Morning, Sue" (Delibes), which were all most artistically given. Then Mme. Schumann-Heink sang tenderly the dear German "Stille Nacht, Heilige Nacht" and "The Rosary," by request.—Washington Post, November 21, 1914.

The first number was the rarely heard but exquisitely beautiful "My Heart Ever Faithful," of J. S. Bach. A more or less conventional song, it has an accumulative climactic charm and a fine religious sentiment, all of which Mme. Schumann-Heink ably brought out.

The melodious "Ach ich habe sie verloren," from Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice," was followed by three arias from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah," sung in a German version. The strength of fiber, the clear warmth of voice, and the dramatic power of these arias, the last of which is the universally known "Mon Coeur," attest the marvelous training of the famous contralto.

A debt of gratitude to Mme. Schumann-Heink must be acknowledged for giving the far too rarely heard, and one of the greatest of song cycles ever written, the "Frauenliebe und Leben," of Robert Schumann, one of his greatest musical poems. . . .

The pianist, Katherine Hoffmann, played the exacting accompaniment of this masterpiece in intelligent sympatby, with subtle change of dramatic expression. The "Heimweh" of Hugo Wolf, the "Dawn in the Desert" of Gertrude Ross, "His Lullaby" of C. J. Bond, the "Irish Folksong" of Arthur Foote, and "Good Morning, Sue," by Delibes, brought to a close one of the most perfect musical afternoons thus far of the season; and the people, loath to depart, were doubly rewarded for a warm appreciation with "Heilige Nacht" and "The Rosary." The encore that won a laughing applause early in the program was a sixteenth century "Spinneliedchen," a German folksong.—Washington Herald, November 21, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Cornelius van Vliet's Many Engagements.

Cornelius van Vliet, the Dutch cellist, has been busy since the beginning of the season. He appeared in recital on November 2, before the Woman's Musical Club at Winnipeg; on November 10 with Jenny Dufau, soprano, he gave a joint recital at Atchison, Kan.; on November 17 he appeared in a recital in St. Joseph, Mo.; on December 15 he will give a joint recital in Cincinnati, Ohio, with Julia Culp before the Matince Musicale; on January 6, a recital before the Thursday Musical Club, of Minneapolis; on January 11, a recital at La Crosse, Wis. His annual appearance at the Friday symphony concert of the Minneapolis Orchestra will take place on Friday, December 18. Mr. van Vliet appeared at the beginning of the month in Winnipeg and following are some press comments which show the success he won with the public and press alike:

CORNELIUS VAN VLIET.

The Women's Musical Club opened its season yesterday afternoon at the Fort Garry Hotel with a large attendance and a great musician to furnish the program. Cornelius van Vliet, the Dutch cellist is not a stranger to Winnipeg, having appeared here with excellent success as a soloist of the Minneapolis Orchestra. The impression he made last spring was deepened, and his local reputation considerably enhanced by his splendid recital yesterday afternoon. His program was calculated to appeal to a musically educated audience, every number being of fine quality, and his playing left practically nothing to be desired.

Mr. van Vliet's most notable offering was a sonata by G. Valentini. . . . In all respects the Dutch artist apparently fulfilled the requirements of the Italian composition. His tone was almost flawless in its purity, crispness and beauty, whether in the long-drawn notes that are particularly appealing on the cello, or in the sprightly staccato and spiccato effects in which parts of the work abound. The daintiness and delicacy of the playing of some of these passages was technically remarkable and musically charming. Mr. van Vliet seems to find a triumphant pleasure in doing all his work with a maximum of neatness, but there is no sacrifice of music to technic, the latter being evidently regarded merely as a means to musical excellence. The double trills and other difficulties were mastered with admirable ease, yet the final impression was that of a beautiful composition beautifully, sympathetically and appreciatively performed.

The rest of the program included works that were quite new, such as J. Schravezande's "Elegie," and a polonaise by W. Jeral, and some that have been in existence for years, by Mozart, Martini and Leclair. In all of them the artist played with the same technical and musical excellence. The consensus of opinion in the case of all who heard him yesterday must be that he is very hard to beat.—Manitoba Free Press, Winnipeg, Tuesday, November 3, 1914.

Cornelius van Vliet, the Dutch cellist, gave a delightful hour's recital as the opening contribution of the Women's Musical Club at the Fort Garry yesterday afternoon. . . . The large audience completely filled the concert room, and interest in the recital was made manifest by frequent and generous applause, to which Mr. van Vliet responded twice with acceptable encores. . . . He displayed marked technical skill, while the beauty of his tonal expression of poetic interpretation were perfectly charming. Leclair's "Sarabande" . . . was another strong number, while Schravezande's "Elegie" . . . drew forth expressions of keen delight. . . . Mr. van Vliet's interpretation of MacDowell's "A Deserted Farm" was particularly effective. . . . Seldom, indeed, has the Musical Club had so uniformly excellent program as that provided by Mr. van Vliet.—The Evening Telegram, Winnipeg, November 3, 1914.

No more consummate artist on that beautiful instrument, the violoncello, has been heard in this city than Cornelius van Vliet. . . .

His playing . . . characterized by a lovely large tone, extraordinary left hand facility and certainty, combined with absolute purity of intonation, and a bold and brilliant, but always legitimate style of bowing which revealed the temperament of the artist beyond compare.

The two pieces by the American composer, MacDowell, were exquisitely played in marked contrast to the rhythmical virility of the Popper "Mazurka," in which some intricate bowing was displayed. But it was the Mozart "Menuet" that won most favor through the ethereal delicacy of its performance, and there was an intense desire for its repetition which did not, however, prevail.—The Winnipeg Tribune, Tuesday, November 3, 1914.

But nature, aided by diligent culture, has been very generous to Mr. van Vliet, for the ordinary terms used in criticism, such as brilliance, virtuosity and others are commonplace and inutile when applied to him.

A master of technic, he takes it for a medium only, and tries to hide difficulties as much as other performers like to show them up. . . .

Every number . . . in the program was specialized with the skill of a master in full control over a beautiful instrument.—Winnipeg Saturday Post, November 7, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Cecil Fanning in Toronto.

Cecil Fanning, the talented American baritone, made a return visit to Toronto last night in a recital at Massey Hall. There was a very appreciative audience, who were sensitive to the emotional and oratorical art of the singer. Mr. Fanning has the faculty of making a just mean between the value of the musical contents of a song and the expressiveness of its words and sentiment. In this respect, he may be classed with Bispham, Plunkett Greene and Henschel. In his first group he gave representative operatic arias by Montoverde, Gretz, Verdi and Massenet, covering a period of more than two hundred years, but which happily illustrated the unity of true melodic style and grace. These Italian numbers were sung with vocal charm and significance of expression. His second group was devoted to Russian songs, two by Rachmaninoff and one by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The "Song to India," by Korsakoff, was a beautiful exposition of refined and yet characteristic charm. The Rachmaninoff songs commanded respect and interest—interest that would no doubt be increased by acquaintance. Mr. Fanning's great success of the evening was in Loewe's ballade, "Edward," his interpretation of which was a vivid dramatic exposition of the gruesome story of the song, and also a finely adjusted vocal effort in contrast. A welcome novelty was found in two songs by our Toronto musician, Dr. Gutzeit, a setting of Goldsmith's "The Gift," and his satirical "Elegy." These numbers, accompanied by the composer, evoked enthusiasm. Mr. Fanning's final group consisted of numbers by Sidney Homer, Charles Willeby, Maude V. White and Arthur Whiting, which revealed his versatility in interpreting English song. Encores were numerous. Mr. Fanning's accompaniments, with the exception already noted, were played by Mr. Turpin, whose sympathetic collaboration has had much to do with the success of the vocalist.—The Globe, Toronto, November 20, 1914.

Song interpreters who can be uniformly interesting in a long and varied program are so rare that a visit from Cecil Fanning is a genuine red letter day in the musical season. . . . Mr. Fanning's baritone voice is particularly tender and expressive, and merely as an instrument for melody it would furnish keen delight, but Mr. Fanning makes use of it with a fine intelligence. He has the happy faculty of being able to throw himself into the mood of his selections, whether they are intensely dramatic or light and humorous. He is in every way a song interpreter of rare and compelling gifts.

The program presented last night served to display every side of Mr. Fanning's art. Mr. Fanning showed . . . that he has in a marked degree the power of visualizing the scenes that he is treating in song. His singing . . . was masterly in its subtle suggestion of every thought. . . . Mr. Fanning is never happier than when singing folksongs. . . .

Two novelties were presented during the evening in the form of settings to poems of Oliver Goldsmith, "The Gift" and "An Elegy." . . . Mr. Fanning did them in a whimsical manner, with the composer at the piano. Mr. Turpin, the invaluable accompanist who always travels with the singer, assisted in the interpretation of the other songs.—The Mail and Empire, Toronto, November 20, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Marguerite Dunlap for Lockport.

As signal proof that merit always wins its way, the case of Marguerite Dunlap, the charming young Southern contralto, is most emphatically a case in point. Miss Dunlap believes in hard work and honest development along all lines of musical endeavor. In this way when she is called upon she is always ready and always "makes good."

MARGUERITE DUNLAP,
Contralto.

To prove this contention by concrete facts comes her recent hearing by Manager Van de Mark, of Lockport, N. Y. As is well known, the course sponsored by this indefatigable gentleman is one of the best in the country. Therefore the fact that he managed her immediately for the closing concert of his series, March 29, speaks for itself.

Among the other dates booked for Miss Dunlap are December 30, Trenton, N. J., and April 28, Orange, N. J.

The latest Dunlap appearance, an exceptionally successful one, was at Yonkers, N. Y., on November 29.

Granberry School Events.

Special Granberry School (New York) announcements are included in the following:

Wednesday, December 2, at 10.30 o'clock, Methods-Lecture, "Preparation for and Presentation of the Staff," Mr. Granberry.

A Gabrilowitsch Success.

At Aeolian Hall, New York, on Wednesday evening, November 25, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, pianist, and Clara Gabrilowitsch, contralto, gave a joint recital, to which a large audience listened with the closest attention and sustained interest, interrupted frequently with prolonged outbursts of applause.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, famous throughout the musical world as one of the greatest pianists of the day, and one of the most eminent musical artists from the land of Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky, Elman and Zimbalist, is presumably innocently ignorant of the New York public's cherished habit of arriving at the concert hall at the last possible moment before the door closes. Whether it is because the interval between the closing of the business house and the opening of the hall is too short, or whether it is an American idiosyncrasy to waste none of that valuable time which is synonymous with money, is not known. But the result at the concert is that when the program is begun at the advertised hour fully one-third of the audience misses the beginning. On this occasion a good sized audience filled many erstwhile vacant seats as soon as the doors were opened after the pianist had finished Beethoven's sonata, op. 81, which he played without a break.

If Ossip Gabrilowitsch can reform the public's punctuality he is to be commended for his noble aim. But if he cannot do so, it might be as well to wait for the great audience which is sure to flock to the concert room whenever an artist of the rank of Ossip Gabrilowitsch is announced.

Those who arrived too late to be admitted when the doors were closed for Beethoven's sonata, op. 81—"Les Adieux, L'Absence, Le Retour"—missed not only a genial work, but a delightful interpretation of it. The fact that this sonata is not so well known as the "Waldstein" or the "Appassionata" indicates that its beauties are less obvious and that its success is more dependent on an exceptionally fine performance than are the two great sonatas every student of the piano attempts. Ossip Gabrilowitsch does not perform all compositions in the same way, and merely as means of expressing his own musical feelings and enthusiasm. Like a skilful actor, he sinks as far as possible his own personality in that of the composer whose work he is interpreting. But, of course, an artistic personality as great as that of Ossip Gabrilowitsch cannot be submerged, no matter how conscientiously the pianist may try to speak only in the idiom of the composer he is interpreting.

That is why the works performed on this occasion were so unusually interesting; for the public heard not only Beethoven, Schumann and Chopin, but heard them plus the musical and sympathetic Gabrilowitsch. It was as if a banker had paid more than the money order called for, instead of charging his clients a little interest on the transaction.

But even the glowing passion and clear phrasing of an Ossip Gabrilowitsch can make Schumann's G minor sonata of more than passing interest. Was it to this sonata that Wagner referred when he said that Schumann's treatment of the piano "grated" on his ears? The work does not grate, but it certainly is not grateful. There are passages of great breadth, energy and warmth. It is doubtful, however, if the composer was moved by much inspiration when constructing this work, for the hall mark of inspiration—a Schumannesque manner and personality—is only weakly in evidence. Nothing but superb interpretation saved the work from the disaster of tedium. In avoiding the hackneyed works which are popular the pianist ran the risk of being gored by the other horn of the dilemma. His splendid performance, however, carried him through in triumph.

After his third group, twelve preludes from Chopin's op. 28, the pianist was unable to resist the clamorous demand of the audience for more. Seldom, if ever, have these perennially fresh and fragrant flowers from Chopin's enchanted garden been more acceptable than when Ossip Gabrilowitsch presented them to his delighted audience at Aeolian Hall last Wednesday. By what authority did the pianist play E flat instead of the E natural, as found in all the printed versions in the fourth beat of the third measure in the melody of Chopin's twenticth prelude?—the famous largo in C minor. It was evidently intentional and could not have been a slip of the finger. If the pianist is right, why are the published notes still wrong at this late date?

Clara Gabrilowitsch, the contralto, had a triple claim on the interest of the public. Even if she was not the refined and sympathetic artists which she unquestionably is, she would still be welcome as the daughter of the world famous Mark Twain, and the wife of the great artist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch. In some respects she is like the banker Mendelssohn, who proudly called himself the son of a famous father and the father of a famous son. His wealth was his own. In a like manner Clara Gabrilowitsch is an artist in her own inalienable right, notwithstanding the renown of her father and the fame of her husband. Nevertheless, one cannot see the image of the father stamped on the brows of the daughter without a kindlier feeling and an added sympathy for the artist.

The songs she sang were: Beethoven's aria, "Ah, Perfido," Brahms' "Four Gypsy Songs," Fauré's "Automne," Debussy's "Mandoline" and Henschel's "Morning Hymn." She was again and again recalled to the platform to acknowledge the vigorous and insistent applause. In fact, she was obliged to repeat Brahms' fourth gypsy song before the concert could proceed.

The accompaniments to the songs were played by the pianist himself, who was evidently of the opinion that no accompaniment could be too good for his wife's art as a vocalist. This joint recital was one which will live long in the memories of those who were fortunate enough to hear it.

Mammoth Organ Arrives in San Francisco.

Five freight cars transported the mammoth pipe organ to be installed in Festival Hall, for the recitals to be given during the Panama-Pacific International Exposition at San Francisco. Felix Lechtenstein and Fletcher Tilton, representing the Austin Organ Company, of Hartford, Conn., are setting it up. The instrument is to be donated to the city and will later be moved to the million dollar memorial auditorium in the Civic Center of San Francisco. It is said to be one of the four largest pipe organs in the world, and the second largest in America, 50 feet wide, 24 feet deep and 70 feet high, containing 7,000 pipes and 114 stops. The largest pipe is 35 feet long and weighs 1,200 pounds.

Facts About Faure.

Jean Baptiste Faure, baritone, and for many years one of the favorites at the Paris Grand Opera, passed away recently in that city, as the MUSICAL COURIER recorded briefly at the time. Faure was born at Moulins, January 15, 1830, and in 1852 took a first prize in the vocal class at the Conservatoire. Beginning his career at the Opera Comique he sang in "Le Chalet," "Le Cäid," "Le Chien du Jardinier," "Manon Lescaut" (Auber), "Valentine d'Aubigny," "Le Sylphe," "L'Etoile du Nord," "Joconde," "Le Cousin de Marivaux," "Quentin Durward," "Le Pardon de Ploërmel."

After some London appearances, Faure joined the forces of the Paris Grand Opera in 1861 and sang there in "Pierre de Medicis," "La Favorite," "Boise," "L'Africaine," "Don Giovanni," "Don Carlos," "Hamlet," "La Coupe du Roi de Thule," "Guillaume Tell," "La Muette," "Faust," "Jeanne d'Arc," etc. Faure also was a professor at the Paris Conservatoire.

Germaine Schnitzer Admired in the West.

Germaine Schnitzer was the soloist of a recent Cavallo Orchestra concert at Denver, Col., when she played the Tschaikowsky concerto and scored completely.

At Colorado Springs, Miss Schnitzer played at the beautiful home of Mrs. Spencer Penrose, sister-in-law of Senator Penrose, of Pennsylvania. Return engagements for the spring had to be arranged.

Miss Schnitzer's Denver press notices follow:

Germaine Schnitzer, soloist with Cavallo's Orchestra, yesterday afternoon at the Broadway Theatre, lived up to her great reputation. In her we have an example of the brilliant musician—temperament is her middle name—and this resiliency permeates herself and her work. Her hands are wonderful instruments, steel springs in velvet cases, seemingly independent, and yet what a brain force behind them!—The Denver (Col.) Times, November 7, 1914.

Germaine Schnitzer covered herself with glory at yesterday's symphony concert. She played the great concerto by Tschaikowsky with fire and fervency. . . .

It was a great performance yesterday, however, almost electrical in its musical splendor. The artist, in personality, was beautiful, her glorious arms and her authoritative hands, which suggest Carreño, made her an attractive figure. Further, she seemed to have all the dreamy, almost tragic sentiment of the Slavonic composer. Schnitzer was decidedly superb.—The Denver (Col.) Post, November 7, 1914.

. . . It has been said of Mme. Schnitzer that her sense of rhythm is so strong that she simply sweeps an orchestra along with her by the force of her own magnetism and this was quite true in her work of yesterday.

Her group for piano comprised three Chopin numbers and Liszt's "Venezia Napoli." As an encore to these she graciously played "Toccata" by Saint-Saëns.—The Rocky Mountain News, Denver, Col., November 7, 1914. (Advertisement.)

McConnell Pupils Heard in Concert.

A large and appreciative audience, consisting of pupils and friends of the New York Association for the Blind, 111 East Fifty-ninth street, attended a concert at that institution on Tuesday evening, November 24. Minnie M. McConnell, besides taking part in several quartet numbers, presented the following pupils: Henriette Goodhart, first soprano; Helen F. Clery, mezzo-soprano, and Harriet McConnell, contralto.

Harriet McConnell sang "Prelude, No. 1," from "A Cycle of Life," by Landon Ronald, and pleased so well that she was compelled to respond with an encore, singing "Elysium," by Oley Speaks. The quartet chose for its numbers, "Rose in the Bud," by Dorothy Forster; "Mighty Lak' a Rose," by Nevin, and "Annie Laurie," by Dudley Buck, and received much applause.

Stevenson Studio Recitals.

Anne Stevenson announces that the first of the monthly studio recitals will be given at her studios, 828 Carnegie Hall, New York, Sunday evening, December 13. The succeeding recitals will be announced later.

CRITICAL OPINIONS OF NOVEMBER TOUR

The orchestra has achieved a tonal balance that is well nigh perfect, its work is clean cut, the attacks are wrought with precision, and its playing, on the whole, is accomplished with a virtuosity that speaks in no uncertain tones of the great musicianship of Dr. Kunwald.

It is good to note the artistic advance of this fine organization and its visits will always be welcome to this city.—Oley Speaks, Columbus, Ohio State Journal, November 18, 1914.

A great performance it was that Dr. Kunwald and his responsive ranks last night accorded us. The violins, with Emil Heermann in the lead, took on themselves a full measure of responsibility and a heavy weight it is in this symphony. The body of tone was firm but plastic, kept in strict rhythmic bounds and yet following with commendable attentiveness the least indication of the leader. The woodwinds have some eloquent passages in this work and it must be said that they were everywhere more than adequate. The cellos time and again attracted to themselves special attention, and brasses and percussion never failed to add their proper modicum of weight or intensity.—E. H. Cherrington, Columbus Dispatch, November 18, 1914.

Dr. Kunwald is of the modern German school of conductors. He is forceful, a strict disciplinarian, and permits his orchestra only that amount of freedom necessary to the development of a flexible artistic interpretation.—Paul Teichert, Cleveland Plain-Dealer, November 20, 1914.

Kunwald is a man of authority and this authority seems to radiate from him. The players feel the virility of his beat, also the intelligence and refinement of musical conception that lies behind it.—Archie Bell, Cleveland Leader, November 20, 1914.

Arthur Middleton in "Lohengrin."

Arthur Middleton, an American bass-baritone with an extraordinary voice, made his operatic debut here as the Herald.—New York Globe, November 19, 1914.

The debut of Arthur Middleton as the Herald barely fell short of being sensational. . . . His high baritone rang through the house as few American voices have done.—New York Evening Sun, November 19, 1914.

His voice is well suited to the operatic stage and his vocal style and diction both proved to be praiseworthy.—New York Sun, November 19, 1914.

He is an American bass-baritone, with a well-trained, resonant voice, which he used artistically and with good effect.—New York American, November 19, 1914.

His voice is of excellent sympathetic quality and he has the range of almost a tenor-baritone, which makes his singing of the Herald's music an easy task for him and an agreeable one for his hearers. His stage presence is acceptable, . . . while his singing, in addition to being pleasing, is musicianly. He is a valuable addition to the list of American artists now appearing in the opera house.—New York Herald, November 19, 1914.

Mr. Middleton sang with impressiveness and with a voice of excellent quality and adequate power.—New York World, November 19, 1914.

He succeeded in impressing critical listeners not only with the mellow quality of his lyric baritone voice, but with his artistc method of using it. All the more credit is due to the American singer because this marked his first experience on the operatic stage.—New York Press, November 19, 1914.

He has a portly, imposing figure, and his command of stage technic is promising. Best of all, he has a voice of excellent quality and goodly range, and he knows how to employ it to its best advantage. He sang and acted with authority. Mr. Middleton is an acquisition to the Metropolitan forces.—New York Evening Telegram, November 19, 1914.

He is a sympathetic, sure singer from whom we are going to hear more. (Translation.)—New York Herold, Morgenblatt, November 19, 1914.

He possesses a beautiful, robust voice, uses excellent diction, and also has the commanding, knightly appearance for the part, so that the entire impression of his debut was thoroughly favorable. (Translation.)—Deutsches Journal, New York, November 19, 1914.

With decided success Arthur Middleton made his debut as the Herald. The singer, who is already known to advantage from the concert stage, won favor by a high baritone, in the upper register almost tenor in quality, of splendid brilliancy and heroic timbre. His declamation was . . . commendable. Since we can remember, one has not been able to admire such a thoroughly effective Herald at the Metropolitan. (Translation.)—New York Staatszeitung, November 19, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Elsa Fischer at Tonkuenstler Verein.

The Tonkuenstler Verein offered a particularly attractive program at its concert on Tuesday evening, November 24, in Assembly Hall, New York. Those who participated were Carl Voelkner, Heinrich Klingenfeld, Sophia Reed-Hutchins, Mrs. August Roebbelen and the Fischer String Quartet.

Elsa Fischer and her charming ladies' string quartet, consisting of Elsa Fischer, first violin; Helen Reynolds, second violin; Lucie Neidhardt, viola, and Carolyn Neidhardt, cello, played Kopylow's quartet, in G major, op. 15, and captivated their audience, playing with remarkable precision, fine intonation and musicianly understanding.

Gittelson in Boston and Philadelphia.

Yesterday afternoon Frank Gittelson, an eminent young American violinist, made his first Boston appearance in recital. German audiences, reviewers and conductors have loudly applauded Mr. Gittelson as a violinist of the first rank. Why Mr. Gittelson should include two concertos in a single recital program is somewhat to be wondered at. . . . The program was not merely a list of compositions arranged for the display of technical fluency, or, on the other hand, permeated too much the oversentimentalized emotion. The list of works as a whole was such as to allow an artist not only to show himself the possessor of adequate technical fluency, but an opportunity as well to display by rare tonal beauty a deep and emotional side. These combined qualities go to make up the character and rank of a truly great artist. Mr. Gittelson, although very young, showed himself the possessor to a large degree of these essentials; . . . proved himself a well rounded artist by his interpretation of the Bach chaconne. The infinite variety and sincere beauty of his tone was well brought out in this composition. His playing was extremely flexible, which was easily perceived by his easy and facile bowing.

The three characteristic national dances by Dvorák, Sarasate and Brahms were very charmingly played with rare grace and finish. The concerto by D'Ambrosio was delivered in a very interesting manner. . . .—Boston Daily Advertiser, November 7, 1914.

He has an admirable technic and he is not guilty of the usual errors, in regarding technical difficulties as the ultimate end of violin playing. His tone is exceptionally warm and expressive and full of color. He is rarely musical by nature, and his program made an admirable vehicle for his talent. . . .—Sunday Post, Boston, November 8, 1914.

Frank Gittelson, violinist, made his debut in this city as soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the weekly concert yesterday afternoon. Mr. Gittelson has been abroad for several years under the instruction of the great European masters, and previous to coming to this country he made a tour of the continent, being received everywhere with favor. He is still a mere youth, but in his playing he shows a finished artistry that very few of the great violinists of the world possess, and in his unsophisticated manner lies the chief charm of his present playing. His work is never uncertain and when Mr. Gittelson had finished the exacting Lalo concerto in F the audience responded in a most enthusiastic way. The soloist was recalled a number of times and few violinists have made as good impression here at their first appearance as this young Philadelphian. It was without the introduction of anything fantastical, but to a finished art which gives abundant promise that maturity will make it among the world's greatest.—Philadelphia Press, October 31, 1914.

The fantastic allegro's intricacies were fingered with beautiful skill. And, for a comparative youth, he manages to impart to his effects a spiritual tinge, rarely found except among violinists who have reached maturity. He was heartily and repeatedly applauded. —Philadelphia North American, October 31, 1914.

A more successful debut than that of Frank Gittelson, playing the Lalo, concerto, with the Philadelphia Orchestra in yesterday's concert, could hardly have been anticipated or realized either by the young artist or those who in his behalf entertained great expectations. . . . His tone is as beautiful, as pure, as true as is brought from the violin of any except, perhaps, two or three among the greatest players. There is not one ounce of bluff or fake in his art anywhere.

He evidently has labored with might and main; he has made use of every advantage offered, all his sounds scholarly, workmanlike and genuine. . . . Gittelson extracted from Lalo's swift mercurial moods and tenses about all that is in them. . . . He never scratched; he never played out of tune; his tone was impeccable. . . .—Philadelphia Public Ledger, October 31, 1914.

Frances Ingram Scores in Denver.

Frances Ingram, a remarkably young contralto, formerly with the Chicago Grand Opera Company, has a voice of wonderful tone and sweetness and accompanied by a most gracious stage presence. She completely won her audience. . . .

A group of German songs sung by each artist displayed the life in each voice and there was a plenty of color and freedom of tone.

Especially beautiful was the duet, "Belle Nuit," from "Tales of Hoffmann," enthusiastically received by the audience. Because of insistent applause, it was repeated. The deep tones of Miss Ingram's voice blended with Mme. Read's clear soprano in a most delightful combination.

A group of English songs showed the lighter effects of Miss Ingram's voice and its elastic quality. Her dramatic ability was shown in "Dawn in the Desert," which brought out wonderful sweetness of tone and was picturesque in its somber tones, dispelled at the ending by a joyous note.—Denver Times, November 14, 1914.

Gaylord Yost Plays at Indiana University.

Gaylord Yost, the composer-violinist, assisted by Mrs. Yost, violinist, and Cyrilla Humes, at the piano, gave the following program at Indiana University, Bloomington, Ind., on November 22: Concerto, B minor, Saint-Saëns; "Causerie," Francis Macmillen; gavotte, Mozart-Auer; poeme, Zdenko Fibich; "Liebesfreud," Fritz Kreisler; Farfalla, Gaylord Yost; barcarolle, Cyril Scott; legende, Erkki Melartin; three duets for two violins and piano, Godard.

Carl Fiqu´ Conductor and Composer.

A large and enthusiastic audience completely filled Prospect Hall, Brooklyn, on Thursday evening, November 26, where a concert was given by the Brooklyn Quartet Club, Carl Fiqué, conductor, for the benefit of the German and Austro-Hungarian relief fund. The participants were: Carl Fiqué, musical director; Anna Yung-Knabel, soprano; Henry Weimann, tenor; Alfred Osterland, Jr., baritone; the Brooklyn Quartet Club, consisting of male and female choruses, and an orchestra. Carl Fiqué's reading of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was musicianly and proved again his superiority in interpretation.

"The Turkish Lady," a cantata for soprano and baritone solos, female chorus and orchestra, which has been performed before and commented upon in these columns, was well received. The proceeds were large and will materially aid this worthy cause.

WASHINGTON ATTRACTIONS.

Recent Musical Affairs in the National Capital Discussed in Breezy Paragraphs.

1619 R Street, N. W.,
'Phone, North 935,
Washington, D. C., November 20, 1914.

John McCormack was heard in concert Friday afternoon, November 13, at the New National Theatre, under the local management of Katie Wilson-Greene, and received the usual ovation extended in Washington to McCormack. Seats were placed on the stage for the overflow of ardent patrons.

MLLE. DE TRÉVILLE'S UNIQUE RECITAL.

Yvonne de Tréville gave her unique costume-song-recital at the Columbia Theatre on Tuesday, November 17, and proved herself to be most charming. Mlle. de Tréville's art is consummate, her voice is a beautiful coloratura soprano, and her diction is excellent. Her recital proved her to be a thorough artist with a well grounded musicianship, while her quaint costumes added greatly to the delightful event.

FACULTY RECITAL.

Elizabeth S. Maxwell, soprano; Marguerite O'Toole, harpist; Ethel Garrett Johnston, pianist, and Horace C. Rakemann, violinist, all members of the faculty of the Martha Washington Seminary, were heard in a delightful concert on Friday evening, November 13.

COSTUME CONCERT.

A costume concert will be given at Rauscher's on December 3 for the benefit of the Belgian and French war sufferers, which should prove of great financial help to the cause, as the French Ambassador has charge of the funds, the Countess Dumas is acting as one of the patronesses and Mrs. Hobert Brookes is chairman of the committee on publicity. Helen Donohue DeYo, soprano; Marguerite O'Toole, harpist; Richard Backing, tenor; Felix Garziglia, pianist, and several other prominent musicians will furnish the entertainment.

H. H. FREEMAN JOINS COLLEGE FACULTY.

The Washington College of Music is fortunate in securing the services of H. H. Freeman, organist and choirmaster of old St. John's Church, as head of the organ department. Since the advent of S. M. Fabian as president of the Washington College of Music many of the leading musicians of Washington have joined the faculty, thus greatly strengthening it.

SOUTHERN SOPRANO SINGS.

A favored few were entertained last week when Margaret Battle, of Augusta, Ga., was heard in song recitals at the homes of several friends. Miss Battle was the guest of Ethel Miner for a few days while on her way home from spending the summer at Chautauqua and New York, where she studied under Isador Luckstone. Miss Battle is the soprano soloist in the First Presbyterian Church in Augusta. On Thursday evening, November 12, she sang for the guests of S. M. Fabian at his regular Thursday evening musicale, and displayed a beautiful lyric voice, well placed and of rich warmth of color. Mme. Sembrich has heard Miss Battle sing and is said to have been most gracious with her praise. Julia Huggins was Miss Battle's accompanist and, as usual, added much to the artistic worth of the performance.

MR. FABIAN "AT HOME."

S. M. Fabian, the popular musician and president of the Washington College of Music, has in a few short weeks fully established his "Thursday Evening." Mr. Fabian has a new studio in Twenticth street, N. W., and here each week many of his friends drop in and are always sure of a delightful evening of music and pleasant discussion.

DICK ROOT.

Gay Donaldson's Cleveland Recital.

Gay Donaldson, the American baritone, gave a recital on November 25, at Engineers' Hall, Cleveland, Ohio, assisted by Dr. Arthur Little pianist. The program contained works by Chopin, Liszt, Massenet, Rubinstein, Schubert, Cadman, Burnham, Schumann, Protheroe, Homer and Hermann. Mr. Donaldson was in excellent voice and his artistic interpretations and thorough musicianship won for him the praise of all present.

In addition to his work as baritone soloist and director of the choir at the Euclid Avenue Baptist Church, Cleveland, Mr. Donaldson teaches in Cleveland, Beaver, Pa.; Akron, Ohio, and Youngstown, Ohio.

College Girls Entertain Mrs. Dunning.

Carrie Louise Dunning, the founder and exponent of the Dunning System of Improved Music Study for Beginners, recently gave a talk before the Alpha Chi Omega Sorority of Syracuse University, where she was a guest of honor at a luncheon. In the evening she was heard in a recital at Apollo Hall, Syracuse, scoring such a success that she was engaged to give a talk at Syracuse University, on Wednesday afternoon, November 18. Mrs. Dunning is justly enthusiastic about her method. This enthusiasm, combined with her charming personality, makes her an interesting speaker.

KANSAS CITY BREVITIES.

Kansas City, November 17, 1914.

Clarence D. Sears, organist and choir director of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, gave a recital in the church Tuesday evening. Mr. Sears proved a careful and painstaking organist. Clean technic and intelligent registration were evident throughout the program. The two movements from the Mendelssohn sonata and toccata from Widor were especially well done. Mrs. Arthur D. Brookfield, contralto, assisted. Rarely has anything more beautiful been heard here than her singing of "He Was Despised," from the "Messiah."

RUSSIAN SONGS GIVEN.

The vocal department of the Kansas City Musical Club gave a program of Russian songs recently.

A LICHTENWALTER MUSICALE.

Miss Lichtenwalter's last musicale was given by her former pupil, Josephine G. Day, of Superior, Neb., who has been steadily growing musically by help at home and abroad. She played the MacDowell "Eroic" sonata and a group of modern pieces. Chas. H. Cease sang a group of Miss Lichtenwalter's songs effectively.

MUSIC TEACHERS TO ORGANIZE.

A movement is on foot to organize the music teachers of the city into an association similar to the State Association, but independent of it. Its object is to help to bring up the standard of teaching and to help in legislation sought.

GENEVE LICHTENWALTER.

Katharine Goodson in Scotland.

Katharine Goodson was the soloist at the opening concerts of the Scottish Symphony Orchestra in Edinburgh and Glasgow, on November 9 and 10, playing at each concert, two concertos, Saint-Saëns' G minor, and Liszt's E flat. That she won the favor of the Scottish people these notices show:

Her rendering was marked by great freedom and variety of touch, and the fine qualities of the pianist were fully displayed. Miss Goodson has a rare mastery of the keyboard—her staccato touch is a feature of her playing—and her appreciation both of dynamic and melodic values carried with her the full sympathies of the audience. —The Scotsman, November 10, 1914.

Her concertos showed a fine grasp of rhythm and genuinely musical feeling. Miss Goodson is a big player, with a splendid technic and an eloquent style.—The Glasgow Herald, November 11, 1914.

Londoners will have two further opportunities of hearing this pianist before she sails for her sixth American tour, the middle of December, for she will appear at the Queen's Hall Ballad Concert, on November 21, and again at the Royal Philharmonic Society's third concert, on December 10 (under Safonoff's direction). A charming tribute to Miss Goodson's rendering of the Grieg concerto at the Albert Hall on October 4 spoke of her "soulful interpretation and heroic rhythm," and of the Chopin study in C major, op. 10, No. 7, that it was "the light that never was on land or sea." (Advertisement.)

St. Louis Orchestra Engages Spiering.

Theodore Spiering, who scored such a rousing success last week at the New York College of Music faculty concert (he is a specially engaged member of that body), with his technically astonishing and temperamentally impassioned playing of the Bruch violin concerto in G minor, has been engaged as the soloist of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra on December 11 and 12, to take the place of Willy Burmeister, who is detained in Europe owing to the war.

Spiering is much in demand in New York as a teacher, but it begins to look as though the out of town requests for his solo services will occupy a large part of his time this winter. The violinist's New York recital is to be fixed upon for some time in January.

Robert L. Tait to South Africa.

Robert L. Tait, a pupil of Lloyd d'Aubigné, of Paris, and formerly baritone of the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, has just accepted the position as Registrar to the Honorable Sir Henry Juta, K. C., Judge President of the South African Supreme Court, and has already left for Cape Town to take up his duties. Mr. Tait is still, however, a singer at heart and will return to the musical world "as soon as this cruel war is over."

GRAND OPERA IN CHICAGO.

Century Opera Company Presents Excellent Casts in Satisfying Performances.

Auditorium.

"Aida," November 23.

At the Auditorium "Aida" was the opera chosen to open the eight weeks' season of grand opera in English by the Century Opera Company, of New York, on Monday evening, November 23. Lois Ewell was heard in the title role and sang intelligently and fervently. Kathleen Howard gave a beautiful portrayal of the role of Amneris and vocally she came up to all expectations. She scored heavily and will be reckoned from now on as one of the popular singers of the company. Morgan Kingston as Radames was at his best in the Nile scene, where he easily dominated the situation and won the full approval of the audience. Henry Weldon as Ramfis and Louis Kreidler were two pillars of strength in the good ensemble of the evening. Alfred Kaufman was the king. Hardy Williamson sang the small role of the messenger as well as it ever has been heard here, and Jeannette Kann sang true to pitch the music allotted to the priestess.

The stage management was adequate and the orchestra under the baton of Agide Jacchia was in every respect satisfactory.

"Madame Butterfly," November 24.

The second performance of the Century Opera Company brought out a rather small audience to the Auditorium Theatre and this was most regrettable since the performance of "Madame Butterfly" showed the organization at its best. The orchestra was excellent and its conductor, Agide Jacchia, won the lion's share of the plaudits of the evening. Associated in the success may be mentioned the stage manager Coini, who gave to the eye the same pleasure as Jacchia to the ear. The scenic effects were excellent. Lois Ewell sang the title role very effectively. Kathleen Howard was the Suzuki, Orville Harrold the Pinkerton, Thomas Chalmers the Sharpless, George Everett the commissioner, and Frank Phillips, the marriage broker.

"Carmen," November 25 (Matinee).

At the Wednesday matinee "Carmen" was given with Kathleen Howard in the title role; Florence MacBeth as Micaela, Gustav Bergman as Don Jose, Graham Marr as Escamillo.

"Aida," November 25 (Evening).

On Wednesday evening "Aida" was repeated with the same cast as on Monday, with the exception of the Misses Freeman and Santley, who replaced Ewell and Howard in their respective parts.

Thanksgiving Bills.

On Thanksgiving afternoon "Madame Butterfly" was repeated and on Thursday night "Aida" was performed.

Friday and Saturday Bills.

The bill on Friday night was "Madame Butterfly."

Saturday's matinee had "Aida" and Saturday night "Carmen."

Alice Garrigue Mott's Studio Notes.

Marie Kaiser sang with her usual success at a concert in Worcester, Mass., November 21, when H. Parker's "St. Christopher" was performed, under the direction of Mr. Butler, and with the aid of the Worcester Festival Chorus. The proof of Marie Kaiser's reliable and beautiful singing is that this young artist is practically always reengaged wherever she is heard.

Dorothy Ball, whose sympathetic dramatic soprano is attracting her audiences wherever she is heard, gave a successful concert at 228 West Seventy-second street, for the benefit of the American Artists' Hospital, Paris.

Rita Jolivet scored a triumph in her new play, "What It Means to a Woman," at the Longacre Theatre. The press is unanimous in its praise of this artist's "vocal control" and "excellent diction." Upon the recommendation of Manager Harrison Grey Fiske, Rita Jolivet placed herself under the guidance of Alice Garrigue Mott, and pays a fine tribute to her teacher for her success, in writing to the latter: "I thank you for my new voice."

Piano Recital by a Leefson Pupil.

Virginia Brown, a gifted pianist, will give a recital at Elkins Park, Pa., on December 3.

Miss Brown, who possesses those good pianistic qualities for which pupils of Maurits Leefson, director of the Leefson-Hille Conservatory of Philadelphia, are noted, will doubtless not fail to make a good impression on that evening.

Some say that the critics are always angry when they go to a concert because they have been dragged from happy, cultured firesides to hear ponderous pianists and roaring recitalists. They are said to hate rain and snow more than they love art.—New York Morning Telegraph.

NEW YORK BREVITIES.

Castle-Deming Orange Recital—Two Warford Studio Recitals—Manuscript Society Concert—Tonkünstler Society Meets—Max Jacobs with Beethoven Society—Ne Collins' Notices—Brenda Macrae in Toronto—The Two Nichols—Women's Philharmonic Meets—Eleanor Patterson Folder—Noble Organ Recitals—Samoiloff Recital, December 9—Notes.

Elinor Castle, soprano, assisted by Katherine Burritt Deming, contralto, gave "An Evening of Song," for the benefit of the Red Cross fund, at the Women's Club, Orange, N. J., November 20. Miss Castle, who has studied for five years with William Nelson Burritt, had a brilliant success in this recital. She was unknown to the audience, which was most enthusiastic, giving her many recalls for her four groups of songs. "Fairy Pipers" had to be repeated. "Chanson Provençale" was brilliantly sung. "Hi L'il Fellar" was encored. There were also two groups of duets, and of these the duet from "Aida" was sung with dramatic fire. Will J. Stone was at the piano.

Two Warford Studio Recitals.

Claude Warford presented students in a recital of songs, November 18, at his studio in the Metropolitan Opera House building. Edna Wolverton, soprano, and Carl Rupprecht, baritone, gave great pleasure in the interpretation of the program.

Miss Wolverton is the happy possessor of a beautiful lyric soprano voice, which, however, does not lack a certain dramatic note, as she demonstrated in her rendition of "Dich theure Halle." In Mr. Warford's song, "Along the Road," she gave evidence of her interpretative insight.

Mr. Rupprecht disclosed a sympathetic baritone voice of good range, and sang two groups of German songs with finish and excellent diction.

At the second recital, songs by W. Ralph Cox and Claude Warford were sung by Catherine Bryce, soprano, and Carl Rupprecht, baritone. Miss Bryce sang two groups of songs by Cox and one by Warford. All the Cox songs are graceful and well constructed, and the singing gave pleasure. Mr. Rupprecht sang two groups by Warford and one by Cox. Mr. Cox's "Somebody Loves Me" had a rousing high F finish, and "Peggy" was distinctively Irish in melodic form. Of the Warford songs, a "Japanese Sword Song" had originality. "John Henry Crossover" is a song of decided naturalness, combined with originality and optimistic sentiment. Each composer accompanied his own songs. The studio was well filled.

Manuscript Society, Twenty-sixth Season.

The first private concert of the twenty-sixth season, Manuscript Society of New York, occurred at the National Arts Club, November 20, a program of five numbers being heard by two hundred invited guests. D. W. Miller, of Norwood, Ohio, was represented by four piano compositions, the scherzo, in distinctly Mendelssohnian style, being especially well played by Lisbet Hoffmann. W. Ralph Cox made his debut as composer in these concerts in four songs, sung by Catherine Bryce in a clear and expressive high soprano voice. Vivian Burnett (who is none other than the original "Little Lord Fauntleroy," son of Frances Hodgson Burnett), had a romanza for cello and piano, played by Hyman Eisenberg and F. W. Riesberg. This is genuinely impassioned and natural music and made a definite impression. Two songs by Meyer Silver, for soprano, were sung by Beth Ordemon. These were tuneful songs, and were well done on short notice by this singer, who is blessed with a fine dramatic soprano voice and pleasant appearance. Latin-American Folksongs, by E. Hague and E. Kilyeni are melodies taken down in musical shorthand by the former during various trips to Southern California and Mexico. They are all of them charming, especially a serenade in which the singer whistles a short strain. Mary P. Mitchell sang them well. Besides the composers, at the piano were Lillian Sauvage Poole and Flora MacD. Wills.

Max Jacobs with Beethoven Society.

A feature of the Beethoven Society musicale at the Astor Gallery, November 14, was Max Jacobs' playing of "Romance" (Beethoven), "Aus der Heimat" (Smetana), "Walter's Prize Song" (Wagner-Wilhelmj), and "Polonaise" (Wieniawski). Mr. Jacobs appears very frequently this year on programs of musical societies, recitals and in concerts. His large tone and brilliantly incisive style is always infectious.

Tonkünstler Society Concert.

Elsa Fischer, Helen Reynolds, Lucie Neidhardt, and Carolyn Neidhardt won especial honor at the Tonkünstler Society concert of November 24, Assembly Hall, New York, in a quartet by A. Kopylow. Sophia Reed-Hutchins, soprano, sang modern songs and was encored both times. A sonata for viola and piano by York Bowen brought Lucie Neidhardt and Mrs. August Roebbelen success. Thuille's sonata for piano and violin, played by Carl Voelkner and Heinrich Klingenfeld, brought forward two experienced ensemble artists, Mr. Klingenfeld winning special honors.

The next musicale is to take place December 8, Memorial Hall, Brooklyn.

Ne Collins at American Institute.

Mrs. Ne Collins, recently engaged as teacher of voice at the American Institute of Applied Music, was the special guest of honor at a reception given by the institution November 20. She sang several numbers, serving to show her capabilities, and that the following notice of her singing by the Buffalo News was fully deserved:

Mrs. Ne Collins was heard in "Cäcilie" by Strauss, "An Open Secret" by Salter, and the "Danza" by J. W. Chadwick, besides a number of charming encores. Her lovely voice lent itself admirably to the different styles. Of special beauty were the well sustained tone and sympathetic interpretation of "Serenity" by Mary Turner Salter.

Brenda Macrae in Toronto.

Hattie Clapper Morris' artist-pupil, Brenda Macrae, sang with the Hambourg Concert Society, Toronto, November 23, winning what one who was present called "A wonderful success," especially with the Verdi aria "O Don Fatale." The big range and beauty of expression in her voice, with its velvety quality, brought her genuine appreciation. Toronto daily papers substantiate the above.

Nichols Return from the West.

John W. Nichols and Mrs. Nichols, tenor and pianist, have returned from a most successful fall tour through the Middle West, where they received many flattering criticisms from the press, and several reengagements for the coming spring, as well as next season. In the evening of Thursday, December 10, they will give their New York recital, at Columbia University. December 6, Mr. Nichols sings the tenor part in Mathieu's "Conversion" at St. James' Church, Brooklyn. He will sing "The Creation" at the Flatbush Dutch Reformed Church during the same month. December 25 and 26 Mr. Nichols is engaged for the "Messiah," with the Chicago Apollo Club.

Women's Philharmonic Society Meets.

Amy Fay, president of the Women's Philharmonic Society, announces a series of four Saturday afternoon recitals at the Granberry studios, on the fourth Saturday of each month. The society is at present making a specialty of interpreting the works of American composers.

Eleanor Patterson's Press Notices.

Samoiloff Recital.

Lazar S. Samoiloff announces a song recital to be given by his artist-pupils, Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, December 9, at eight o'clock. Mr. Samoiloff has many gifted vocalists under his guidance, some of whom are indeed remarkable in their vocal gifts.

Noble Organ Recital.

T. Tertius Noble, F. R. C. O., and A. R. C. M., assisted by Ford Hummel, violinist, gave a recital at the First Presbyterian Church, Kingston, N. Y., November 18. He played the following works: Concerto in G minor, Mathew Camidge; reverie, Noble; minuet, Calkin; air and variations, Rea; legende, Federlein; finale, Lemmens, and suite in F, Corelli. Mr. Noble continues giving his "Hour of Music" every Sunday evening at St. Thomas' church at eight o'clock.

Notes.

Mrs. Richard Keyes, mother of Margaret Keyes, the contralto, and of Mrs. McCloskey, died recently and was buried in Rochester, N. Y. The family has sent mourning cards, acknowledging sympathy extended.

Flora Bridges, an attractive violinist, and the Ziegler Quartet appeared before the International Arts Society, Mrs. J. Christopher Marks, president, at the Hotel Astor, November 17.

Nelson Riley, bass, who has studied with Julian Walker, and has appeared on the dramatic stage, is now well prepared for oratorio and concert appearances. His voice is a genuine bass with a high range. He sings Mendelssohn's "O Lord, Have Mercy" especially well. More should be heard of this artist.

Amy Grant, whose Sunday and Thursday afternoon studio recitals have been noted in the Musical Courier, announces that she gives instruction in the speaking voice and acting; receptions, Thursday, four to seven, with music; dancing class Wednesdays at 9 p. m.

Anne Hazelton Terhune, pianist, and Louise Gude, contralto, gave a recital November 24, at Studio Hall. Miss Terhune is a brilliant pianist, pupil of Mrs. Sturdevant Dixon.

Prof. Samuel A. Baldwin will give his 397th public organ recital at City College today at four o'clock, playing a program of international composers, Bach, Liszt, Rubinstein, Dubois and Lemare. December 6 at four o'clock Homer N. Bartlett's suite in C, op. 205, is to be played. Following this the names of Reger, Bach, Wright, Faulkes, Bonnet, Saint-Saëns, and Elgar appear.

Organists generally were invited by the American Guild of Organists to honor Arthur Foote by playing his "Festival March" on Thanksgiving Day, or the following Sunday, which was generally done. This was a mark of gratitude for recovery from his illness. Some Boston organists honored him by giving entire "Foote Programs" at their Sunday services.

Julian Norman, vocal instructor, making voice placing a specialty, has established his studio in suite 70, Metropolitan Opera House. Some leading professional singers are his pupils.

Helen Stanley in Pittsburgh.

Miss Stanley's voice is delightfully pure and fresh with considerable warmth. It is most pleasurable, musically and sensuously, however, in the middle tones. With them her technical skill is more secure and adroit; and they have more variety of force and color and more expressive quality than any other part of her voice. For this reason, it was in the quiet, more intuitive songs—notably those of Brahms—which comprised her second group, that Miss Stanley excelled and it is in lieder of this sort that the more characteristic and beautiful qualities of her voice are best illustrated.

Yet, there was no chance to become bored with a single monotonously, maintained mood. One thrilled with the tenderness of the aria of the sorrowing mother, Lia, from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," with which she opened her program. Her shading in this number was exquisitely delicate and showed that she possesses the rare qualification of conveying to her hearers through a well modulated temperament the very spirit of the song she is singing. There was a "Panlike" air about her third group, which included "Down in the Forest," by Landon; "The Place of Dreams," by Harold Osborn Smith, and Cadman's "Call Me No More." Several encores and a repetition of "Place of Dreams" were demanded—Pittsburgh Dispatch, November 21, 1914.

Miss Stanley has a well equalized voice of pure quality, with both sweetness and variety of color. Good training has increased its natural flexibility, so that she is able to realize in greater degree than is common her conception of her songs; and as her conception was invariably an intelligent and effective one, . . . her performance was very interesting. Excellent breath control and clear diction were conspicuous features of her work.

Her first number was the "Air de Lia" from "L'Enfant Prodigue," the cantata with which Debussy won the Prix de Rome in 1884. It is a work of rather superficial eloquence, but its technical difficulties are by no means negligible. Miss Stanley conquered these, however, and gave it with fine spirit. Next came a group of lieder by Brahms and Strauss. In "Nachtigall," "Wie Melodien" and "Staendchen," by the former, she seemed to miss the undercurrent of deeper feeling which runs through all three; but her interpretations were pleasing and plausible, her execution admirable. In the lovely "Die Nacht" and the brilliant "Caecilie" of Richard Strauss she appeared at her best, revealing, it is scarcely too much to say, all that the songs contained. To them was added the same composer's "Zueignung." The later group of songs with English text—including "The Place of Dreams" by her accompanist, which was repeated, and Cadman's "Call Me No More"—could reveal no new qualities.—Pittsburgh Gazette-Times, November 21, 1914.

Marta Kranich with Euterpe Society.

Marta Kranich, the soprano, appeared as one of the soloists at the Musical Morning given by the Euterpe Society at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, on Thursday, November 19. Mme. Kranich sang arias from Weber's "Freischütz," "Lilac Domino," by Cuvillier, and Franz's "Widmung."

ST. PAUL SEASON BEGUN.

Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra Already Has Paid Two Visits—Schubert Club Concert—Notes.

St. Paul, Minn., November 20, 1914.

The St. Paul musical season may be said to have been ushered in officially by the two opening concerts of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra at the Auditorium, given here under the auspices of the St. Paul Institute this month. At the first, Mildred Potter was soloist and at the second Josef Hofmann assisted. The audiences were fair in size, the second concert showing a decided gain over the first in this respect. At both concerts the real music loving public was present by many palpable tokens. It is safe to prophesy that others who gave the late St. Paul Symphony Orchestra their support for civic reasons also will sooner or later fall into line and accord Mr. Oberhoffer's fine orchestra the reception which it deserves, regardless of local partisan hesitation and prejudice. At the first concert Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony was the chief offering and at the second Beethoven's fifth was given. The former received a reading that was little short of triumphant in its intelligence and emotional quality. It is doubtful if a more deeply introspective, finely conceived, richly imaginative and perfectly executed rendition of the Beethoven work has ever before been heard here. Mildred Potter received a great ovation, St. Paul being her birthplace. She was in glorious voice and sang with superb artistry arias from "Rienzi," "Le Prophete" and "Samson and Delilah." Her return here in February, when she will sing with the Apollo Club of Minneapolis, is eagerly awaited by her many friends and admirers in the Twin Cities.

Schubert Club Concert.

The Schubert Club, which is now launched on its season, has presented Vernon d'Arnalle, baritone, who was summoned at the eleventh hour to take the place of Emilio de Gogorza, who while scheduled to appear before the club, was detained in Europe by war conditions. Mr. d'Arnalle created a very favorable impression by his artistic singing of German, French and Italian songs, of which he gave a pleasing variety. The audience was of good size. The next artist recital to be given by the Schubert Club will be on the evening of December 1, when Julia Culp will be the soloist. Other artists to appear before the club this season will be Katherine Goodson, the Barrere Ensemble and Constance Purdy.

St. Paul Notes.

Helen Stanley, of the Century Opera Company, will be the soloist with the Minneapolis Orchestra at its third concert here, on December 3. Julia Claussen will sing at the fourth concert.

Ella Richards is giving an interesting series of chamber concerts at her home, on Laurel avenue. Last Saturday evening the program was devoted to the compositions of Brahms.

The Municipal Concerts, which were so successful last season, have begun again, and the Auditorium was crowded at the first one, two evenings ago. Robert Geehan, baritone, and Otto Meyer, violinist, were the soloists. Other soloists engaged to appear during the series are Alma Peterson, Marie O'Meara, Jane Holland Cameron and Frances Rosenthal.

Several benefit concerts have been given here for Red Cross work abroad during the past few weeks. Many local artists in both St. Paul and Minneapolis donated their services for the object.

The voice studios of Lewis Shawe, Jessica de Wolf, Emil Onet, Harriet Hale and Blanche Bassindale are daily receiving large classes. The studio outlook here has not been more prosperous in several seasons. Macalester College has enrolled one of the largest classes in its history.

J. McClure Bellows.

Dr. Wolle's Bethlehem Notice.

The second entertainment under the anspices of the Woman's Club of the Bethlehems was given last evening in the Moravian Sunday School room. After a few remarks by the president, the speaker of the evening, Dr. Fred Wolle, was introduced by Mrs. Guy Johnson, chairman of the Music Committee. Dr. Wolle delighted a large and appreciative audience for more than an hour with many interesting incidents in the life of Bach, the famous composer, and by rendering one of his humorous compositions, the "Kaffee Cantata." He was ably assisted in the latter by Annie Estes. The special feature of the evening, perhaps, was the duets by Dr. Wolle and Miss Estes, which were loudly applauded. While the people of Bethlehem have had many opportunities to listen to the wonderful interpretations of the masterpieces of Bach by Dr. Wolle, last night he showed them a different side of this great man and proved to the interested audience that the "dry" Bach had a keen sense of humor, as well as a deep insight into the serious side of life.—Bethlehem (Pa.) Evelyn Starr's Recital.

A delightful young violinist, Evelyn Starr, came down to New York from Canada (Nova Scotia) last week and gave a recital program on her chosen instrument at Aeolian Hall, on the evening of Tuesday, November 24. She was not entirely unheralded, for a good sized, anticipative audience greeted her, bestowed flowers upon her and listened to an interesting program composed of classic and modern numbers. These were the Vitali "Chaconne," Corelli's "La Folia," Bruch's "Scotch Fantasie," Fibich's "Poem," Cesar Cui's "Oriental" and "Perpetuum Mobile," Schubert-Auer's "Moment Musical" and the Wieniawski "Souvenir de Moscow."

That quiet spirit which denotes more than polite attention, a spirit which signifies intent interest and enjoyment, pervaded the atmosphere of Aeolian Hall during her playing and this, with the numerous spontaneous recalls, gave satisfactory evidence that this young pupil of Leopold Auer was not disappointing her listeners.

Miss Starr is too young yet to have "arrived" entirely. But she possesses already a well grounded technic, which includes delicate and facile fingering and is at the same time sure and firm, good intonation, admirable bowing and a marked degree of feeling. Innate good taste, no striving for effect, a deep seriousness of purpose, a capacity to feel and think deeply promise much for the artistic growth of this young musician. Her natural and easy girlish manner on the stage adds to the personal charm of her presentations. Simply but tastefully gowned, crowned with a wealth of golden hair, she herself formed a winsome picture.

Miss Starr completed recently a tour of Nova Scotia. The itinerary included Kentville, Wolfville, Windsor, Truro and Halifax. Early in December she will give a joint recital in Three Rivers and Quebec with Jeanne Gerville-Réache, the French contralto.

Richard Epstein's accompaniments were both sympathetic and skilful.

Tina Lerner in Buffalo.

Tina Lerner gave a recital in Buffalo on November 16, presenting a program which the Courier of that city characterized as "varied as it was noble in its proportions, and given with inborn feeling for beauty as well as tremendous technical prowess."

After commenting in high terms on Miss Lerner's performance of Mozart's "Pastorale Variee," "full of alternate grace and classic dignity," and other numbers in which the pianist displayed "elasticity of touch and freedom of nuance," the same critic declared:

Miss Lerner's wide range and command of modern as well as classic composers was displayed in a number by Debussy, in which her ability as a tone colorist was charmingly demonstrated, while the prelude in G minor by Rachmaninoff was given with stirring impetuosity and imposing breadth. Her recital closed with the brilliant "Campanella," by Liszt, which she played with dazzling power and marvelous fleetness of fingers. Miss Lerner was warmly received and recalled after every performance. (Advertisement.)

"Your voice," said the captious musical director, "leaves much to be desired."

"That's why I get so many encores," replied the flip young thing.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

CHICAGO CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

The Appended List Reveals a Busy Week in the Musical Fraternity of the Middle Western Metropolis—Notes.

Chicago, Ill., November 28, 1914.

At the Fine Arts Theatre, before a large and enthusiastic audience, Vida Llewellyn, a brilliant newcomer among young American pianists, made her professional debut in Chicago, on Sunday afternoon, November 22. Her playing was of a high degree of surety and skill. She gave the impression of having been especially well schooled, and her mentor, Victor Heinze, who was among her listeners, had reason to be proud of Miss Llewellyn. A review of the same program having appeared in the MUSICAL COURIER after her appearance in New York, an analysis of her work is here deemed unnecessary. Yet it might be said that her success in Chicago was big and well deserved. She certainly has a fine future and it is to be hoped that she will be heard in Chicago very often.

JULIA CLAUSSEN SINGS AT AUDITORIUM.

Julia Claussen, contralto, was the star at the concert given at the Auditorium, under the auspices of the Ladies' Auxiliary of the German-Austro-Hungarian Aid Society, on Sunday afternoon, before a sold out house. The receipts amounted to over $7,500.

BACH CHORAL SOCIETY CONCERT.

A popular concert by the Bach Choral Society took place on Thursday evening, November 26, at the Volunteer Auditorium, when the Bach motet "Now Shall the Grace" and Gounod's "Redemption" were presented by the society, assisted by Marjorie Dodge Warner, soprano; Tor Van Pyk, tenor; Marion Green, basso; John Rankl, baritone, and Wilhelm Middelschulte, organist. As in past seasons, John W. Norton was the conductor.

CONCERT AT THE BLACKSTONE HOTEL.

The second program presented by the Musical League of America, at the Blackstone, did not bring out any startling array of talent. Edna Dunham, soprano, gave a number of selections with excellent style and revealed a good medium voice. Her high notes, however, were not all that could be desired and her selections in some instances were hackneyed. Sara Gurowitsch, cellist, was heard in a selection by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Royal Dadum, baritone, sang a number of songs in splendid style and his diction is excellent. Mr. Dadum is a student and an interesting singer. Marx Oberndorfer gave splendid piano support to the soloists.

VIDA LLEWELLYN AT HOME.

MABEL SHARP HERDIEN IN CONCERT.

Mabel Sharp Herdien appeared as soloist at the Baptist Church of Highland Park, Ill., on Thanksgiving Day, November 26. Next Monday she will be one of the soloists before the Amateur Musical Club, and on Tuesday, December 1, she will be the soloist at the St. Paul Church.

REUTER PUPILS IN CONCERT.

Vera Bowen, Florence Bettray (from Racine, Wis.), Bernhard Dieter and Mrs. Charles Gabriel, pupils of Rudolph Reuter, presented a program at the Ziegfeld Theatre on Saturday morning, November 28. They were assisted by the Misses Brown and Page, violinists. Among the works played were the Carpenter piano and violin sonata, two movements of the MacDowell concerto in A minor, and compositions by Mozart, Grieg and Chopin.

ALICE NIELSEN WITH IRISH CHORAL SOCIETY.

At Orchestra Hall, on Tuesday evening, November 24, the Irish Choral Society presented Alice Nielsen at its annual concert. The Irish Choral Society, of which Daniel Protheroe is director, showed the effect of good training in a well balanced and interesting program. This society certainly ranks among the leading organizations of its kind and deservedly so. Alice Nielsen has never been heard in Chicago to such excellent advantage as on this occasion. She was in glorious voice and amiable mood, and scored a huge success with an audience that completely filled the large hall, also at the hands of the chorus. Throughout her program the singer was acclaimed and was obliged to repeat many songs and add several encores to the printed program. Miss Nielsen's program was made up of the Seiler-Wagner "A Burst of Melody," John A. Carpenter's "When I Bring to You Colored Toys," Liza Lehmann's "The Weather Cock," Frank La Forge's "To a Messenger," a German group consisting of the Liszt "Loreley," Rachmaninow's "Frühlingsluten," Brahms' "Wiegsfluten," Bleichman's "Komm lass Uns Spielen," and an English group consisting of "The Last Rose of Summer," the "Low Back'd Car," "Kathleen Mavourneen," with one verse sung in Irish, and "The Rose of Killarney." She also sang "Ah, Love But a Day," by Daniel Protheroe; "The Leaves and the Wind," by Leoni; Dorothy Gaynor's "An Explanation," and Brewer's "Fairy Pipes," and she assisted the Irish Choral Society in the presentation of Schubert's "Omnipotence."

AMATEUR MUSICAL CLUB ARTIST RECITAL.

The artist recital of the Amateur Musical Club, on Monday afternoon, November 23, at the Illinois Theatre, enlisted the services of Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, and it is safe to say a more enjoyable program has not been presented before this discriminating audience. The Brahms D minor sonata was given an interesting reading and the Bach "Chaconne" was played without a flaw. The other numbers on the program were received with well merited applause.

SEVENTH SYMPHONIC PROGRAM.

The seventh program of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, given on Friday afternoon, November 27, and Saturday evening, November 28, included the "Rustic Wedding" symphony of Goldmark and "Overture to a Gascon Chivalric Drama," by Mandl; Glazounow's "Poëme Lyrique," and the same composer's "Scene Dansante"; Hugo Wolf's prelude and entr'acte from his opera, "Der Corregidor"; the Saint-Saëns symphonic poem, "Le Rouet D'Omphale," and Stock's own "Symphonic Waltz." A program so well balanced and varied was apt to find favor with the habitues of those concerts and Stock and his men were warmly applauded all through the course of the concert.

WALTER SPRY SCHOOL NEWS.

James Whittaker will give a series of four historical piano recitals at the Walter Spry Music School, Wednesday noons, December 16 and 23, January 6 and 13.

SÉBALD AND LEVY TO GIVE SONATA EVENINGS.

At the Little Theatre on Monday evening, December 7, the first of three sonata evenings given by Alexander Sébald, violinist, and Heniot Levy, pianist, will take place. The program will comprise the Brahms sonata, op. 108, in D minor, the Henior Levy sonata, No. 6, in C minor, and César Franck's sonata in A major.

HANNA BUTLER IN DEMAND.

Hanna Butler, soprano, appeared before the Drama Circle at the Hotel La Salle on Wednesday afternoon, November 18, when she sang a French group. On December 7 she will appear in a very interesting German, French, Russian, Swedish and American program at Harvard College, Cambridge, Mass. Professor Spalding will give an illustrated lecture on the program. On December 8, Mrs. Butler will appear at a Red Cross benefit at the residence of Mrs. Houghton, in Boston, Mass. It may also be interesting to note that Mrs. W. A. Alexander, of Highland Park, who is a pupil of Mrs. Butler, sang with great success on November 21 at the Owsley Club and at the Highland Park Woman's Club on November 24.

CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE RECITALS.

The recital given in the Ziegfeld Theatre, Saturday, November 28, served to introduce to the public seven of the most advanced students of the Chicago Musical College piano and violin departments. The graduating, post graduating and artist classes were represented by John Carre, Claudia Page, Bernhard Dieter, Vera Bowen, Mildred Brown, Charles Gabriel and Florence Bettray. This program was given in a fashion that displayed remarkable talent and caused unbounded enthusiasm. Preceding the musicale Felix Borowski lectured on Mozart and some of his contemporaries.

One of the most interesting recitals of the season will be given next Saturday in the Ziegfeld Theatre when students of Edoardo Sacerdote will present a program made up entirely of numbers written by Chicago composers, a majority of whom are members of the faculty of the Chicago Musical College. Pupils of Walter R. Knupfer gave a piano recital in Recital Hall, Chicago Musical College, Friday evening, November 27. A second recital will be given Wednesday evening, December 2. The Chicago Musical College Choral Society, which numbers one hundred and twenty-five singers, is now rehearsing "Carmen" under the direction of Edoardo Sacerdote for the forthcoming performance to be given by the college school of opera.

NOTES.

The next recital in the Metropolitan Series will introduce Willard Flint, basso cantante, of Boston, who is booked for an extensive tour in the Central West under the management of Ernest Briggs.

Advanced piano pupils of Silvio Scionti, voice pupils of Karleton Hackett and violin pupils of Adolf Weidig will appear in recital at Kimball Hall, Saturday afternoon, December 5.

Nicholai Sokoloff, the young Russian violinist, will make his first appearance in Chicago in recital, Sunday afternoon, December 6, at the Illinois Theatre, under the direction of F. Wight Neumann.

The Sherwood Music School announces a series of Saturday afternoon four o'clock musicales. On Saturday, November 28, the program will be given by Elsa Harthan-Arendt, Permelia Newby Gale and Alfred Goldman, with Tina Mae Haines and Hazel Raymond as accompanists. The public is cordially invited.

Carl Friedberg, the German pianist, will make his first Chicago appearance in recital, Sunday afternoon, December 13, at the Illinois Theatre, under the direction of F. Wight Neumann.

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Josef Hofmann, appeared at the Illinois Theatre, Sunday afternoon, November 22.

The Mary Wood Chase School of Musical Arts presented Esther MacDowell Swisher, pianist; Bertha D. Magnus, soprano, and Clara J. Dunsworth, accompanist, at the Caxton Club Rooms, Fine Arts Building, Saturday afternoon, November 24. The orchestral parts on the second piano were played by Miss Chase.

John W. Nicholas, tenor, of New York, has been engaged for the two "Messiah" performances by the Apollo Musical Club, December 25 and 27, at the Auditorium Theatre. A chorus of 1,000 singers will participate in "The Messiah" choruses this year, making them more effective than ever before.

The third concert of the third season of the Sinai Orchestra will be given Sunday evening, November 25, at Sinai Temple. Elsa Harthan-Arendt, soprano, will be the soloist. Mr. Dunham will direct the orchestra and play an organ solo.

Ernest Briggs announces that the Canton Symphony Orchestra has been booked for an engagement in Alliance, Ohio, and Anita Carranza, who will appear with the orchestra in Canton, will also appear as soloist with the organization in Alliance. Arrangements will be made for the orchestra to appear in other Ohio cities.

A series of three lecture-recitals on the development of chamber music, given by Adolf Weidig, is announced at the American Conservatory of Music. The first recital took place Saturday afternoon, November 28, at Kimball Hall.

The 437th concert given under the auspices of the Amateur Musical Club will take place at the Assembly Room, Fine Arts Building, next Monday, November 30. The artists inscribed on the program are Mabel Sharp Herdien, soprano; Celene Loveland, pianist; Emelinda L. Makeel, mezzo, and Emmeran Stoeber, cellist.

Marie Yahr, contralto, will give a group of songs at the Arche Club, on Monday afternoon, December 7.

Glenn Dillard Gunn's interpretation class met Saturday afternoon at 3.30 o'clock. Agnes Leist-Beebe was the vocal soloist and piano solos were played by Helen Tenny, Corrine Frada, Seneca Pierce and Oscar Miller. The ensemble class played the Schumann quintet and the Beethoven trios, which they are preparing for the midwinter concerts.

The new trio organization—Walter Spry, pianist; Hugo Kortschak, violinist, and Bruno Steindel, cellist—will give their initial concert Sunday afternoon, December 13, in the Fine Arts Theatre. The trio will have the assistance of Mrs. Clarence Eddy, contralto, who will sing a group of songs, and the program of a popular nature will also include the D major trio of Beethoven and the D [illegible] of Schumann.

In the two-piano recital, to be given by Allen Spencer and Glen Dillard Gunn on Sunday afternoon, December 20, the "Benedictus," by Alkan, will be heard for the first time in Chicago. Mr. Spencer and Mr. Gunn will be assisted by Marion Green, basso, who will sing, among other things, a group of songs by John Alden Carpenter.

Mrs. King-Clark's Program.

Mrs. Frank King-Clark, assisted by Kurt Schindler, accompanist, will give the following program at her song recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on Tuesday afternoon, December 8:

Augusta Cottlow's Latest Berlin Achievement.

Beethoven's C minor and MacDowell's D minor concertos and the Busoni arrangement of the Liszt "Spanish Rhapsodie" were played by Augusta Cottlow in Berlin recently. The press gave her these tributes:

The first concert of the season in which a single soloist had the accompaniment of the Philharmonic Orchestra took place in the Singakademie last Thursday, and this too for a most worthy charity, for the aid of musicians who have found themselves in need on account of the war. The American pianist, Augusta Cottlow, so well and favorably known here, had an indisputable success. Her finger dexterity is astonishingly developed, her touch is light and full of color, her interpretations musical and intelligent, and she has both temperamental fire and tenderness. The orchestra had the rare privilege of being conducted by Ferruccio Busoni, who has also developed the great pianistic talent of the concert giver to its present ripe art.—Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, October 10, 1914.

One listens with pleasure to the grateful concerto of MacDowell, which seemed admirably adapted to Augusta Cottlow, whose fluent finger technic and ability to present an efficient interpretation, made a most favorable impression.—Berliner Lokal Anzeiger, October 9, 1914.

Augusta Cottlow prescnted her art in the cause of charity to a well filled house. The conducting of the orchestra by Ferruccio Busoni was of the greatest finesse. Miss Cottlow proved herself mistress of her art in the MacDowell concerto, a work full of fantasy and meaning. Her fiery, richly endowed technic, her genuine artistic spirit and beautiful touch made her the recipient of a great ovation after this concerto.—Allgemeine Musikzeitung, October 16, 1914.

I heard Augusta Cottlow play the D minor concerto of MacDowell with authority, beautiful tone, careful passage work and great warmth.—National Zeitung, Octoher 13, 1914.

In the Singakademie, Ferruccio Busoni assisted Augusta Cottlow with his artistic conducting. Herc Beethoven's C minor, MacDowell's highly sensitive and temperamental concerto in D minor and Busoni's arrangement of Liszt's Spanish rhapsody stood together. The gifted American pianist combined a forceful technical knowledge with a cleverly equalized and commanding delivery.—Deutsche Tageszeitung, October 15, 1914.

The prescntation of the MacDowell concerto was most satisfying both from a technical and artistic point of view, and the artist richly deserved the lively applause bestowed upon her.—Berliner Börsen Courier, Octobcr 11, 1914.

Of Busoni's gifted pupil, Augusta Cottlow, who has so often received well deserved mention, we must record another richly merited success. Perhaps her Beethoven was not quite satisfying, but with temperament and the necessary elegance and dash she brought forward the D minor concerto of MacDowell, the American composer. It was an artistically well rounded performance, spiritual yet abounding with vitality, and reflected great honor upon the performer.—Germania, October 16, 1914.

The artist showed her ability by doing justice to the purely classical as well as the more complicated romantic style. She bestowed special care in the working out of the MacDowell concerto, and earned rich applause through her exquisite tone and temperamental playing.—Die Post, October 10, 1914.

Judging by the well filled house that greeted Augusta Cottlow, her work in the cause of charity hrought fine results, but we record with pleasure that the artistic offerings far outweighed the financial. If we differ with her in her interpretation of Beethoven, we must, on the contrary, acknowledge that she found her own in the concerto of her countryman, MacDowell. To the forceful energy which she displayed in the allegro, the delicate grace which breathed through the carrying out of the last movement, made a delightful contrasting picture. In Busoni's arrangement of Liszt's Spanish rhapsody, which in point of difficulty seems to "outliszt Liszt," Miss Cottlow mastered these piled up difficulties in a manner which left no doubt as to her technical bravour and finish.—Berliner Börsen Zeitung, October 10, 1914. Opera Club Meets.

Despite the inclement weather a large number of members and guests attended the first evening "Conversazione" of the National Opera Club at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, Thursday evening, November 19. The program was in charge of the vice-presidents, Mme. de vere Sapio and Bernice de Pasquali, and illustrated the subject which the club has been considering during the past two months, early and modern Italian opera. During the past six weeks the club in a body has attended performances of "Madame Butterfly," "Boheme," "Jewels of the Madonna," "Aida," "Tales of Hoffmann" and the "Lilac Domino," and later on will attend the French and German performance at the Metropolitan Opera House.

This newly organized club has had a wonderful growth, numbering now nearly five hundred men and women in its membership, having for its object the furthering of educational work in music, the consideration and discussion of operatic and other musical subjects, and the creating of a desire for the highest and best in vocal music.

The Baroness Evans von Klenner, president, and the vice-presidents, Mme. de Vere Sapio, Florence Mulford Hunt, Mrs. John Kurrus, Bernice de Pasquali, and Minnie Tracy assisted in receiving the members and guests.

The guests of honor were: Marquis Ugo Spinola, Signor Serliti, Italian Vice-Consul, Cavaliere Campagnone, Signor Mercurio, Cavaliere Finnochiáro, with Pietro Floridia, the eminent composer as speaker. His subject was the younger school of Italian composers, many of them as yet unknown in America. Signor Floridia is known internationally by the operas "Maruzzo," "Paoletta" and "La Colonia Libera," based on Bret Harte's "Mliss."

The program was as follows:

Duet, Pagliacci ..... Leoncavallo
Mme. de Phillippe and Millo Picco.
Piano soli—
Gavotte ..... Sgambati
Scherzo ..... Van Westerhout
Studio di Concerto ..... G. Martucci
Mme. L. Delhaze-Wickes.

Arkady Bourstin's New York Recital.

Arkady Bourstin, violinist, was heard in recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on November 27. Mr. Bourstin appeared here several years ago and has in the meantime pursued his studies abroad. He has returned to this country a polished performer and his recital last Friday afternoon showed him to belong to the type of genuine violin virtuosi with a claim to recognition. His program was selected to exhibit the breadth of his art and the excellence of his technic. He played a Handel sonata, a Bach chaconne for violin alone, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," and a group of shorter compositions selected from the works of Tschaikowsky, Kreisler, Spalding and Wieniawski.

Mr. Bourstin revealed all of those requisites which go to make up the genuine successful violin virtuoso. It is safe to prophesy a fine future for this talented young artist.

The accompaniments were played by Andre Benoist.

STEINWAY

¶ Your long-cherished desire to own a Steinway Grand may now be easily realized. Style M is a small Grand, having all of the supreme qualities of every Steinway, at a price no higher than asked for other instruments of inferior tone and workmanship.

¶ This style is designed to meet the popular demand for a Grand piano suited to the limited space of modern homes and apartments. Its smaller size makes possible various economies in the manufacture of frames and cases, and these are applied to your advantage in the price, namely, $750.

Will you see and hear this new small grand? We shall be glad to have you test its qualities.

THE MUSICAL COURIER EXTRA
Published every Saturday by Musical Courier Co.
Devoted to the interests of the Piano Trade.

It is not illogical to assume that Oscar Hammerstein probably considers the Metropolitan Opera House the real theatre of war.

Dresden's Royal Opera opened with "Fidelio" and now is running intermittently, giving three or four performances per week.

A New York concert is to be given at Carnegie Hall, January 4, 1915, for the benefit of the MacDowell colony at Peterborough, N. H. The Philadelphia Orchestra will deliver the program, assisted by Olga Samaroff as soloist.

From Melbourns Table Talk comes "the information that 'Die Wacht am Rhein' has too extensive a range for the ordinary German regiment to sing it effectively when out of breath and excited after a run at the enemy's trenches."

It will hurt neither the Metropolitan Opera nor Luca Botta, the new lyric tenor at that institution, to mention the fact that he scored his first American success at the Tivoli Opera in San Francisco, as did also Giorgio Polacco and Luisa Tetrazzini.

"The Austrians have captured several Russian bases" (news headline). If they could secure a few Belgian tenors, a brace of English contraltos, and some French sopranos, Europe's concert possibly might rediscover its former harmonious ensemble.

In the "Letters to His Son," Lord Chesterfield advises his offspring to be thorough in his acquisition of knowledge and not to become a "virtuoso of small wares." The same good advice applies also to some public performers, even though the Chesterfieldian remark was not meant to have any musical significance.

Augusta Cottlow, the American pianist, writes from Berlin as follows: "We are living comfortably here with more good concerts than we can digest—forty-three advertised in yesterday's papers, and no amateurs or beginners either. They are eliminated for the present." It would seem, therefore—and Arthur M. Abell's letters to the MUSICAL COURIER have established the fact—that there is not much war excitement in the German capital so far as music and musical conditions are concerned. It is truly a remarkable condition.

Wagner's "Siegfried" is to be given an outdoor production at the Harvard Stadium on the evening of June 3 next. The Metropolitan Opera Company will supply the personnel and the orchestra. The singers include Messrs. Berger, Goritz, Reiss, Ruysdael, Whitehill, and Mmes. Gadski, Schumann-Heink and Gluck, or as cited by the New York Sun of November 24: "The entire cast is to be composed of the world's most famous singers, including Berger as Siegfried, Gadski as Brünnhilde and Schumann-Heink, Gluck, Mime, Alberich, Whitehill and Fafner." Note the new singers.

It is interesting to read in some recent program notes by Philip Hale, of Boston, that Strauss' fantasia, "From Italy," now considered by critics to be the revolutionary composer's mildest orchestral work, was hissed at its premiere, which took place in Munich, March 2, 1887. Strauss wrote to his uncle Hörburger: "The performance evoked a great uproar here—general stupefaction and rage; because I now begin to go my own way, provide my own form, and cause lazy persons mental perplexity." How often the same reflections must have come to Strauss later, as he created his bigger works and noted the bewilderment of the musicians and the insensate rage of the critics. Hans von Bülow, after seeing the score of "From Italy," doubted whether the Berlin Philharmonic "could do justice to the work after three rehearsals, on account of the great technical difficulties." To Ritter, von Bülow again speaks of "the colossal difficulties" of the performance. What would von Bülow have said of "Zarathustra," "Don Quixote" and "Heldenleben"?

Five per day is the average number of important musical entertainments taking place in New York this season. Berlin and London doubtless look upon us with envy for having seized their lost laurels as "music centers."

We learn from our New Orleans correspondent that the French Opera in that city will open on December 15 with Anton Sigaldi's company, which will give twenty-seven subscription performances and a number of extra ones.

Should Nietzsche be forgiven? He seceded from Wagner's literary bodyguard at Weimar, he instigated the present world's war, and he helped to cause Richard Strauss. A bold, bad man, that Nietzsche, who dared to call "Carmen" a great opera before the rest of the musical world had found it out.

The latest edition of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (Leipsic) shows how slowly news from the outside world is penetrating into Germany, for that publication speaks of Carl Friedberg and Leopold Godowsky as being prisoners of war in London. The two pianists have been in America these several weeks, and Friedberg is touring this country, while Godowsky will begin his concert wanderings in our land very shortly.

After an absence of two years, Arthur Shattuck, the American pianist, will return to the United States, December 15. Mr. Shattuck's concert itinerary includes recitals in Chicago, St. Louis, Milwaukee, St. Paul, Kansas City, Denver, Salt Lake City, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland and Seattle. He also will be the soloist four times with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, twice with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra and with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in Detroit.

Leo Slezak writes from the Hotel Esplanade, Berlin, to his managers, Haensel & Jones, that he is spending almost his entire time in the Kaiser's capital singing at benefit concerts for the Red Cross. The giant tenor says specifically: "I am delighted to be the means of raising many thousands of dollars for the Red Cross fund. Conditions of life here seem practically normal. Theatres and concert halls are all open, but nearly all of the concerts are for the benefit of the Red Cross."

"I wish to say, as an impartial observer of musical affairs in New York," writes a correspondent, "that some of the 'small fry' who have been giving concerts recently in New York and about whom the music critic of the Tribune has not written (in accordance with his recent astonishing announcement) are much better than the 'small fry' criticism which that personage has spewed forth about the 'large fry' he elects to 'honor' with his reviews. I have attended all the concerts of the past few weeks in this city and therefore I know whereof I speak. As a foreign visitor to your city (I am English) and one who has no musical axe to grind, my opinion is based on impersonal conviction. I think that a music critic who has the indecency and effrontery to speak of hard working and reputable musicians as 'small fry' should be ridden out of your city on a rail. He is the real 'small fry,' and I cannot understand how the editors and owners of his paper permit him publicly to insult many worthy members of an honorable profession." Some of our correspondent's remarks are well put—but others, whatever be their basis of truth, smack of intemperance and immoderateness.

CONCEIT IN MUSIC.

Conceit is one of the most valuable possessions a young man has. It serves to fill up the empty spaces of his mind, which are eventually to be stored with the fruits of experience. A youth without experience and judgment would be unfitted to undertake the struggle of winning a position in the world if he was not plentifully supplied with what we call conceit.

In Shakespeare's day the word conceit had another meaning. The Duke, in "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," says: "Proteus, the good conceit I hold of thee." Conceit in this case means opinion.

Don Pedro, in "Much Ado About Nothing," says: "His conceit is false," meaning that the thought was false.

In "The Merchant of Venice," Gratiano says: "With purpose to be dress'd in an opinion of wisdom, gravity, profound conceit." The word here means imagination.

In the second part of "King Henry IV" Falstaff says of Poins that "his wit is as thick as Tewksbury mustard: there is no more conceit in him than is in a mallet." Conceit here refers to quickness of mind.

But when we say today that a man is conceited we no longer recognize the archaic meaning of Shakespeare, Milton, Pope, Addison, Johnson, but think of a person who has a much higher opinion of himself and of his abilities in general than the plain facts warrant. Yet we maintain that without this same conceit few young men would be spurred to accomplish anything of value. It gives them confidence and makes them undertake work that they would certainly fear to begin if they had not their youthful self-confidence and their lack of experience. Children are notorious boasters. It is the old who exclaim: "Vanity; all is vanity."

The young harmony student thinks with confident cheerfulness of the symphonies he will write. The young soprano looks forward to the day when she will dominate the operatic stage. The youngster with the violin or piano sees visions of recitals in crowded concert halls, with fame and affluence in attendance.

> Fair laughs the morn, and soft the zephyr blows
> While proudly riding o'er the azure realm
> In gallant trim the gilded vessel goes;
> Youth on the prow, and Pleasure at the helm.
> —Gray.

This youthful confidence makes them embark upon their long and perilous voyage, unmindful of shipwreck if they fail, and ignorant of the batterings and weather marks their gilded vessel must endure before it rides in the harbor.

This conceit or exaggerated self-confidence is excusable and even desirable in the young. It is only to be condemned in persons who have had experience and have failed to see themselves in the proper perspective in comparison with others.

Is it possible to believe that a conceited pianist could preserve his conceit if he had a clear view of how relatively small his merits were compared with those of Liszt? The affected airs and lofty conceit of a popular tenor might easily be destroyed if the possessor of them could measure himself squarely and fairly with the standard of Rubini and Mario.

If the conceited artist could really see himself as he is, instead of as he thinks he is, he might be so discouraged that he would do nothing at all.

Thus conceit, like a good many other things, has a good as well as a bad side.

Many a young musician is conceited on account of the work he intends to do. If he could only wait until he has accomplished his work before he allowed his conceit to grow we might find it in our heart to excuse him. But it usually happens that by the time a man has put up with the buffettings of fortune long enough to do some fine work, all his conceit has been knocked out of him.

We have before us an interesting old volume published in London in 1794. It is a collection of lectures delivered to the students at the Hackney New College by Joseph Priestly, the famous English chemist who discovered nitric acid, nitrous oxide, hydrochloric acid, oxygen and other important gases, and invented that delectable quencher of natural as well as artificial thirst, soda water. He told his students that "a certain degree of vanity is excusable in young persons; and, indeed, it is by means of it that they are excited to exert themselves in a manner that they would not otherwise have done. But be careful that this temper be not indulged to excess, for it will then be found to have serious ill consequences; the least of which is the precluding future improvement, from being already satisfied with yourselves, and conscious of a sufficient superiority over others. The foundation of this self-conceit, on account of literary attainments, will be found to be extremely weak."

We may substitute musical attainments in place of literary attainments and still keep to the spirit of Priestly's lecture.

He goes on to show that the conceit is due to the nevelty the young man feels in seeing something in his mind where there was so recently a void.

"You will also find, if you continue your application to study, that it is only the elements of science that you can acquire here (in the college) and that if you live many years, they will bear but a small proportion to your future acquirements. But those future acquirements in consequence of their bearing a less proportion to your whole stock of knowledge, will not be so conspicuous. Thus, though all the buildings that in one year are added to such a city as London would make a pretty large country town, they bear so small a proportion to what was built before that they are not much noticed; whereas, had half the quantity of buildings been erected in a place where no house had existed before, it would have been a memorable event in the history of the country."

The conceit of the young man then is like that of the builder who has put up one house in a desert. The modesty of the truly great man is like that of a contractor who has erected many inconspicuous buildings in a great city.

Yet, without the conceit and confidence of youth the first house in the desert might never get built.

PRIZE FOR SYMPHONIC WORK.

The committee in charge of the contest for the prize of $500 offered by the Illinois Music Teachers' Association for the best symphonic work by an American composer, met in Chicago last week and through Glenn Dillard Gunn secured the services of Frederick Stock, Arne Oldberg and Theodore Otterstroem as judges. Mr. Stock has consented to act as chairman of the judges. The contest will close on January 1 and the winning composition will be played by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Glenn Dillard Gunn on March 11 at the second American concert.

A SIGN OF PROGRESS.

While the American Beethoven seems to be as far off as ever, nevertheless this country soon is to have the biggest submarines ever made, and that surely is one sign of great progress, according to the world's manner of thinking at the present moment. By the way, while the European nations are fighting, why can't we quietly annex Beethoven, Wagner, Mozart, Bach, Brahms and a few of the other glorious ones and let it go at that?

ABOUT BUSONI'S PLANS.

November 23, 1914.

To the Musical Courier:

Owing to the many reports afloat about Mr. Busoni's movements, I beg to ask of you space for the following statement, which will be of interest to many of your readers:

Reports have been circulated by many irresponsible persons that Mr. Busoni will not come to America this season.

Owing to the importance of this great artist such reports naturally have been discussed very widely, and many of those who had planned to hear Mr. Busoni or to engage him, were greatly disappointed.

Inquiries regarding the possibility of having him here were daily received by us, and we had no reason to suppose he would not be here in time. The difficulty of getting into cable communication with Germany caused us to learn only recently, from a letter which one of his friends brought to this country (and which took four weeks to reach us, as the friend delayed its delivery), that Mr. Busoni had been very ill and that this terrible war had very deeply affected him, who, although an Italian citizen, is in deep sympathy with Germany, where he has lived so long, and with France and England, where he had played so often and made so many friends.

Mr. Busoni stated that he felt much better at the time of writing this letter (October 15) and that he would surely be in America before the end of the year. A further letter to this effect has been received since.

Also we had a cable from him stating he would sail on the steamship Canopic, chartered by the Metropolitan Opera Company, but finally they could not give accommodation to Mr. Busoni.

Cables which we have tried to get to him during the last week or two, through the help of our bank, have been absolutely refused by the censor, but a cable has been forwarded by the State Department acquainting Mr. Busoni with the fact that his rearranged tour will commence on New Year's Day.

Thanking you in advance for the courtesy of printing the foregoing, I am,

Very truly yours,

M. H. HANSON.

CAMPANINI CORROBORATES.

A letter received from Cleofonte Campanini and reprinted herewith proves that the MUSICAL COURIER, as usual, is the only newspaper which can be relied upon to give its readers all the correct news all the time. This journal was the only publication in America which immediately branded as a "fake" the story sent out from inspired sources that Cleofonte Campanini intended to start a grand opera company in New York this winter. Here is the confirmation of the MUSICAL COURIER denial:

Chicago, November 25, 1914.

To the Musical Courier:

Referring to the various reports which have appeared in all the New York papers recently relative to the probability of my giving a season of grand opera in New York during this season, I beg to deny most emphatically that I have any such intention.

There has never been any friction between the Board of Directors of the Chicago Opera and myself, and I am now here preparing the plans for the season of 1915-16.

The statements attributed to me to the effect that I believe the Chicago Grand Opera Company could have carried out its plans, are without foundation.

As much as I like the city of New York and the opera going public who have always manifested a great interest in my work, I cannot forget the unusual sympathy and encouragement I have received from the Chicago public during the past four years, who always have stood for and demanded the highest in art and music.

I might add, that my relations with the board of directors have always been most pleasant and there never has been any question as to the fulfillment or validity of my contract. I shall continue as general director of the company.

Thanking you in advance for giving space to the above denial in your valuable paper. I am,

Yours very truly,

CHICAGO GRAND OPERA COMPANY,

(Signed) CLEOFONTE CAMPANINI, General Director.

A LITTLE PSYCHOLOGY.

It was wise on the part of the Reverend T. De Witt Talmage to base his arguments entirely on the Bible when answering certain skeptics in a sermon we once heard him preach. He knew that it was a hopeless chase of a will-o'-the-wisp to run after every semblance of proof that he could find in logic, fact, science, or literature. As a clergyman he was perfectly justified in making the Bible his one and only authority.

A musician, likewise, is acting wisely when he refuses to be enticed from the tempered scale into the pathless jungle of uncharted harmonies that are supposed to lie outside of it. There are persons who like to tell us that there is a difference between F sharp and G flat, between D sharp and E flat, between C sharp and D flat, and so on, throughout the entire chromatic scale.

It is not worth while arguing with these pseudo-scientists. No doubt there are many intervals between our semitones, but they are not recognized by the tempered scale. The tempered scale represents sounds, not signs on paper. It is only our notation which is at fault. When a composer has a musical idea in his mind he is obliged to employ a recognized notation if he wants the world to know what his idea is. He employs certain signs to convey his idea, notwithstanding the fact that these signs are the descendents of systems that are older than the tempered scale.

We might object to the word "cat" and insist on writing "kat." The difference exists only on paper. In sound there is no more difference between cat and kat than there is between F sharp and G flat. We are accustomed to certain words and certain chords written on paper in a certain conventional way. It would puzzle us to see on paper the words "ime awl a loan." But any one hearing such a sentence would understand it to mean "I'm all alone." In the same way it would be puzzling to see on paper such a chord as E flat, A double flat, B flat and D sharp. The sound of that chord in the tempered scale is nothing but E flat, G, B flat and E flat.

If the musician will only bear in mind that our entire modern musical system is founded on the tempered scale, the whole tempered scale, and nothing but the tempered scale, he will have no trouble in answering the hair-splitters who insist that there are certain subtle and delicate distinctions between notes that are written down on paper by means of differing signs. The reply is: "Not in the tempered scale. All the compositions of all the composers are written in a system of harmony that is constructed entirely and only of the intervals found in the tempered scale. Therefore any other interval introduced into those compositions is as foreign to them as a Greek word in an English song."

It will save the musician much trouble to stick to the formula, "Not in the tempered scale." Few persons are familiar enough with psychology to understand even to a limited extent the workings of the human mind. If they knew more about that interesting study they would know that it is futile to bring arguments against an emotionally toned complex, as it is called.

It would be altogether pedantic on our part to go further into this subject. To be candid, we profess only a superficial knowledge of it ourselves. But we may say that an emotionally toned complex can usually be recognized by the warmth of feeling with which it is defended. That warmth is the enemy of the cold light of reason. The same man who will acknowledge without any show of emotion the scientifically ascertained facts, that the earth revolves around the sun, that the moon causes the tides, that two and two make four, will at once become suffused with joy, or anger, or enthusiasm, or some other manifestation of emotion when his religion, his politics, this present war, or his particular hobby is talked about. He would not be a human being if he was devoid of these emotions, which are the fertile soil from which all our ideas spring.

But, at the same time, psychology teaches us that an emotionally toned complex cannot be reached by cold reason. It dwells in a logic-tight compartment, a bomb-proof trench. The only answer to be made, then, to the enthusiastic champion of superfine intervals is that they do not exist in the tempered scale.

It also is a waste of time to reason with the man—or, more often, the woman—who maintains that music and color are heavenly twins—the Castor and Pollux of art and worthy to be set in the heavens as an indissoluble constellation. If he and she can see iris hued glories beyond the art of Titian to portray we congratulate them on their ability to get more joy out of a concert than we can usually extract. But we shall not attempt to reason with them and prove by mathematics that those vibrations in common cannot exist. We know too much about psychology to undertake to change the emotionally toned complexes which have sustained martyrs in their fiery trials and made them scorn the "turn or burn" of their persecutors. Reason enters only at the mental gate; it cannot storm the emotional wall.

DAILY NEWSPAPER ACCURACY.

In the New York Tribune of Sunday, November 29, appeared the following, which was read with amazement by many persons in New York:

BASSO DIDUR FACES COURT MARTIAL.

Petrograd, November 28.—A review of the war published in a newspaper of Cracow, dated November 19 and found in the Austrian trenches, describes the Austrian troops as suffering terrible hardships from their continuous fighting, marching and trench digging.

The same paper says that Adam Didur, a bass singer, who has appeared in New York City, is now a prisoner of the Austrian military authorities in Cracow. He is soon to be brought before a military court, according to this newspaper, for a hearing on charges which involve an infraction of the military regulations.

Adam Didur came to America more than six years ago with Paderewski, who obtained a place for him in Oscar Hammerstein's Manhattan Opera House company. Both there and at the Metropolitan, where he went later, he complained because of the parts that were assigned to him, and it was not until March of last year, when "Boris Godunow" was presented here, that he made the success he had sought.

Among the parts he has sung here are Ramfis in "Aida," Mephistopheles, Leporello, Figaro and the buffo roles in "The Bartered Bride" and "Koenigskinder."

Somewhere and some place a cog slipped in the transmission to New York of what some one evidently intended to be a gratuitous and complimentary press notice for Adamo Didur, the popular singer at the Metropolitan Opera. The quasi-obituary published as an appendix by the Tribune makes the whole occurrence even funnier, for on the evening of Sunday, November 29 (the day the Tribune article was published) Didur sang at the Metropolitan Opera House concert, following upon a successful Saturday matinee appearance as Boris in Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunoff."

Didur says that he never was arrested in Cracow nor was he in the slightest danger from any military or other source there.

The MUSICAL COURIER views this matter more in sorrow than in anger; we do not expect daily papers to be posted in matters of music and musicians. It is not their business.

Henry Russell, managing director of the Boston Grand Opera Company, arrived in New York last Friday on the steamship Lusitania, and went to Boston on Saturday. Doubtless some important developments in connection with operatic matters in the Hub will transpire as a result of Mr. Russell's return.

EURIPIDES ON MUSIC.

Euripides, the ancient Greek tragic poet, was dissatisfied with the music of his day. It is now more than two thousand years since he complained that music could express only joy and dancing. He wanted music that could cure grief and stop a man from committing murder.

If he could attend a series of modern orchestral concerts he would soon hear plenty of music that is neither joyful nor suitable for dancing purposes. He might also conclude that the murder cure had not yet been added to the symphonic pharmacopœia. His remarks upon the music written by Richard Strauss for "Elektra" would readily be published by the MUSICAL COURIER even if several of the words had to be printed in blanks and dashes. Or possibly he might quote Shakespeare and say that German music was "Greek" to him.

Euripides, however, is not likely to return. The land where once he lived still basks in sunlight by the blue waters of the Mediterranean, but all that remains of Euripides are a few fragments of the many dramas he wrote when Greece was the intellectual center of the world.

More than a hundred years ago the Scottish poet, Thomas Campbell, made an English version of the lines from "Medea" which refer to music.

Tell me, ye bards, . . .
Why to the burst of joy alone
Accords sweet Music's soothing tone?
Why can no bard, with magic strain,
In slumbers steep the heart of pain?
While varied tones obey your sweep,
The mild, the plaintive, and the deep,
Bends not despairing grief to hear
Your golden lute, with ravish'd ear?
Oh! has your sweetest shell no power to bind
The fiercer pangs that shake the mind,
And lull the wrath at whose command
Murder bares her gory hand?
When flush'd with joy, the rosy throng
Weave the light dance, ye swell the song!
Cease, ye vain warblers! cease to charm
The breast with other raptures warm!
Cease! till your hand with magic strain
In slumbers steep the heart of pain!

The wonder is not that ancient music was found fault with, but that it received so much attention and praise; for it was very crude, according to our modern standards.

There was no harmony except the octave, and the music was altogether subordinate to the words. After the Peloponnesian wars the art critics of the period thought that music was fast on the way to degeneracy because the tune began to claim attention for its own sake to the detriment of the meaning of the words. There never was any part singing in our sense of the word, and all the choruses were in unison or octaves.

MELBA, THE AUCTIONEER.

The attached interesting account of how Mme. Melba is aiding her country's cause in the war is from the New Zealand Sporting and Dramatic Review of October 22, 1914:

"Who'll buy my last farthing?" asked Melba from the platform of the Sydney Town Hall, when, nearing the conclusion of a wonderful evening, the diva put up to auction the last of a bag of farthings which she had just sold among the audience in the body of the hall. Mrs. Sam Hordern gave £100 for one, the total amount realized in this way being £144 14s. 6d. One, five and ten pounds were bid for the remaining farthing. Then there was a pause and Melba said, "I'll give £11 for it myself." Twelve came promptly from the body of the hall; then £15, £17. "Surely it is not going under £20," called the distinguished auctioneer, and the bid of £20 came from another quarter. "God bless you, £25 bid. Must I let it go at £25? £30 bid," and at that figure the humble little farthing was knocked down to a happy purchaser, who marched up to the front of the platform in order to receive his purchase from the hands of the diva.

Jonas in Anecdotal Vein.

Alberto Jonas, the Spanish pianist, teacher and athlete, who made his big musical reputation in Berlin and now appears to be in the way of augmenting it in New York, where he has settled for a year or two, possesses a splendid technic on the keyboard, a swift and deadly service in tennis, and an unusually effective uppercut when he dons the gloves for "le box." Last week he put us through some hard paces that stood in no relation whatsoever to his prematurely silvered locks.

In the intervals of recovery, Jonas had much to say about his celebrated boy pupil, Pepito Arriola, who made such a striking impression here a few years ago.

"Pepito was 'discovered' in Madrid by Arthur Nikisch," related Jonas, "and he took him as his protégé to various capitals in Europe, where the child's precocious musical gifts caused astonishment in professional and scientific circles. After a short time spent in Leipsic, little Pepito came under my tutelage and I at once recognized him as the possessor of astounding gifts. He had the mind of a man in that childish body of his, and I found that he could discourse intelligently on almost any topic. When persons addressed him in childish terms or sought to lavish infantile endearments upon him, he would say with quite some temper: 'Please don't bore me. You'd better talk like that to your babies, but not to me.' Pepito taught himself chess, and yet when his mother forced him to wash his hands before he took his music lesson he would clean only the palms and answer the motherly remonstrances with: 'I don't play with the back of my hands, do I?'

"He was amazingly self reliant, and when, at the age of seven, he began to make intermittent appearances in public, he would take charge of all the traveling arrangements for himself and his mother, checking the baggage, purchasing the tickets, etc. I remember his trip to Moscow at that time. I was at the station to see him off. I encountered only the mother, and asked: 'Where's Pepito?' She pointed to the ticket window, and unseen I approached the independent little tot.

"'Give me two tickets to Moscow,' he piped in his tiny treble. The ticket seller peered about and had to lean out of his cell to see the purchaser. 'Where's your father?' he demanded.

"'Potztausend,' Pepito burst forth, 'what's my father got to do with this? Are you selling railroad tickets or investigating the genealogies of travelers? Is this good money I offer you, or is it counterfeit? I'll give you just a minute to hand me those tickets to Moscow or else I'll call for your superior and find out what right you have to cross examine and insult a gentleman.' The ticket seller, too amazed to reply, gazed at the infuriated lad in open eyed wonder, and handed out the cardboards to Moscow. And yet that same youngster who cowed the Berlin ticket agent escaped from his mother on the day of the Moscow concert, played on the street with some gamins across whom he chanced, got into a fight with them, and appeared at the hotel one hour before concert time with his left eye blackened and his right cheek bone gashed so badly that it had to be hidden with inches of plaster. In that plight he made his debut in Moscow, playing a concerto with orchestra.

"I was very much opposed to the continuance of his concert career, and tried to prevent his American tour, but his parents were poor, and they finally succumbed to the mangerial blandishments. I did not see Pepito for many years after that, but heard of him as making tours in Mexico, South America, Spain, etc. About six months ago his mother turned up in Berlin and asked me whether I would see Pepito, who was in town with her. I refused, and I reproached my visitor severely for having 'helped to ruin Pepito's artistic future,' as I put it. I told her that she would have to bear a heavy load on her conscience. 'Will you see him for old time's sake?' she pleaded. Finally I consented and Pepito came to see me. He was seventeen years old and instead of the pale, anemic wreck I expected to see, I found a broad shouldered, muscular, fine natured young man, with a quiet, modest manner, a soft spoken voice, and an intelligent, introspective eye.

"What was my absolute surprise, after conversing with him and hearing him play, to discover that he had been supporting his entire family and carrying them with him on all his travels, that a teacher accompanied him constantly who instructed him in various branches of learning outside of music, that he had mastered several languages perfectly, had read Shakespeare, Goethe, Schiller, Milton, Racine, and the other classics, and, before all things, had acquired an immense repertoire on the piano all by himself, and showed astounding inmprovement in every department of his piano playing.

"Pepito at once resumed his lessons with me, and within a few months he had added the five Beethoven concertos to his repertoire, and was engaged to play them under Weingartner on the Beethoven tour which that conductor planned to undertake with his Vienna orchestra. Nikisch and Strauss also secured Pepito for early appearances. Then the war came, and, of course, everything was off in the concert line. Pepito went to Madrid, where he is now. He represents one of the few 'Wunderkind' successes which ripened into unquestionable artistic flower. I consider him a phenomenon."

Thanks, Henry.

Coming back to Daniel Frohman's question of last week, regarding the reasons why "Carmen" failed at its early representations in Paris, Henry T. Finck calls our attention to the fact that in the new Schirmer edition of "Carmen," Philip Hale "explains the extraordinary combination of circumstances which led to the failure of the first production of this immortal work."

Verbal Gouging.

The real atrocities of this dreadful war are the controversies between the English authors and the German university professors.

Look Out, Kaiser.

And once in a while comes such an amusing—to the American mind—fulmination as this, which Frederic Harrison published in the London Times: "Be it understood that when the Allies have finally crushed this monstrous brood, the Kaiser—if, indeed, he chose to survive—shall be submitted to the degradation inflicted on poor Dreyfus. In presence of allied troops, let his bloodstained sword be broken on his craven back and the uniform and orders of which he is so childishly proud be stamped in the mire. And, if he lives through it, St. Helena or the Devil's Island might be his prison and his grave."

Fine English Feeling.

Here and there, however, are finely tempered and judicial minds which seem not to be blinded by passion or prejudice. One such person, the editor of the London Church Times, writes in answer to some of the overheated public statements of Churchill:

"Insulting references to the German fleet are not needed. They are the more objectionable since the officers of that fleet have, with rare exceptions, shown a spirit which should shame their fellows of the land forces. The English admiralty has once, at least, had occasion to acknowledge their courteous conduct of the war. . . .

"It was deplorable to talk about 'digging out the rats.' And seldom or never was swagger more signally rebuked. Even as he spoke some of the skulking rats of his imagination were putting out to sea for an enterprise of conspicuous peril. On the day that his speech was reported we heard also the result of this high venture, mourning the loss of three fine ships and many priceless lives. Let us at least respect the courage of the men who could strike such a blow at our immense preponderance of force. As we brace ourselves for the stern prosecution of the struggle to a victorious end, let us be glad that some at least of our opponents are not unworthy of our steel, and that in Germany there is a nucleus of men whom in after years we may be proud to count as friends."

Violation of Neutrality.

Italy's standing army in America may be seen on any Caruso night at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The Boys Fail to Agree.

An honest difference of opinion maintains music criticism just as surely as, according to Mark Twain, it causes horse races. For instance, last week Arrigo Serato gave a recital at Carnegie Hall, and played, among other things, a violin sonata by Bach, which has a very fine and very famous adagio. What does our warm friend, the music critic of the Times, say about Serato's playing [illegible] adagio? Harken. He says that "unquestionably there is more poetical feeling in Bach's sonata, especially in the adagio, than Mr. Serato found there." So far so good. But along comes our equally close friend, the music critic of the Press, and tells us that "perhaps the supreme moment of the afternoon was reached in Serato's performance of the adagio from the Bach sonata in his deeply and intensely emotional proclamation of a cantilena that yesterday seemed to belong among the most heart searching melodic inspirations of the German master."

Regarding the "Gioconda" performance on Wednesday we find these trifling little discrepancies:

Sun.

Caruso was at his best in all respects.

Tribune.

Caruso's voice was less golden than usual last night, as the great tenor was afflicted with a cold.

Herald.

Caruso was in magnificent voice.

Press.

One or two lapses from pitch made themselves noticeable. Caruso, whose intonation generally is so reliable, had his troubles once or twice.

In Good Company.

If we had paid for our seat at "The Magic Flute" performance we should ask the New York Tribune to refund our money, as it has promised to do to dissatisfied purchasers of wares advertised in its columns. John F. Runciman, were he in New York and a paying opera goer, would be another malcontent demanding the return of his admission fee. He heard "The Magic Flute" recently in London and wrote in the Saturday Review (November 7, 1914): "The interminably slow songs, beautiful tunes to pointless verses, grow wearisome."

Multum in Parvo.

In what ratio to the size of a country is the length of its national anthem? This question crosses our mind after looking through a collection of "National Hymns of All Countries" (compiled and arranged by Gustav Hinrichs), just published by G. Schirmer. A comparison of the various items of the collection shows, for instance, that while the national air of England and Germany ("God Save the King" and "Heil dir im Siegerkranz," sung to the same tune) is only two lines in length, the patriotic air of San Salvador runs to three pages. The other figures show equally amusing proportions. Let the whole roster speak for itself:

Maennerchor Marauders.

We are surprised at the naivété of our esteemed contemporary, the London Musical News, for giving space to and commenting seriously upon such an item as the attached printed in its issue of November 14, 1914:

"It is stated that the vice-president of one of the leading American railways has warned Canada of a secret movement among German singing societies in the United States, numbering half a million members, to arm for a raid on Canada, but we do not suppose that the Teutonic citizens of the States would do anything so foolish as to try and set their adopted country even more against Kaiserism than it is at present."

Aside from the fact that most of the German choral singers in this country are American citizens, it should be borne in mind that the 500,000 could not march very far without falling into the hands of the police.

GRAND OPERA IN NEW YORK.

"Parsifal" Has Its Usual Thanksgiving Matinee Performance—"Carmen" Draws Another Capacity Audience—Other Bills of the Week.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

"The Magic Flute,' November 23.

The second week of the present Metropolitan season began with a performance in German of "The Magic Flute."

To one who has heard "The Magic Flute" properly done, as for instance, the ideal performances in Munich, under the late Felix Mottl, it is most disconcerting to listen to the exaggeratedly dragged tempi in which Alfred Hertz indulges. They have no relation to the true Mozart style.

Emmy Destinn was not in her usual good voice; her best work was in the long aria of the second act.

Frieda Hempel sang the two arias of the Queen of the Night delightfully. She is an artist always, one who never offends the musical sense or offends against the tenets of singing.

Jacques Urlus' voice is not particularly suited to the role of Tamino, for he is so distinctly a heroic tenor that it seems most peculiar to assign him a role like this. However, he did his best, and at least sang with sincerity and acted strikingly.

Goritz was the Papageno, and the newcomer, Elizabeth Schumann, made a very satisfactory Papagena.

Carl Braun, as the Sarastro, did extremely effective work, while Paul Althouse was thoroughly satisfactory in the small role of the First Priest.

Compliments to Vera Curtis, Rita Fornia, Lila Robeson as the "drei Damen" and Leonora Sparkes, Louise Cox and Marie Mattfeld as the "drei Knaben." The difficult concerted music which falls to these parts was sung beautifully.

On the whole, the performance was not exactly an inspiring one and hardly up to the usual Metropolitan standard. The bright particular features were the excellent scenery and the really magnificent stage management, for which credit is due to the young American stage manager, Loomis Taylor.

"Gioconda," November 25.

Ponchielli's tuneful opera was presented with an excellent cast.

Emmy Destinn in the title role was in splendid form and much better than in "The Magic Flute," Monday evening.

Margarete Ober's magnificent voice and impressive stage presence lent particular distinction to the role of Laura Adorno, which she sang and acted in a manner to score a decided personal success.

Caruso as Grimaldo was—Caruso. But, with a dashing black wig, a different looking Caruso than the one we are used to, though the marvelous voice and the wonderful vocalization were features which he still retained, and is likely to for many a year to come.

Amato was, as ever, polished and masterful in his well known impersonation of Barnaba. His singing this season has grown in breadth and beauty.

De Segurola was the Badoero. The chorus, which has a large opportunity in this opera, did excellent work and the orchestra played with its usual thorough capability when it is under Polacco or Toscanini. All in all it was an excellent performance, and if the end of the opera falls off so badly that not more than half an audience is left in front for the final curtain, it is only the fault of Ponchielli and his librettist, Boito.

Polacco conducted with vim and imagination.

"Parsifal," November 26 (Matinee).

"Parsifal" had its usual Thanksgiving Day performance at the Metropolitan Opera House last week, November 26, with a cast almost entirely different from that which gave this opera last season. The role of Amfortas was taken by Clarence Whitehill, who has not been heard here in the part for several years. He sang it with much beauty of tone, making the most of the broad musical strophes and dramatic phrases, and his interpretation was deeply impressive, as he is not only well suited in appearance for the character, but also he gave impressive value to every word of the text and acted with that deep feeling which compelled conviction on the part of his hearers. Carl Braun put much more warmth into his impersonation of Gurnemanz than is generally done by interpreters who have not Braun's resource. His singing is as dignified as his acting, and he put unusual intelligence and impressiveness into both.

Johannes Sembach made his first appearance at the Metropolitan in the role of Parsifal and created a pleasing impression. He possesses a voice of excellent quality and his singing of the music was marked by interpretative insight and musicianship. His voice is particularly agreeable in pianissimo passages. His appearance in the first act showed that extreme youthfulness which is necessary to make the role really acceptable, and his acting was at all times suited to the content of the poem. The Klingsor was Otto Goritz.

Margarete Matzenauer, cast in the role of Kundry, displayed her customary vocal and dramatic grasp. She sang the part exceedingly well, and her acting was full of artistic touches, which, added to her characteristic make-up, enabled her to score a decisive success with the audience. Her versatility was demonstrated amply in this role of the beauteous and seductive slave of Klingsor, a part she masters as completely as the heroic roles which she sings in the "Ring."

In general the stage direction upon this occasion was excellent, but it cannot make up for the worn appearance of the scenery nor for the defective mechanism which makes the changing scenery in the first and last acts move in jerks, destroying entirely the intended illusion. The choruses were excellent, and this is especially true of the chorus of flower maidens. The opera was conducted by Alfred Hertz.

"Traviata," November 26 (Evening).

It is harder to conceive a finer Violetta than that presented Thanksgiving evening by Frieda Hempel. She was in marvelous voice, her tremendous vocal ability was exhibited to the full and such acting as the part calls for was most capably done. She was finely supported by the new Italian tenor, Luca Botta. Botta has a voice which approaches in quality more closely to Caruso's than that of any of the other younger Italian tenors whom we have heard and his vocalization is thoroughly excellent. Alfredo is not much of an acting role, but Botta succeeded in keeping it from being stilted and silly, which is something in itself. But why he should appear at Violetta's country house in the second act clad in the khaki costume and high leather leggings of a professional chauffeur, it is impossible to understand. He is supposed to wear a riding costume.

Amato—the ever satisfactory—lent dignity and weight to the role of Germont, singing his scene with Violetta in the second act especially well.

The chorus and orchestra again were excellent, and Giorgio Polacco showed himself, as in "La Gioconda" the evening before, to be a thoroughly capable conductor of the very first rank.

"Carmen," November 27.

The first of the operatic repetitions came last Friday, when "Carmen" was on the boards again, with Enrico Caruso and Geraldine Farrar duplicating their effective impersonations of the impassioned pair possessed of more ardor than discretion. As at the premiere, Caruso sang the Don Jose role beautifully and acted it with fervor, especially in the stirring scenes of the smugglers' camp and the finale. Farrar strengthened the good impression made at her debut as Carmen, for she was less nervous and she wrought many subtle details in characterization which were lacking on the earlier occasion.

Lucrezia Bori was the Micaela, and aside from making an extremely attractive picture in the role, she sang it with impeccable taste and fine sense of stylistic and tonal values. Her voice is well suited in the Bizet music and her conception of the Micaela character combines sincerity with the charm of unaffected simplicity.

Clarence Whitehill was in every way an excellent Escamillo. He depicts the bull fighter as a personage calmly confident of his own power and in appearance and demeanor makes the part completely plausible. Vocally, the Whitehill performance was in every respect ideal. He has a voice which always stays within mellifluous boundaries so far as dynamics are concerned and he employs it with a full knowledge of the requirements of bel canto as applied to dramatic exposition. His "Toreador" aria brought down the house, and most deservedly so.

In the small part of Frasquita, Mabel Garrison revealed a brightly colored voice of refined quality, smooth timbre, and good carrying power. She looked pretty and acted with grace. As before, Sophie Braslau, Albert Reiss, Angelo Bada, Leon Rothier and Desiré Defrère filled the other roles, Arturo Toscanini conducted, and Rosina Galli premiere danseused.

"Boris Godunoff," November 28 (Matinee).

The matinee last Saturday brought forth an interesting production of Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunoff." Although there were no stars in the cast, nevertheless the house was crowded, which goes to show that "Boris Godunoff" registered its impression through the performances during the previous season.

The work has so much intrinsic merit that it is bound to succeed whenever well presented. On this occasion it was listened to with marked attention. The music of "Boris" is sombre, but it has the true color of Russian folksong, is richly instrumentated, and well supplied with resonant and striking choral effects. In fact, the outstanding features of this opera are the chorus, orchestra, and the role of Boris, all of which were beyond criticism on Saturday. Didur was in fine voice and acted his role of the conscience stricken tyrant with consummate art. Paul Althouse, who repeated the role of Dimitri, in which he made his debut last season, has gained greatly in his presentation of it.

The other characters were well done and need not here be particularized, since they are utilized largely to make up the ensemble in "Boris Godunoff," whose impressive massiveness requires just such a combination as can be brought forth by the Metropolitan organization. It is without question a great music drama and should be heard frequently. Toscanini conducted.

Metropolitan Sunday Concert, November 29.

Frieda Hempel, soprano; Jacques Urlus, tenor, and Adamo Didur, baritone, were the soloists at the Sunday evening concert at the Metropolitan Opera House, November 29.

In the Mozart aria from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" and the concert waltz "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Mme. Hempel's lovely voice, sounding even, flexible, clear and absolutely controlled, as usual aroused the enthusiasm of her audience and encores must needs be forthcoming from this much admired soprano. Not only her singing but also her charming personality makes her one of the most popular of the Metropolitan Opera sopranos.

Jacques Urlus, whose prestige as a Wagnerian tenor needs no comment here, sang for his first number "The Prayer," from "Rienzi" (Wagner), and for his second Strauss' "Traum durch die Dämmerung," "Murmelndes Lüftchen" (Jensen) and Schumann's "Der Hidalgo." Each piece marked the tenor as a superior artist in the singing of lieder. "Traum durch die Dämmerung" was exquisitely delivered and Mr. Urlus repeated it for his second encore much to the pleasure of the audience.

Adamo Didur was heard in the "Pagliacci" prologue (Leoncavallo), "The Arioso," from "The Demon" (Rubinstein), and Tosti's "Si tu le voulais." The baritone received repeated recalls but did not respond with encores.

The orchestral numbers were the Mendelssohn overture "Fingal's Cave," Glinka's "Kamarinskaja," Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana," and "Triumphal Entry of the Bojars," by Halvorsen.

BROOKLYN ACADEMY.

"Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," November 28 (Evening).

The Metropolitan Opera Company made its second visit to Brooklyn this season on Saturday evening, November 28. The program was a double bill, "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci," and with Giorgio Polacco conducting with his accustomed skill, a brilliant performance was given. The Brooklyn Academy was crowded, and the audience was an enthusiastic one almost to the extreme, some few persons insisting on applauding when handclapping was very much out of place.

No one more suited for the role of Santuzza could have been chosen that Johanna Gadski, who interpreted the part of the heroine in realistic fashion. She was in splendid voice throughout, and with the added effectiveness of her acting, she well deserved the enthusiastic applause she received.

The new tenor, Luca Botta, who evidently has come to stay, added another triumph to his last week's successes in the role of Turiddu. Although he appeared a little nervous at first, possibly because of the strange house, this was soon forgotten by the audience, and when he finally rushed from the stage, after saying his last farewell to Lucia, he was wildly applauded.

Maria Duchene was the Lola, and Riccardo Tegani, another newcomer, displayed a bass voice of excellent quality in the role of Alfio. Marie Mattfeld gave an able interpretation of Lucia. The work of the chorus and orchestra was well done.

Could a more superb Nedda have been chosen that Lucrezia Bori? Pretty, a fine singer, and a brilliant actress, she made the heroine the chief part of the performance.

Giovanni Martinelli sang Canio, and Antonio Scotti was the Tonio. Riccardo Tegani made a very good Silvio. Pietro Audisio sang the role of Beppe. Giorgio Polacco led both operas with exceptional fire, feeling and authority.

Austin Violin Recital, December 3.

Aeolian Hall, New York, will hold the usual large gathering of the friends of Florence Austin, "America's violinist," tomorrow, Thursday, December 3, at 3 o'clock. She will play the program printed in full in the MUSICAL COURIER last week, which, besides standard compositions by Handel, Mendelssohn, Goldmark and Wieniawski, contains novelties composed for and dedicated to the violinist by Cecil Burleigh, namely, "Twelve Poems," and "Souvenir," by Weitzel. Edna Rothwell will be at the piano.

Mme. Samaroff's Pianism.

Very remarkable piano playing was that vouchsafed by Olga Samaroff at her Carnegie Hall recital, Saturday afternoon, November 28, and it altogether bore out the verdict expressed in the Musical Courier last week after the same pianist's Philadelphia appearance in the Tschaikowsky concerto. There is no question but that Mme. Samaroff's several years of retirement from the concert platform have ripened her into an artist of unusual powers, even though her exceptional talent was recognized during her earlier virtuoso career and proclaimed emphatically by the connoisseurs and the professional reviewers of this country and Europe.

In Beethoven's D minor sonata, not too frequently played, Mme. Samaroff hit upon a most welcome feature for the beginning of her program. While the opus is not one of Beethoven's periods of extreme intellectual depth, nevertheless it offers numerous difficulties to the player, chief among which are its many varied moods, its lyrical demands, and its perfection of line and form, all of which require rare interpretative ability for a successful projection. Mme. Samaroff challenged admiration in the sonata for her moderation, dignity, straightforward feeling, finely graded tonal effects, and gratifyingly accurate mechanics. The performance represented a high order of Beethoven exposition.

Another sonata was on the program, and MacDowell admirers who were not present will be glad to hear that it was his very excellent "Eroica." Here Mme. Samaroff rose to extraordinary heights and put into the music a degree of kindling passion which is not customarily associated with the performances of MacDowell's works, but in her promulgation seemed to be to the great advantage of the "Eroica" sonata. The player made our revered American composer sound not only spiritual, but also human, and for that kind of MacDowell interpretation too much praise cannot be extended. If his message is to reach all his countrymen at some time, then his music always should be voiced in such a way as to show that MacDowell felt close to their hearts and not over their heads. Muscular as were the intensively declamatory parts of Mme. Samaroff's reading, she showed herself just as compelling when she wooed the keys in order to do the "tenderly longingly" of the third movement, and skimmed over them with gossamer touch for the "elf like, as light and swift as possible" of the second section. It was altogether a vital, thoroughly big and tellingly sympathetic performance and impressed intelligent auditors profoundly.

Joined with the cerebral pianism required for the setting forth of the sonatas, Mme. Samaroff exhibited also ear tickling digital dexterity and limpidity of touch in Graun's "Presto," and Martini's "Giga," classical purity of tone in Benda's "Largo," and robust command of mass effects in the Beethoven-Rubinstein Turkish march from "The Ruins of Athens."

Chopin numbers constituted the third group of the program. The B major nocturne was saturated with the necessary romanticism, the F major and D minor preludes reflected each its individual note, eloquently uttered, the D flat valse was a virtuoso feat of refreshing brilliancy, and Liszt's arrangement of two of the Chopin songs ("Meine Freuden" and "Bacchanale") formed a novel and warmly received feature, full of delightful phases in nuancing and tone coloring.

Schubert-Liszt's "Soirees de Vienne," No. 6, and Liszt's clever setting of the "Rakoczy March" brought the afternoon's pleasures to an exciting close and resulted in a scene of tumultuous insistence on extra numbers.

Mme. Samaroff has reestablished her right to be accorded a place with the most popular of our keyboard favorites and musical New York is not likely to miss any of her future concert appearances in this city. Not that Carnegie Hall revealed any lack of attendance at last week's recital; the auditorium was full, surprisingly so for the concert of an American artist, for that Olga Samaroff is, in spite of her Russian name. In Philadelphia she is known as Mrs. Leopold Stokowski, the wife of the gifted conductor of the symphony orchestra there.

People's Symphony Chamber Music Concer.

"The Simple and Enlarged Song Form" was the subject of Musical Director F. X. Arens' lecture at the Symphony Auxiliary Club chamber music concert, Washington Irving High School, New York, November 28. His clear exposition of this subject brought forth salient facts to many interested hearers, and was especially helpful through the singing which illustrated the points made. Mme. Calloway-Jones, soprano; Katherine Lurch, alto, and Jerome Swineford, bass, were the vocalists. Laeta Hartley, pianist, fresh from triumphs in Boston; Maximilian Pilzer, violinist, and Lewis Sperandi, French horn player, collaborated in a unique trio, enabling them to play the celebrated melodious Brahms trio in E flat. The beautiful tones of the horn, especially in the adagio, made an impression, and throughout the evening Miss Hartley showed herself to be a pianist of fine attainments. With Miss Pilzer playing sympathetic accompaniments, Mr. Pilzer was heard in an old French "Chanson," a Bohemian excerpt by Smetana, showing his brilliant technical skill, and his own composition, a very pretty "Cradle Song." A good sized audience applauded everything.

Ballet Music Ravel, Felice Lyne.

Sunday afternoon's concert (November 29) of the New York Symphony Society, at Aeolian Hall, presented a program supposed to give a view of the development of French dance music from Rameau to the present time, and including ballet music of Gluck, Delibes, Massenet and Saint-Saëns. The orchestra played well, but Walter Damrosch's band is somewhat heavy for the delicate rhythmic and dynamic nuances which are the life and soul of such music.

The feature of the program was the first performance in America of Ravel's symphonic fragment, "Daphnis and Chloë." Two or three years ago, Paris became excited over the first Russian dancers who visited there before they had been seen in America. Ravel was among those who, entranced by their work, wrote special music for them to dance to, this "Daphnis and Chloë," performed first in Paris in June, 1912, by the Russian dancers with Nijinski, being his effort. It is modern. It is very modern. The closest description which can be made of it is to say that it sounds, both in material and orchestration, very much like all the other works of this extremely modern French school. Heard in the theatre, accompanied by the dance movements, its music is written to illustrate, it may be very interesting and attractive. On Sunday it was at least interesting; not especially attractive; rather long; extremely cacophonic. Undoubtedly, the curious were glad to have heard it once and not anxious to hear it again. This sort of thing, this careful avoidance of semblance of form, this careful avoidance of the obvious melodic line, this formulistic orchestration—much harps, much piccolos, much celesta, much harmonics—is getting to be so unconventional that it is almost commonplace. The audience did not appear particularly enthusiastic about it any more than the present writer was.

The soloist of the afternoon was Felice Lyne, the coloratura soprano. She sang Suzanne's aria from "The Magic Flute" with taste and discretion. It is an unusual class of work for her and in encompassing it well she showed her thorough artistic adaptability. Her second number was the "Shadow Song" from "Dinorah," splendidly done, the vocal gymnastics being delivered with purity and precision.

Not "Juice."

[From the Musical Courier Extra.]

In an advertisement of Cramer Palace of Music, of Frederick, Md., occurs the sentence: "Anything from a 'juice' harp to a piano." The idea is all right, but there is no such thing as a "juice" harp. It is a Jew's-harp, and why on earth it should be written as "juice harp" the present scribe knoweth not, unless the virtuosi who perform on this "instrument" do their best work when under the influence of "corn juice."

By the way, it is a question in the mind of this scribe whether Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" has the right explanation of the origin of the term "Jew's-harp," which has worried various more or less learned etymologists. Grove says:

"It has been conjectured that the instrument derived its name from being made and sold in England by Jews, or supposed to be so."

The writer has also seen somewhere an explanation which claimed that the name was originally "jaws harp," the instrument being so entitled because it is placed between the jaws.

Neither of these theories seems to fill the bill, however, and the writer's theory is certainly just as good or bad as these, viz., that the Jew's-harp gets its name from a peculiar motion of the hand and arm in playing upon it, which strongly resembles the gesture of emphasis used by stage Hebrews, but seldom seen in real life.

The Jew's-harp is a wonderful instrument—though you may not believe it. It has been honored by elevation to the music hall stage, where virtuosi have coaxed sweet harmonies out of its recalcitrant frame. Grove tells of a soldier of Frederick the Great who "so charmed the king by his performance on two Jew's-harps that he gave him his discharge, together with a present of money." Some heartless commentator on this historical occurrence might suggest that Frederick pensioned and discharged the man so that he would never hear the "instrument" again, like the famous Spanish bandurria player, who was paid one maravedí (a small coin) for playing, and ten for leaving off!

Adele Kätz Heard in Recital.

Adele Kätz gave a recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, Saturday evening, November 28.

Miss Kätz is a young pianist who apparently took her task very seriously. She displayed considerable talent, marked technical facility, and deserves much encouragement for this endeavor. Good taste pervaded her delivery of a program which consisted of the following numbers: Gavotte, Bach-Saint-Saëns; "Andante con Variazione," Haydn; "Carnival," Schumann; "Capriccio," Brahms; "Meditation," Tschaikowsky; etudes, op. 10, No. 11, op. 25, No. 7 and 3, Chopin; scherzo, B minor, Chopin; impromptu, MacDowell; "Improvisation," Reger; "Soirees du Vienne," Schubert-Liszt; "Waldesrauschen," Liszt; rhapsody, No. 12, Liszt.

Sharlow and Werrenrath in Arion Concert.

Myrna Sharlow, soprano, and Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, supplied the enjoyable solo singing at the first concert this season, November 29, of the Gesangverein Arion, New York, Joseph Davis, acting conductor.

Miss Sharlow has a brilliant, high voice, united with a very youthful, lovely appearance, and this attractive combination completely won her hearers. She sang the "Micaëla" aria from "Carmen," and later these songs: "Ich Liebe Dich," Grieg; "Mein Lieber Schatz," Hans Schmidt; "To a Messenger," La Forge, and "The Year's at the Spring," Mrs. Beach. Miss Sharlow's excellent German enunciation in the first two songs and her finished style brought her so much applause that she had to sing an encore, "Johnny."

Reinald Werrenrath's delivery of "Hear Me," by Handel, was such as to oblige him to sing again, the "Holder Abendstern," by Wagner, in which this splendid baritone's restrained and refined methods shone admirably. Later Mr. Werrenrath sang "O Wüsst Ich Doch," Brahms; "Lauf der Welt," Grieg, and "Licht," Sinding. The humor of the Grieg song and the fine climax, a high F, in "Licht," with might of expression, roused genuinely appreciative applause, resulting in his singing another Brahms song.

Some rather crude singing by the chorus was later offset by the excellent results obtained in Saman's "Sonntags am Rhein," in which Miss Sharlow's beautiful high G's resounded. A rousing closing choral number was Stahlberg's "Der Deutsche Lied," with the refrain:

Furchtlos, unverzagt,
Heil Dir, Germania!
Wehrfest, treu in Not,
Heil, Heimat, Dir!

This brought responsive heart throbs to all present, in view of the fearful occurrences across the water. An audience of fair size heard the music, giving special applause after the orchestra's playing of the overture to "William Tell," delivered in a wellnigh impossible fast tempo.

St. Mark's Thanksgiving Concert.

On Friday evening, November 27, the twenty-fourth annual Thanksgiving concert was given by the St. Mark's Hospital in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria, New York. The soloists on this program included Adele Krueger, soprano; Lucile Collette, violinist; Robert Maitland, baritone, and Leopold Winkler, pianist. A feature of the program was the playing of a string orchestra under the direction of Theodore Spiering. Mr. Spiering but recently returned to this country from abroad, where he held an important position in the orchestral world at Berlin, and will be remembered as the acting conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York, during Gustav Mahler's illness. The orchestra gave the Bach prelude and gavotte in E major, arranged for string orchestra by Bachrich; adagietto from "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; two Elegiac melodies, Grieg, and closed the program with the theme and variations, "Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser," Haydn.

Mme. Krueger sang "Zueignung," by Strauss; "Der Tod das ist die "kühle Nächt," Brahms, and "Neue Liebe," Rubinstein, following these with an encore.

Lucile Collette played the Kreisler arrangement of Martini's "Andantino," Kreisler's own "Caprice Viennoise" and Sarasate's Spanish dance, "Zapateada." In response to insistent applause, she was obliged to add another number. Max Liebling at the piano played excellent accompaniments.

Robert Maitland, baritone, sang a group of songs by Brahms, Hugo Wolf and Schumann, creating a favorable impression.

Leopold Winkler, the pianist, played his own arrangement of Schubert's "Du bist die Ruh," Joseffy's "At the Spring," and the Liszt arrangement of the "Rigoletto Fantasie."

William Foerster, Jr. Returns.

William Foerster, Jr., violinist, and son of the New York clarinetist of the same name, has returned to this city from his studies abroad and played successfully last week at a benefit concert for the Red Cross fund.

BOSTONIANS HEAR BIG ORCHESTRA AT MUSICIANS' RELIEF CONCERT

Three Hundred Players Acquit Themselves with Credit—A Pension Fund Concert—Recitals of Importance During the Past Week Reviewed.

11 Boylston Road, Fenway,
Boston, Mass., November 27, 1914.

The third annual orchestral concert for the Musicians' Mutual Relief Society was given in the Mechanics Building last Sunday evening. A gigantic orchestra, three hundred men strong, under the direction of Emil Mollenhauer, and Lambert Murphy, the Metropolitan Opera tenor, formed the attractions. Over four thousand persons were present in the huge auditorium. The program, an excellent one, included the "William Tell" overture, the Strauss waltz, "Emperor"; "The Lost Chord," by Sullivan; Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries"; a special arrangement for two hundred strings of Dvorák's "Humoreske," and Berlioz's "Hungarian March," from "The Damnation of Faust." Mr. Murphy sang the "Prize Song" from the "Meistersinger," an aria from "Grisélidis," and several encore numbers. The orchestra was manipulated surprisingly well considering its size, and the effects were at times more astounding than one might have expected them to be. Mr. Mollenhauer deserved much credit for his very successful handling of the rather exacting situation. Lambert Murphy was in splendid voice and was deserving in every particular of his warm reception.

Tina Lerner Delights Large Audience.

Tina Lerner, the Russian pianist, played here Sunday afternoon, November 22, at the third concert of the Boston Music School Settlement series. These concerts for the people still remain very popular and an immense audience filled the Boston Theatre on this afternoon. Miss Lerner proved to be a genuine favorite with the gathering and enthusiasm ran high throughout her performance, the only disappointment evident being her unwillingness to respond to encores enough to satisfy those present. The soloist was in splendid form and her interpretations of the short selections by Liszt, Chopin, Mozart, Bach and Weber were revelations of the artist's individuality. Were it not for the mastery she exhibits over piano technic, this effect of refinement and subtle delicacy, so essential to such pieces as the Mozart "Pastorale Variée" or the Bach "Sicilienne," which she played and played so extremely well, would be impossible. Her success was decided, not because of the single reason that her playing was artistically well near perfection, but for the reason that she pleased and pleased greatly those music lovers whose chances are few for hearing the best artists.

The Swedish Singing Society Harmoni, Gustaf Sundelius conducting, assisted in the entertainment. Some interesting folksong material was brought forth and several English selections also figured as the offering by this well trained group of male voices.

Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concerts.

Much importance is associated with the annual Pension Fund concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which are given twice each season, for the fund is vital to the maintenance of the orchestra. As Dr. Muck rarely includes Wagner on his regular symphony programs, it has been his custom to devote as much of these to special programs of that composer's works as he possibly can. So it was, that at the first of these concerts which took place Sunday afternoon, November 22, a fine array of overtures and preludes from the music dramas of Richard Wagner were given a hearing. The orchestra played with enthusiasm and Dr. Muck showed that he is as equally at home with these great operatic works as he is with Brahms, Beethoven or any other standard works. The program opened with the overture to "Rienzi," and then followed the overture to the "Flying Dutchman," prelude and bacchanale from "Tannhäuser" (Paris version), prelude to "Lohengrin," prelude to "The Mastersingers," prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," Siegfried Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods," and as a fitting close, the prelude to "Parsifal." A large audience was present and the work of the players and conductor was vigorously applauded.

Paul Draper's Recital.

Wednesday afternoon at Jordan Hall the tenor, Paul Draper, sang for the first time in this city. His program was as follows: Schubert's three songs of the harper in "Wilhelm Meister"; Schumann's "Dichterliebe" cycle and four Szymanowski songs, "An Kleine Mädchen," "Christkindleins Wiegenlied." "Bestimmung" and "Einsiedel." Mr. Draper's program was an unusual one for the Boston public, though not more unusual than his rare art of song proved itself to be. As an authoritative lieder singer he occupies a lofty position. His partiality for Schubert songs is justified, for by his splendid interpretation of the three harper numbers chosen for this performance none of the monotony generally occasioned by the peculiar Schubertian mood was in evidence, and in reality much new light was seen in these seldom heard numbers. The Schumann cycle was given in a most satisfying manner. Mr. Draper possesses fine dramatic powers and his musical declamation in this most beautiful of all Schumann cycles was extremely interesting. In the Szymanowski songs the soloist's powers of expression were taxed still further, but only to a very successful ending.

Paul Draper impresses his auditors at once with his musicianship. His knowledge of the mechanics of singing is vast and he succeeds readily through his persuasive and convincing force in arousing interest in all those who hear him.

Young Pianist Heard.

Harrison Potter, a young pianist identified with the faculty of the Fox-Buonamici School of Piano Playing, gave the first recital of the season in the attractive music hall which the school now possesses in the Wesleyan Building, Tuesday evening, November 24. The concert was the first of a series which this well known piano school will conduct throughout the present season. Mr. Potter, who previously studied with Mr. Fox, displayed unusual ability in the interpretation of the selections chosen for his program. These included the Beethoven E major sonata, a group of four Chopin numbers, the Brahms B minor "Capriccio," MacDowell's "Improvization," "Danse Negre" by Cyril Scott, and Liszt's ninth rhapsody. The young player was well received, and his performance bore a splendid tribute to his former teacher's excellent ability.

Cannon Heard at Jordan Hall.

Franklin Cannon, a young American pianist, who undoubtedly has a brilliant future in store, played his first recital program in this city on Monday afternoon at Jordan Hall. His program was conventional for the most part, a possible exception being the two Cyril Scott pieces. The rest of his program was made up of numbers by Bach, Schumann, Chopin, Grieg, Moszkowski and Liszt. Mr. Cannon treats his art with rare dignity and seriousness. He has splendid command over the technical requirements of his instrument, and his playing is at all times clear, direct and interesting. He is a musician who sacrifices nothing to the real beauty of the composition he interprets. His success here was immediate and decided, and surely piano art in the sincere way he represents it must meet with success elsewhere.

French Pianist Plays at Steinert Hall.

Emiliano Renaud, a local French pianist, gave his annual recital at Steinert Hall last Saturday afternoon. Mr. Renaud has a large following in Boston, and this is well warranted, as one could appreciate after hearing his splendid performance on this day. His program was as follows: Bach-Busoni, organ prelude and fugue in D minor; Schumann, "Papillons"; group of five Chopin selections; "Marionette," "La chasse au renard," "Valse de la poupe" by the player himself, and the Liszt valse, "Mephisto."

California Violinist Pleases Boston.

Madeleine Childs, a talented young violinist from California, was heard in recital at the Harvard Musical Association on Monday evening, November 23. This young lady has received excellent schooling abroad, where she studied with Emanuel Wirth, of the Berlin Hochschule. She is an artist of sincere intent, and her violinistic accomplishments have won widespread favor. The program she offered was not exceedingly interesting, but her manner of interpreting it caused much favorable comment in the distinguished audience that had the pleasure of hearing her. She impresses one immediately with her virile style of playing. The tone responding from her instrument is sensuous, warm and full of much romantic color. A slight tendency to overexert while attacking the strings caused a lack of refinement to appear at certain moments, but far better this for a woman violinist than that fear of creating too much tonal volume. Much individual taste was shown in the playing of a group of the well known Kreisler short numbers, and, in fact, versatility of thought and style was displayed plentifully in every phase of her performance. The violinist is in the East for a two month concert tour, and will be heard in many of the principal cities during this time.

Hubbard Pupil Gives Interesting Program.

Roland W. Hayes, a gifted tenor pupil of Arthur J. Hubbard, the prominent local voice pedagogue, gave his own song recital in Steinert Hall on Thursday evening, November 12. Mr. Hayes has been heard here often and never fails to gain an enthusiastic reception from his many admirers. His voice is of unusually beautiful quality, full of power and not lacking the least in dramatic requirements. His splendid enunciation attracted attention immediately, the auditor having no need of a text. His arias and songs included the "Murmuring Zephyr," by Jensen; "The Hour Glass," by Burleigh; "Im zitternden Nordlicht," by Haile; "Winter Sturme," from "Walküre"; an aria from "The Girl of the Golden West"; "Youth," by Gilberté; "Almona and Ahmed's Farewell," by Burleigh, and the "Good Night Song," by Hebron.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

At the sixth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday afternoon, November 27, and Saturday night, November 28, Reznicek's symphonic biography, "Schlemihl," was heard for the second time in this city. The work was given its first American performance here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra near the close of last season. Paul Draper, the tenor, who appeared with great success in his own recital at Jordan Hall earlier in the week, sang the prayer, which is taken from Goethe's "Wanderer's Nachtlied," and precedes the conclusion of Reznicek's composition. The Mozart C major symphony followed on the program. Harold Bauer came to us as soloist for this pair of concerts and his masterful playing of the Beethoven G major concerto, accompanied admirably by the orchestra, caused several of our leading papers to devote whole columns of space to their praise for his splendid performance. Mr. Bauer appears again at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon.

Victor Winton.

Mrs. Croker a Saenger Pupil.

Bula Benton Edmondson, who was married on November 26 to Richard Croker, the former leader of Tammany, was a student of singing under Oscar Saenger, the New York teacher.

Standard Anthems for Men's Voices

Edited by GEORGE B. NEVIN

A name associated with church music perhaps as closely as that of any American composer.

Price, $1.00 postpaid

The majority of the arrangements are from the practised and practical hand of the editor, and all are skilfully done with a view to use by choirs of moderate ability.

These anthems have been judiciously selected and excellently arranged for men's voices.—Musical Courier.

BOSTON NEW YORK

Wagner for Amateurs:
A History of Impressions

[From the London Times.]

The inevitable—or what used to be the inevitable—period of Wagner-Schwärmerei, into which the musical amateur heavily plunged on his first introduction to opera, becomes, when it has been left some years behind, a more interesting episode than might be supposed. In our earliest reaction from that round eyed wonder, when we begin to perceive the crude injustice done to the genius of Wagner by ignorant worship, we brush aside our old enthusiasms as an insult to the powers of beauty. We reach the stage of understanding that they demand, these powers, wherever we meet them, the utmost service of discrimination and intelligence. But after a while, when we have tried to serve them by giving our best and choicest in return, we possibly realize that there is something to be learned, by critical memory, from the rosy innocence of those first quaint ecstasies. Is it not, after all, of value to make out precisely what it was that Wagner's mighty fist began by writing upon our inexperience? We may be pretty sure of one thing, that it was not what we believed it to be at the time.

We believed it, no doubt, to be what Wagner himself told us it was—the image of passion and truth, rending with one hand the tawdry artificialities of the theatre, and with the other the pedantic trammels of Beckmesser's Tabulatur. It was the irruption, we felt, of nature, lovely and strong and spontaneous, before which the stale convention of operatic art, with its posturing dancers and drilled chorus, had long ago vanished like dust. It seemed inconceivable (though possibly like them) that our grandfathers should ever have endured the roulade of the prima donna and the pointed toe of the première danseuse. A short ten years, and behold us in our turn growing lyrical over the coloratura of the one lady and the entrechats of the other.

As we look back, we are less certain that passion and truth were the invention of Wagner; and if they were, we wonder, with a slightly enlarged experience of their difficulties, how we can have found them so easy to understand. If the "Ring" was all that we supposed it to be, would it not have been rather harder to grasp? We were told, indeed, that in the old ballet skirted times it had been considered hard; but to us the joy precisely was that this stupendous work could be learned, followed, appreciated by the least musical of amateurs, innocent of any technical knowledge of the art. That very ease seems now suspicious. We begin to perceive (what more informed musicians have doubtless long ago told us) that it was Wagner's weakness and not his strength that we worshipped. His strength escaped us; and it needed a more prolonged and patient effort before we, the untrained and the uninstructed, could begin to feel that we had arrived at some understanding of it. And the same effort has brought us to the sense that Wagner's own evaluation of his work was at no point to be innocently trusted.

That point, for example, of which so much was made—that Wagner had dipped his art into the life of elemental nature by his discovery of the wondrous world of ancient German legend—has gradually failed us, with every renewal of our impressions of the "Ring." We have had time to measure, and perhaps to resent, Wagner's exploitation of the huge simplicity and noble tragedy of that world. That Sigurd and Brynhild should be brought out of the world of eternity into the excited atmosphere of the romantic revolution, that the profoundly unconventional psychology of their struggle should be colored by the philosophical rhetoric of 1848, strikes us, if not as a profanation, at least as a bad misadjustment of means to end. The rhetoric of 1848 contained the stuff of the finest poetry, but it was not in the "fabelhafte Urzeit" of the Nibelungs that it could find appropriate expression for the aspirations of modern romance. Wagner was far too much a child of revolution ever to read aright the long, grim patience of epic tragedy; and in the crowded history of his own times, the history of which he was himself a part, there lay ready to his hand, as one cannot but feel, a thousand possibilities made for it—some of them, we know now, not overloked by that "early" Verdi whom we used to dismiss so lightly.

Child of his age Wagner certainly was also in his ingenuous faith that nature could be brought upon the stage by means of practicable rocks, gauze water, real fire, real horses, and dragons at least as real as possible. Here, indeed, we may consider that we have the right to profit by the lesson of Wagner's experience. His gallant realism has still its interest, as it once had its influence, in so far as it is a sign of his epoch; but it would surely be the worthiest of tributes to Wagner's greatness to refuse to allow it any longer to be hampered by the Beckmesserlike tyranny of stage tradition. "Fanget an!" we cry to the Walther who will renovate for us the whole artless rubbish of the Wagnerian "properties."

Wagner, the reformer of the theatre, the inventor of the "Bühnenfestspiel," the poet of passionate and heroic drama—the Wagner of comparatively so few years ago—has changed before our eyes and in our ears until at last he has become, even for us amateurs, Wagner the musician. At last we understand that in music his genius was all fulfilled. Wherever he indulged his curious and ingrained disloyalty to music, as in so much of the "Ring," as even (if the word be ventured) in "Parsifal," there his magic has lost its power. Wherever, as in "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," he gave himself without reserve to music—trusting it to develop, after its own laws, the whole expressiveness of his poem, instead of checking its natural growth and using it as a kind of system of punctuation—there the marvel of unfailing beauty holds us, year by year, with ever more exquisite enchantments. Year by year it gives us a deeper insight into the reverberating and mysterious language of great art. And year by year, longing to know how such language happens to be written, we turn to Wagner with our questions. But Wagner, voluble and voluminous on every other subject, never tells us how he happened to be able to write the prelude to "Tristan."

Cincinnati Orchestra Concerts.

Cincinnati, Ohio, November 26, 1914.

The first popular concert of 1914-15 was given last Sunday afternoon in Music Hall, the occasion bringing out a large and musically discriminating audience. Dr. Ernst Kunwald and the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra came in for a great deal of well merited applause during the course of the afternoon, which started the Sunday "Pops" off on a wave of real enthusiasm.

Schubert's "Marche Militaire," orchestrated by Dr. Kunwald and superbly played by the orchestra, proved a brilliant opening number. It was followed by the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, which has become familiar to popular concert audiences, and then appeared the soloist Charles E. Gallagher, in an aria from Meyerbeer's opera, "Robert le Diable." Mr. Gallagher is a well grounded singer, the possessor of a fine baritone voice, and he acquitted himself creditably in his two difficult arias. Later in the afternoon he sang "Dormiro sol nel manto mio regal," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." Mr. Gallagher is a pupil of Tecla Vigna, whose artistic training is largely responsible for his pronounced success since he made his debut as a concert singer. Moszkowski's ballet suite, "Boabdil," closed the first half of the program.

After the intermission came the "Tannhäuser" overture, a wonderful web of many colors, working up to a dazzling climax, and displaying the tonal beauty of the orchestra, which was at its best. Emil Heermann, concertmaster, and Julius Sturm, principal cellist, had an effective solo in the duet, "Pas des Fiancées," from Glazounow's ballet music, "Russe d'Amour," and were heartily recalled.

The Liszt rhapsody, No. 1, given with much appreciation of its Magyar coloring, concluded the concert, which was brilliant throughout.

Cincinnati, Ohio, November 27, 1914.

A program of varied interest and the first appearance here of the violinist, Arrigo Serato, brought out an unusually large audience for the fourth symphony concert today in Emery Auditorium.

Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave," was given a delicately shaded and very beautiful reading by Dr. Kunwald, the orchestra responding with extreme plasticity to the leader's conception of this musical landscape painting. The overture led up gracefully to the principal event of the afternoon, Serato's interpretation of the Beethoven concerto, which carried his audience with him from the first note. His splendid technic, superb musicianship, and large, round tone amply confirmed all that had been written about him.

Wagner's "Eine Faust Ouverture" and the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," completed the program. This latter is one of the finest achievements in Dr. Kunwald's extensive repertoire of "moderns" and he depicted with life-like fidelity all the changing moods the composer has set forth so graphically.

The orchestra did excellent work throughout the afternoon, the accompaniment to the Beethoven concerto, done as it was without a rehearsal (owing to a delay in Serato's arrival here), being particularly close and sympathetic, demonstrating the thorough musicianship of the men composing the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

JESSIE PARTLON TYREE.

Where Are the English Bands?

[From London Music.]

"Is enough use being made of music in connection with recruiting?" asks a contemporary. Even in normal times one has only to observe the faces and the enthusiasm of the crowds marching beside a military band to realize what the effect would be today. Even a march by Dr. Barnado's boys' band down Whitehall was followed by hundreds of young men, many suitable for recruits. There must be many military bands still in this country, and we suggest that they should be employed like the Pied Piper of Hamelin, to lead their willing victims to the recruiting office. The selection of the most effective tunes is worth considering, but there are plenty. "Auld Lang Syne" and the "Marseillaise" have both proved very effective. The "British Grenadiers" is a bit staccato—but this may be balanced by the more solemn strains of music such as "O God Our Help in Ages Past" and in Wales, "Land of Our Fathers" or "Men of Harlech."

Another correspondent also writes: "It has been my privilege on several occasions to see bodies of our gallant recruits marching through the streets of London, and I have felt surprise that not any bands are provided to cheer them. Surely instrumental music would tend to stimulate recruiting generally. I would also suggest that the orchestras of all our theatres should give nightly a performance of the National Anthems of our Allies." In another column reference is made to the use by the Russian armies of the military band, while a report states that the Germans are using bands to encourage their soldiers. England, just now, is taking matters in such dead earnest and with such a grim determination that aids of this description are not counted upon. One must not imagine, we suppose, that the whereabouts of English military bands is one of the secrets kept from us by the censor?

The Old Ballads.

In a certain rural district in Virginia every year the negroes gather and act the story of one of the old ballads of the Scotch border. These negroes picked it up from white people who had it by word of mouth from their ancestors who came across the water with the song in their memories. The ballad has lived for centuries in this country, without being written down. Thousands of miles from the place of its origin it holds the attention of the members of an alien race, who knew nothing of the conditions of the people among whom the story grew. This is a fair example of the inherent interest in the narrative of these old folksongs. In his sixteen years of research the late Prof. Francis J. Child found that there were 305 old English and Scottish ballads. Professor Child noted incidentally that some of these ballads—he found seventeen—were current in the United States. A year and a half ago Professor C. Alphonso Smith, of the University of Virginia, organized the Virginia Folk-Lore Society to find what of these old ballads are current in Virginia, and the United States Bureau of Education is lending its aid in starting similar societies elsewhere. So far, in Virginia, chiefly in the mountain counties, fifty-six of the ballads have been discovered. In the hills of Virginia these old songs still pass from father to son and from mother to daughter, songs which for vigor of narrative, vividness of portraiture, simplicity of style, and fullness of content are not surpassed in the history of American or English song.—World's Work.

Little Arthur stood peering down into the countenance of his baby sister, whom the nurse was singing to sleep.

"Nursie," he finally whispered, "it's nearly unconscious, isn't it?"

The nurse nodded in the affirmative and sang on.

"Then don't sing any more or you'll kill it."—Weekly Telegraph.

Two Philharmonic Concerts.

French was the program presented by the Philharmonic Society at its concert in Carnegie Hall last Friday afternoon, November 27. Even the Belgian Franck must be considered a Frenchman, for his musical affiliations, influences and experiences were encountered by him preponderatingly in Paris. The fact that the Philharmonic elected to play Gallic music exclusively had no political significance whatsoever, as a Tschaikowsky program was given by the organization a short time ago and a Wagner concert was another of its recent performances. All French, all German and all Russian musical events took place before the war, and there is no reason why they should not take place now, especially in a neutral country. Those persons who went to the trouble of trying to connect the Philharmonic's French concert with local war politics proved only that they must have a great deal of spare time on their hands.

Bizet's pretty and delicate "L'Arlesienne" suite, No. 1, opened the proceedings and had a picturesque and effective rendering. Chabrier's "Espana" came last on the list of pieces and closed it with rich orchestral color and invigorating brilliancy in delivery.

Between the two lighter works just mentioned one heard Guy Ropartz's fourth symphony and César Franck's symphonic variations for piano and orchestra, the soloist being Eleanor Spencer. She made a daring selection in this exacting composition, which gives the pianist no chance to usurp individual honors, but incorporates his contribution into the general ensemble. From the circumstance that Miss Spencer made so austere a choice, the hearer cannot be left in doubt as to the sincerity of her artistic ideals and purposes. She played the Franck work in the spirit its composer must have had in mind when he conceived it. The piano made itself felt potently under Miss Spencer's treatment, but never overasserted itself, and she showed in every measure not only how carefully she had studied the instrumental combinations in order to fuse her tone with theirs, but also gave striking evidence at all times of her thorough musical grasp of the variations in their structure as a whole and in the details that make up their separate organisms. Tone, technic and pedaling formed a splendid triple alliance. It was a well considered piece of piano playing, finished, intellectual, lofty. Miss Spencer left a very striking impression.

The Ropartz symphony did not astound or estrange the hearers, as does some of the other French music of recent years. This composer has no more decided bent for melody than the rest of the French symphonic writers, but at least he does not confine himself exclusively to whole tone scales or seek to rivet the attention solely through bizarre scoring, extreme color experiments, and constant attempts at exotic or sensational "atmosphere." Ropartz scores skilfully, possesses fluency of style, and employs motives of sufficient length and enough euphoniousness in their sequences to give the listener a clue as to what to follow in the restatements, development and contrapuntal weaving of the symphony. It is not a great work, and not even a very important one, but it is interesting and shows Ropartz to be a man who may be said to stand midway between the ancient (and now somewhat despised) melodists, and the daring tonal revolutionists whose idée fixe appears to be to voice whatever they feel regardless of how it may sound. The fact that a part of such music sounds good by no means justifies the acceptance of the method as a permanent principle.

On Sunday afternoon, November 29, the Philharmonic performed a semi-popular program, and therein gave much delight to a large audience, which was quite carried away with the vivacious reading of the Haydn "Surprise" symphony, the tonal finesse of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" presentation, the vital interpretation of Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vltava," and the very charming and appropriately whimsical version of Tschaikowsky's familiar "Nutcracker" suite. More enthusiasm has not been heard at Carnegie Hall this winter than the orchestra earned for its playing of the numbers just mentioned.

Frances Rose, a singer who has appeared in opera abroad, was the soloist, and sang Beethoven's "Abscheulicher" aria from "Fidelio," Bungert's "Die Loreley," Grieg's "Ein Traum" and Sinding's "Ein Maientag."

Flonzaleys in Brooklyn.

At the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on Sunday afternoon, November 29, the first of a series of three chamber music concerts was given by the Flonzaley Quartet. The excellent ensemble work of this organization was never better shown than in the Tschaikowsky quartet, in E flat major, op. 30, with which the program opened. This is difficult music, with its daring contrapuntal devices and its uncompromising thematic development, and the Flonzaleys showed immense skill in bringing out the various parts without ever losing the proper tonal balance or rhythmic firmness. The Quartet was received with enthusiasm by the large audience.

Following this, two movements of a quartet by Darius Milhaud was given an exceptionally fine and poetic reading. This music is of the deeply intimate esthetic school of modern France, yet not exaggerated beyond the bounds of good taste. The portions of the work given on this occasion are exquisite and were exquisitely played. The final number on the program was the quartet in G major, op. 17, No. 5, from the easy flowing pen of good old Papa Haydn. The players entered with zeal into the spirit of its quaint, old fashioned good humor and boisterousness and gave it a highly effective reading.

NEW ORLEANS ACTIVITY.

Crescent City Musical Season Is Now Under Way—Pithy Paragraphs on Recent Happenings.

New Orleans, La., November 25, 1914.

A soiree, as delightful as it was unique, was that given by the New Orleans Music Teachers' Association last night at the famous Louisiana Restaurant, in the form of a Souper Vaudeville. The vaudeville furnished by, as the program says, "a bunch of the most vile and violent vaudevillains" was one continuous "scream." The bandmaster stunt of Chevalier Ferrata (who conducted a "band" composed of a piano and violin), the Pavlowa-Mordkin act by Helen Pitkin-Schertz and Victor Despommier, Henry Wehrmann's inimitable "Deboozy trombone concerto" and his scene from "La Mascotte" (himself as Bettina and Florence Huberwald as Beppo) were received with tempestuous enthusiasm. The "Futurist Music" lecture by Flo Field was was a remarkable bit of humor, while the negro impersonations of R. Emmett Kennedy were thoroughly entertaining. Mrs. Alfred Meister was a fetching "Belle of New York," and Leon Ryder Maxwell was a policeman, who would have honored Broadway. Encores galore might have been granted by the "Vaudevillains," had they desired to gratify the wishes of the responsive audience. Those responsible for the riot of fun were: Henri Wehrmann, chairman, Florence Huberwald, Victor Despommier and Walter Goldstein, ex-officio.

The Junior Philharmonic.

With the praiseworthy object of cultivating the musical taste among this city's young folk, the Junior Philharmonic Society has recently been organized. The new organization, which is an offspring of the Philharmonic Society, purports to present local artists, to give informal recitals at which talented pupils will participate, and, also, if the membership is sufficiently large, to present artists of wide reputation. The price of the season ticket is the small sum of one dollar.

University Chorus Preparing "Messiah."

The University Chorus has begun rehearsals of Handel's "Messiah," which will have its presentation in the spring. Leon Ryder Maxwell's excellent conductorship was demonstrated when he presented Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," Ferrata's "Messe Solennelle" and Haydn's "Creation," and there is every reason to anticipate an artistic performance of the Handel work now in preparation. The only qualifications requisite for membership to the University Chorus are an interest in music, the ability to carry a tune, a faithful attendance at rehearsals, and the purchase of music, which, for the present season, will not exceed 50 cents.

Newcomb Symphony Orchestra.

A splendid opportunity for obtaining experience in sight reading and ensemble work is offered by the Newcomb Orchestra, Otto Finck, conductor, which will meet once a week at Newcombe Hall. The tuition fee has been made very moderate, and all sufficiently advanced students of orchestral instruments are invited to join its ranks.

Saturday Music Circle.

Gibson Hall was well filled last Saturday afternoon, when the Saturday Music Circle gave its November concert. The works of classic and romantic German composers were presented with the artistic finish for which this musical club is noted. Besides four choral numbers—two of Schumann and two of Schubert—there were a group of songs sung by Mrs. H. Haas; the Handel A major sonata, played by Carl Pinski and J. R. Black; the Bach C minor concerto, interpreted by Mary V. Moloney and Mrs. F. C. Johnson; a trio arrangement of the "Lotus Flower," of Schumann, sung by Misses Hamilton, Favrot and Randall; and two piano selections, fugue in G minor (Bach) and ballade in G minor (Chopin), played by Anita Gonzalez, a talented local pianist.

Lyrique and Polyhymnia "Cercles" Entertain.

An interesting musical soiree was that of the Cercle Lyrique, which was held on November 19. The entire program was devoted to Massenet and included a charming French essay on that composer, written and read by Mrs. Dupuy Harrison. A trio from Massenet's "Cleopatre" was sung for the first time in this city. The choral number, a chorus from "Roma," was led by George O'Connel. Those who contributed to the evening's pleasure were: Emilie Pitot, Madelcine Pitot, Chas. Ganucheau, Ella de los Reyes, Finette Reinecke, Eleonora Rheams, Camille Gibert, Mariette Sarrah, Amilie Dufilho, Joseph Delery, Mrs. W. R. Taylor and Mrs. H. O. Bisset. Mrs. Bisset is the capable president of this coterie of music lovers, and being herself one of this city's gifted vocalists and a woman of high artistic ideals, she is admirably fitted to occupy the important post to which she has been elected. Mme. Bisset has planned a "Soiree Italienne" for January and a "Soiree Wagnerienne" for March.

Polyhymnia Cercle.

The ninth season of the Polyhymnia Cercle was inaugurated on November 17. As at all the musicales of this organization, the attendance was large. The following soloists participated in the varied program: A. H. Kernion, Yvonne Ross, W. T. Arny, Mrs. H. Ader, Eola Berry, R. Emmett Kennedy, Jos. C. Delery, Marie Voorhies, Paul Jacons and Mrs. A. Meister. Theresa Cannon-Buckley is the musical directress and Mary V. Maloney the accompanist of the Cercle.

A Marchesi and De Reske Pupil.

Frances Roeder, a pupil of Mme. Marchesi and of Jean de Reske, is now in this city visiting relatives. Miss Roeder was born here, but has resided in New York for many years. While singing at one of the De Reszke operatic entertainments, she was heard by the impresarios, Saligniac, of the Nice Opera House, and Higgens, of Covent Garden, and was engaged to appear at their respective institutions—a compliment indeed, especially when the youth of the singer is taken into account. Her voice is a high soprano of brilliant quality.

A War Victim.

The friends of Mme. Henri Schaffner were shocked to hear of the death of her husband, who was recently enrolled among the fallen in the European war. Mme. Schaffner (formerly Eugenic Wehrmann, of this city) had but shortly arrived here in July on a visit to her relatives when the war was declared. The sad tidings of her husband's death were communicated to her a few days ago. Mme. Schaffner is one of the most accomplished pianists of whom this city can boast. She studied many years with the late Marguerite Samuel, herself a pupil of celebrated masters, and later with Pugno and Moszkowski. For the past eight years she resided in Paris. Our warmest sympathy is extended the young widow.

New Orleans Notes.

I had the pleasure a short time ago of hearing a remarkable voice, a real contralto, with a range of two and a half octaves. The fortunate possessor is Annie Riddick, a Louisiana girl, whose entire vocal studies have been pursued under Leon de Fonteynes, formerly first baritone of the New Orleans French Opera. Miss Riddick is destined to a bright operatic career, for, besides the unusually fine instrument with which she has been endowed, she has temperament, intelligence and, most important of all, a willingness for hard and patient study.

Mary E. Dunavon, after an absence of eight years, has returned to this city, where she will resume her musical work. In addition to her pedagogic work, Miss Dunavon has done a great deal of translating from the French, German, Italian, Spanish and Latin languages.

Harry Brunswick Loëb.

Herbert Fryer's New York Recital.

Herbert Fryer, the English pianist, assisted by Robert Maitland, baritone, will give his New York recital in Aeolian Hall, Wednesday evening, December 9.

This will be the program:

Andante and variations in F minor ..... Haydn
Sonata in A flat, op. 110 ..... Beethoven
Five Lieder ..... Schubert
Prelude, chorale and fugue ..... César Franck
Sixteen waltzes, op. 39 ..... Brahms
Songs—
- Bois Epais ..... Lully
- L'heure exquise ..... Reynaldo Hahn
- Der Asra ..... Rubinstein
- Wer nie sein Brot ..... Wolf
- Der Tambour ..... Wolf

Prelude, op. 43 ..... Chopin
Nocturne, E major, op. 62 ..... Chopin
Allegro de Concert, op. 46 ..... Chopin

Mr. Fryer has been heard extensively abroad, having played in forty concerts in London alone. High terms of praise from the European press have followed his appearances.

Mr. Fryer is under the concert direction of M. H. Hanson.

MINNEAPOLIS ORCHESTRA IN BEETHOVEN CYCLE.

A Tuesday Matinee Series Added to the Activities of Emil Oberhoffer and His Players—Regular Symphony Program Brings Forth Superb Brahms Performance.

Minneapolis, Minn., November 25, 1914.

The progress the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra is making each year has never been more gratifyingly apparent than in the regular Friday evening concert of November 20, when Brahms' E minor symphony (No. 4) was the big number of the program. Certainly Brahms has never been better played here, and it may be doubted if the orchestra ever did quite so well. The andante movement, in particular, was lovely beyond description. The remarkable evenness of tone quality which the orchestra so strikingly revealed in the Brahms symphony seemed to be the inspired companion of the same dominant orchestral qualities in the Schumann concerto, which Josef Hofmann, the soloist of the evening, played. The Mendelssohn overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream," was the opening number of the program, while the Strauss "Don Juan" tone poem was the closing number.

MINNEAPOLIS ORCHESTRA'S BEETHOVEN CYCLE.

Arnold Bennett, the English writer, comments repeatedly (in his "Your United States") on the superb audacity of the American people in undertaking enterprises which seem impossible of fulfillment. Had he been told that a city less than seventy years old was undertaking the various projects which keep Minneapolis people busy and hopeful—and humble—he would doubtless have judged it as one of the audacious cities, and no undertaking has seemed more courageous than that of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra Association in adding to its bimonthly Friday evening concerts and its weekly popular concerts a series of six Tuesday afternoon concerts—a Beethoven cycle. Any Minneapolitan, knowing the eleven years of unceasing generous work which Conductor Emil Oberhoffer has given to the building up of the orchestra, cannot but imagine the deep pleasure which the performance of six proprams devoted to Beethoven must give to the conductor.

The genuine pleasure of the players in performing the first program of the cycle, November 24, was one of the elements which made this epochmaking concert an artistic success. Arnold Bennett also smiled at the American martyr, who finds no real art in his (or especially her) own country. There again he would have found a revelation in the audience which will patronize a weekday afternoon all-Beethoven program. It was a representative audience which, though not filling the auditorium completely, was much larger than might be expected, and it was quietly, cordially discriminating. The opening number, Beethoven's first symphony in C major, was in many respects the best selection. Florence Hinkle's wonderful voice, so rich in quality, and her true musicianship, made the Beethoven songs sufficiently beautiful to fit into a perfect program. The accompanist of the afternoon, Herman Ruhoff (one of the orchestra's viola players), gave sympathetic support to the singer. George Klass, the new assistant concertmaster, was a satisfying soloist in the romance in F major. No encores were given.

SUNDAY ORCHESTRAL CONCERT.

The fifth concert of the first series of the twelfth season took place at the Auditorium on Sunday, November 22, at 3.30 p. m., and the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra again presented a concerto and a symphonic poem on one of its "popular" programs. It speaks well for the local audiences that such splendid music will attract a full house of enthusiastic listeners. The catchy little "Gypsy March" of Lacombe opened the program, and was followed by the "Sicilian Vespers" overture of Verdi. MacDowell's symphonic poem, "Launcelot and Elaine," is superfine. The prelude to act III of "Kunihild," by Kistler, is interesting, but shows a decided Wagnerian influence. Cyrill Kistler was Emil Oberhoffer's first music teacher.

The orchestra played the "Harlequin," "Pierrot and Pierrette" and "Valse d'amour," from Max Reger's ballet suite, op. 130. The program closed with Moszkowski's ballet music from "Boabdil." George Klass, the new second concertmaster, played all three movements of the Mendelssohn concerto in a decidedly clear manner. The andante was beautifully rendered and the soloist responded to an insistent encore.

NORTHWESTERN CONSERVATORY NOTES.

The second of a series of ensemble recitals, which are to be given at the Conservatory this season, took place on Saturday morning at the faculty hour when Franklin W. Krieger, head of the piano department, and Abe Pepinsky, violinist, rendered the program.

A new feature of the Conservatory normal department is the giving of illustrated talks by members of Margaret Daugherty's piano class before the students of the grade schools of this city. These talks are given on the day preceding the Young People's symphony concerts and are based upon the numbers to be played the following day by the symphony orchestra.

Anne Hughes, head of the Conservatory public school music department, and president of the Thursday Musicale, gave an address on Thursday afternoon at the Horace Mann School. The occasion was a meeting of the Teachers' and Parents' Association.

The writing craft section of the Woman's College Club meets every week on Friday afternoon at 5 o'clock in one of the studios of the expression school. Estelle Holbrook, dean of the Conservatory, is chairman.

Of the ten candidates who presented themselves for the position of first soprano of the girls' quartet at the East High School, Mabel Sibley, pupil of Elizabeth Brown-Hawkins, was chosen. The judge of the contest was a prominent music critic of Chicago.

On Sunday, November 15, Miss Evers, president of the Conservatory, gave a dinner in honor of members of the Conservatory faculty. Among the guests were Dr. and Mrs. John W. Powell, Dr. and Mrs. Franklin Sweet, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Woodworth, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Fullerton, Mr. and Mrs. John Seaman Garns, Mr. and Mrs. Carleton Miles, Mr. and Mrs. Richard Price, Mr. and Mrs. Young, Olive Brown, Franklin W. Krieger, Dr. Caryl B. Storrs, Scott Woodworth, A. C. Paul, Benjamin Wallace, David Patterson. Other guests were teachers and students of Stanley Hall.

Ethel Martyn sang in recital at the Stone Lutheran Church last Monday evening.

At a musicale given at Governor Eberhardt's home under the auspices of the Woman's Protestant League, Wednesday, November 18, Franklin Krieger, head of the Conservatory piano department, appeared in several numbers.

MINNEAPOLIS SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

Margaret Hicks and Mrs. Herbert Pendleton, of the faculty, and Mrs. George Frazier, were participants on the Thursday Musicale program.

Miss Hicks, of the faculty, gave a number of solos at a reception given for the department president of the Woman's Relief Corps.

Margaret Hicks, assisted by Leo Nodon, baritone, pupil of William H. Pontius, played at Curtis Court, Thursday evening.

Helen Aitken, contralto, pupil of Stella Spears, assisted on a program given at Bremer School, November 18. Miss Aitken also took part in a program given at Hopewell Hospital, Sunday afternoon, November 22.

Ebba Sundstrom, violinist, of the faculty, and Mrs. Herbert Pendleton, soprano, pupil of William H. Pontius, will assist on the Thanksgiving program of the First Swedish Methodist Church, Thursday evening, November 26.

An at home was held Saturday evening, November 21, at the Minneapolis School of Music, for the teachers and pupils of 1913-14 and their friends. About five hundred were present.

RUTH ANDERSON.

Melba Stucky, a Versatile Musician.

Melba Stucky, soprano, sang at the concert given at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, for the benefit of the fund for the reconstruction of the Wellesley College buildings which were destroyed by fire on the morning of March 17 last. This benefit was given by the Wellesley Chorus, which consists of forty of the [illegible] girls who are students at Wellesley, with the assistance of the Glee Club from Princeton University, which volunteered its aid.

Miss Stucky is a member also of the Wellesley Choir, which is limited to thirty persons. She has an excellent voice and is an unusual musician. She has studied singing with her mother, Pauline Lemmer Stucky, who has been successful for many years as a teacher of voice. The art of theory has been imparted to her by Adolph Foerster, of Pittsburgh, while her studies in piano has been pursued under the guidance of Robert Morrow. At present she is studying the violin with Edith Wynn at Wellesley College, Wellesley, Mass.

Helen Ware at Hope College.

Holland, Mich., November 12, 1914.

The reading of Helen Ware's lecture, "Poetry and Power of Hungarian and Slav Music," a week before her appearance here, served its purpose in giving her recital its true educational significance.

Besides the Hungarian and Slav numbers which constituted the major part of the program, Helen Ware played a Handel sonata, the "Praeludium" and "Allegro," from Kreisler-Pugnani, and a Bach suite. These selections being so opposite to her Hungarian and Slav numbers gave Miss Ware an opportunity to reveal her thorough musicianship.

In the "Praeludium" her bowing was that of a manly sweeping breadth. Volumes of majestic tone and the inspiring simplicity and unaffectedness that characterizes all her interpretations, were here in evidence.

The gavotte from Bach was played in splendid rhythm and poise with no faltering from the high purpose of the master.

It was, however, in the group of Hungarian and Slav compositions, that Helen Ware gained absolute control over her audience. She lived the parts of the various moods portrayed in these wonderfully weird and melodious songs of the Magyars and Slavs. In the andante melodies she succeeded in interpreting these soulful folksongs in a simple but most effective declamatory form. The liberties Miss Ware took in their interpretation were those of a master, one who knows every nuance of the moods and sentiments these musical gems portray.

A ballade from Dvorák, said never to have been seen before on violin programs, proved to be one of the finest violin compositions from the Bohemian master.

Miss Ware closed her program with the "Carmen Fantasie," by her teacher, Hubay. This she played not only with the required temperament and robust rhythm, but with true musicianly conception and finesse. After insistent applause she played her own Hungarian "Love Song" and Kramer's "Chant Negre," both in a truly poetic manner.

J. B. N.

Charles Bowes "Housewarming."

Charles Bowes, the Paris teacher of singing, who is now beginning his activities in New York, gave a "housewarming" musicale in his new studio, 601 Madison avenue, Tuesday afternoon, November 24. The studio is beautifully appointed and most attractive and excellent for singing. Mr. Bowes himself was heard in numbers by Handel, Fauré and Meyerbeer. He also took the opportunity of presenting Ruth Cunningham, an artist-pupil, who successfully sang at the Covent Garden German season of 1913, and who was heard in excerpts from "Carmen" and songs by Massenet and Rubinstein.

Oscar Gareissen's Second Studio Lecture.

Oscar Gareissen's second lecture, at his studio, 64 East Thirty-fourth street, New York, on Saturday morning, November 28, attracted a deeply interested audience. His subject for this lecture was "What Is Voice?", which he treated in a convincing and intelligent manner.

Franklin Riker's New York Program.

Franklin Riker, tenor, will give the following recital program on Friday evening, December 4, at Aeolian Hall, New York:

O del mio dolce ardor	Christoforo Gluck
Non Posso Disperar	S. de Luca
Only of Thee and Me	Marion Bauer
To the Golden Rod	Edward MacDowell
Romance	F. Morris Class
Summer Time	Ward Stephens
Verre Ardent	H. de Fontenailles
Aquarelles	Claude Debussy
Le désir	Henri Büsser
Der Atlas	Franz Schubert
Sonntag	Johannes Brahms
Nachtgang	Richard Strauss
Zwei	Fritz Jürgens
Summer Night	Henry Holden Huss
For Me the Jasmine Buds Unfold	Arthur Ed. Stahlschmidt
Christmas Carol	A. Walter Kramer
The Rarest Dreams	Franklin Riker
Prodigals of Power	Franklin Riker

BEATRICE GJERTSEN TO MAKE NEW YORK DEBUT.

American Soprano with Long List of European Operatic Appearances and Successes to Her Credit Returns to Native Land.

Beatrice Gjertsen, who makes her New York debut at Aeolian Hall on Thursday evening, December 3, comes to this country with such testimonials of European successes that her claim to be recognized as an artist of the first rank cannot be denied. She is a native of Minneapolis, Minn., of Norwegian descent, as her name indicates, but is little known as yet in America, her artistic career having been confined almost exclusively to Germany, Norway and other countries of northern Europe.

Five years ago Miss Gjertsen made her operatic debut at the Court Opera in Weimar, where she was engaged as a regular member of the company. That position she has held ever since, and has appeared in about twenty principal roles, some of which she created. No better evidence of the importance of this American girl's position in this celebrated German court theatre can be cited than the list of these roles entrusted to her. They were: Elizabeth in "Tannhäuser," Agatha in "Freischütz," Senta in the "Flying Dutchman," Sieglinde in "Walküre," Kundry in "Parsifal," Ariadne in Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos," the title role in the "Rosenkavalier," Elsa in "Lohengrin," Chrysothemus in Richard Strauss' "Elektra," Tatjana in Tschaikowsky's "Eugen Onegin," Minneleide in Pfitzner's "Rose-of-Love's Garden," Freie in "Rheingold," Gutrune in "Götterdämmerung," Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana, Eva in "Meistersinger," Louisel in Siegfried Wagner's "Bärenhäuter," and a few lesser operas.

This is an imposing list and would, of itself, be sufficient to prove this brilliant young artist's success. In addition to this testimony there is the material evidence of a great number of press criticisms gained not alone in Weimar, but in various other cities of Germany and Norway during her frequent appearances on tour. The Weimarische Zeitung says that "at the festival performance of 'Tannhäuser' given at the Court Opera in Weimar, at which the German emperor was present, Miss Gjertsen, who sang the role of Elizabeth, earned for herself the commendation of the Kaiser, and as a token of his appreciation of her work he presented her with a very valuable diamond brooch with his compliments." The Jena Anzeiger says of her Rosenkavalier: "None could be better . . . one who has seen her will never forget her." The Deutschland Zeitung, Weimar, says of her Ariadne that "her voice rang out beautiful and clear throughout the performance." The Berlin correspondent of the Minneapolis Tribune says that she "stands alone in the perfection of her performance in one of the most difficult Wagnerian roles. Her Kundry was the most perfect character presentation I have even seen—as big histrionically as vocally. . . . I am told that Miss Gjertsen's portrayal of this role is considered to be the very best in Germany."

There are hundreds of such notices from Leipsic, Weimar, Berlin, Christiania, Brussels and many other cities where Miss Gjertsen has appeared as "guest" or in concert. And there are other evidences of her success. At Weimar she was presented by the management with a handsome hand carved Nürnberger Madonna in recognition of her interpretation of Elizabeth in "Tannhäuser." Upon being awarded the honorary title of Grossherzogliche sächsliche Kammersängerin, she was presented with the golden cross. It may be added that only three other Americans have this title of Sächsliche Kammersängerin, Maud Fay, Edyth Walker and Olive Fremstad. The daughter of the famous Alvarez heard her as Elizabeth at Weimar, and was so impressed that she presented her with the heavy silver chain with old coin medallion, which Alvarez always wore as Walter in the "Meistersinger."

Miss Gjertsen is not a war refugee. Her decision to devote a year or two to the land of her birth was made long before the war began. With such evident prominence as she possessed in European music circles, her American debut is looked forward to with much interest.

Bowes Studio Recital.

Charles Bowes, the vocal teacher, who has recently returned to America from his home in Paris, bringing with him several of his pupils, gave a recital in his New York studio on November 24. Music was furnished by Mr. Bowes and by his pupil, Ruth Cunningham, who revealed a voice of great beauty most excellently trained. Mr. Bowes and Miss Cunningham were both heard in solos and sang a number of duets together. Mr. Bowes' fine bass, a real bass, extending down to low D, was much appreciated.

Constance Purdy's Engagements.

Constance Purdy, contralto, sang on November 22 in Brooklyn before an audience of Lithuanians and for the first time sang in Lithuanian. The audience showed itself to be full of hearty enthusiasm and appreciation for this gifted singer's offerings. On December 9, Miss Purdy will sing an all Russian program for the Union Settlement branch of the Music School Institute, New York. A part of this she will sing in French and in English, using her own translations, and of course, she will be heard in Russian. The concert is organized by fifty New York society girls, who report a large sale of tickets. Last year Maud Powell was their artist.

Miss Purdy sings in St. Paul, Kansas City, St. Louis, etc., early in January.

Maximilian Pilzer's Recital.

On Sunday evening, December 6, Maximilian Pilzer, acting concertmaster of the New York Philharmonic Society, will give a violin recital at Aeolian Hall, New York. Mr. Pilzer will play the following program:

Concerto, E major	Bach
Humoresque No. 1	Victor Kolar
Humoresque No. 3	Victor Kolar
Mazourka	Zarzycki
Grand Concerto, D minor	Vieuxtemps
Berceuse	Maximilian Pilzer
Orientale	Maximilian Pilzer
Sérénade mélancolique	Tschaikowsky
Zapateado	Sarasate

Mr. Pilzer's repertoire consists of the standard concertos and several of modern compositions, some of which he has played with the leading symphony orchestras in America and others in his recitals. His solo numbers run into the hundreds, and, as his memory is a remarkable one, he is prepared to play almost anything desired on short notice.

MAXIMILIAN PILZER.

He is a very obliging artist, and has frequently been known to play a program arranged by those who engaged him.

Tina Lerner's Additional New York Notices.

Her reading of the Liszt sonata was remarkable for its lucidity and insinuating charm. It aroused so much enthusiasm that she had to return to the stage half a dozen times, and finally appeased them by adding an extra piece.—Evening Post.

Aeolian Hall was filled to its utmost capacity. From the time of the entrance of the beautiful, fragile figure till the last note of the encores, the queen of piano players seemed to weave a fairy spell over her audience. Superb technic, flawless musicianship and absolute accuracy are hers, and her beautiful tone pictures never failed to reach her audience.—Evening Telegram.

Her Chopin studies in thirds and sixths were amazing, and when the "Butterfly" etude was dashed off with a lightness of gossamer wings the house made her do it all over again.—Evening Sun.

Miss Lerner played the dainty pieces on her list admirably, with clarity, delicacy of touch, variety of accent and musical appreciation. —Sun. (Advertisement.)

Florence Macbeth Gives College Recital.

Florence Macbeth, the coloratura soprano, now with the Century Opera Company, gave a recital at Coe College, Cedar Rapids, Ia., on November 30. During Miss Macbeth's engagement in New York she took the opportunity to coach with her teachers, Mr. and Mrs. Yeatman Griffiths at their studio, 318 West Eighty-second street.

Borwick Repeats His Success.

Again did Leonard Borwick give immeasurable artistic joy to a houseful of listeners at Carnegie Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, November 24, on the occasion of his second New York recital this season, with a program consisting of Graun's gigue in B flat minor, Couperin's "Les barricades mysterieuses," Scarlatti's F minor allegrissimo, Beethoven's sonata, opus 111, Chopin's D minor prelude, G major nocturne, op. 37, No. 2; E minor etude, op. 25, No. 5, and A flat valse, op. 42, and Ravel's "Ondine," and Debussy's "Heather Bloom" and toccata.

There is something indescribably fine about Borwick's art, whose essence consists of sound musicianly qualities and perfect technical command, and yet is touched with a certain delicate fantasy and tender spirituality which defy verbal delineation, and must be experienced at a Borwick recital in order to be appreciated thoroughly by a sensitive musical nature.

And yet a just estimate of this splendid artist's work must take into account that he wins his average auditor just as completely as he does the ultra-connoisseur, for the applause after each number comes from every pair of palms in the auditorium and frequently compels repetitions of the selection, to say nothing of unscheduled and gratuitous pieces between the sections of the program and at its conclusion.

The opening trio of antiques, which ordinarily interest only the student or scientific investigator, were done with such crystalline touch, arch humor, and scintillating finger work, that they made the house rise at Borwick, and prepared everyone for the limpid purity with which the pianist delivered the variations in the Beethoven sonata, and thus wove a ravishment for the ear of what frequently in other readings has been made a wearisome burden to the mind. Intellect spoke in the opening movement of the mighty sonata, when its majestic utterances were given eloquent voice by artist Borwick.

Chopin's music found a sympathetic interpreter in the concert giver, who poured a world of feeling particularly into the prelude and the nocturne. His tone was of lovely color and quality.

The Ravel and Debussy compositions require fingers tipped with velvet and dipped in attar of roses to do them full justice, and such digits Borwick seems to possess. There are times when his manipulation of the keyboard is comparable only to the scampering of elves, as our fancy delights to picture that intangible pastime.

Almost needless to state, the Borwick audience overwhelmed that pianistic necromancer with the testimony of its favor and he was kept journeying from the artist room to the Steinway grand until the lights were turned down to warn the eager applauders that there is a time limit even to the biggest success.

Musicians Listen to Branscombe Works.

A recital of compositions by Gena Branscombe was given on Tuesday evening, November 14, at the Musicians' Club of New York with the assistance of Marie Stapleton Murray, soprano; David Talmage, violinist, and R. Norman Jolliffe, baritone, the composer at the piano. The program follows:

Hail Ye Tyme of Holie-Dayes (a song of Chrystmasse).
With Rue My Heart Is Laden.
My Fatherland (from the song cycle, A Lute of Jade).
Serenade (I Send My Heart up to Thee).

Violin obligato by Mr. Talmage.

Laughter Wears a Lilied Gown.
Mrs. Murray and Mr. Jolliffe.

Richardson Artists for Trenton.

G. Dexter Richardson has booked a quartet consisting of Grace Kerns, soprano; Harry Munro, baritone; Marguerite Dunlap, contralto, and Charles Harrison, tenor, for the performance of "The Messiah," to be given in Trenton, N. J., December 30, under the direction of Otto Poleman.

PHILADELPHIA OPERA SEASON INAUGURATED.

Metropolitan Opera Company Gives Performance of "Tosca"—Philadelphia Orchestra to Tour—Current Notes.

Philadelphia, Pa., November 28, 1914.

The Metropolitan Opera Company of New York formally opened the local opera season with an excellent performance of "Tosca" last Tuesday evening, by a cast which included Geraldine Farrar, Scotti and Martinelli. Arturo Toscanini's reading of the score was one of the outstanding features of the performance.

"La Gioconda," with Destinn, Ober, Duchene, Caruso, Amato, and De Segurola, is announced for next Tuesday evening. The regular weekly performances of the Metropolitan and the anticipated visit of the Century Opera Company early in the new year will go far to compensate Philadelphia for the absence of its regular season as one base of the Chicago company.

Leopold Stokowski Speaks.

That a city of this size and wealth should be musically independent, however, was brought out with considerable force by Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, at a reception which the Manuscript Music Society tendered to him and Edward A. Bok, vice-president of the Orchestra Association, at the Roosevelt Hotel last Wednesday evening. Mr. Stokowski went further and said that Philadelphia has within its borders all the material for opera of the highest artistic standards. He seconded Mr. Bok's characterization of this city as "the Athens of America" with the declaration that we have a group of composers unsurpassed in this country and rivaled only by Boston.

"When the Orchestra gave a joint concert with the Manuscript Music Society in the Academy of Music two years ago," said Mr. Stokowski, "I was astounded at the quality of the work you offered. I came here as a stranger, an outsider, and I was therefore qualified to judge. But I was struck dumb with the work set before me at that concert.

"The opera we get here," he continued, "is twice imported—we import it from New York or Chicago and they import it from somewhere else. We should have native opera. There are probably fifty cities in Europe of one-half the size of Philadelphia and probably one-tenth its wealth which have their own opera companies. And they have engaged as their leading singers many Americans who would be only too glad to return to this country. There is enough talent right here in Philadelphia to organize an opera company from the conductor's desk to the humblest drummer."

Constantin von Sternberg, Nicholas Douty and the Hahn Quartet, gave a brief musical program at the reception. Mr. von Sternberg excited the admiration of his audience with an impromptu in D flat, a prelude in G minor and a concert etude in octaves, the last named dedicated to Stokowski. They are beautifully wrought works and were well performed.

Philadelphia Orchestra Tour.

The splendid impression created by the Philadelphia Orchestra during its travels last season led to offers of return engagements in practically all the cities in which the orchestra was heard. The management deemed it best, however, to include several cities in the itinerary this year, where the orchestra had never played. Although Philadelphia is the home of the orchestra and it exerts its greatest activity in this city, its fame has outgrown the limits of any city and the Philadelphia Orchestra will soon become, in the full sense of the term a national institution.

The tour will begin this season in Indianapolis on Monday evening, and it will be the first time that the Philadelphia Orchestra has been heard in that city. The soloist will be Thaddeus Rich, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and there will be an added interest in his appearance in Indianapolis in view of the fact that it is his native city and he has not played there in years. On Tuesday evening, December 1, the orchestra will appear in Detroit at the armory under the auspices of the Detroit Orchestral Association. The soloist will be Olga Samaroff. Ann Arbor will be the next city visited and the concert will be given on Wednesday evening, December 2, in the Hill Auditorium, under the auspices of the University of Michigan. Theodore Harrison, the Philadelphia baritone, who is now at the head of the vocal department of the University, will be the soloist. An engagement at Cleveland, in Gray's Armory, will follow on Thursday evening, December 3, when Mme. Samaroff will again be the assisting artist. At Akron on Friday evening, December 4, the orchestra will give a concert at Music Hall with the assistance of Florence Hinkle as soloist. The week will be brought to a close in Oberlin on Saturday evening, December 5, when a symphony concert will be given at Finney Chapel in Oberlin College, with Thaddeus Rich as soloist.

Sunday will be spent in travel to Erie, where the Philadelphia Orchestra will be heard for the first time, at the Park Opera House, on Monday evening, December 7. On this occasion Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist. From Erie the orchestra will go to Buffalo, where it will also play for the first time at Elmwood Music Hall, on Tuesday evening, December 8, when the assisting artist will again be Mme. Samaroff. The orchestra will leave for Philadelphia immediately after the performance and arrive here early on Wednesday morning, December 9. The entire trip will be made in a special train consisting of four sleeping cars, one parlor car, two day coaches, a dining car and a baggage car.

Philadelphia Orchestra's Wagner Program.

Clearly the old controversy as to the merits and demerits of the work of Richard Wagner has been overwhelmed and forgotten in the larger conflict engendered by the more startling innovations of his successors. Followers of the bard of Bayreuth have apparently enlisted under the banner of the new preachers of the gospel of "change is progress"—an action which is at least logical—and after the polyphony of Reger and Schoenberg, Wagner must seem a comparatively simple proposition to his erstwhile detractors. At any rate there are many cities in which Wagner concerts still draw crowds as large as that which filled the Academy of Music for an all-Wagner concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra this week; and what is lacking in the number of such concerts is made up by the enthusiasm. Probably by design Leopold Stokowski omitted the old favorites—the "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin" selections and other early works—and gave the principal place on his program to the Vorspiel procession from Act III, and the transformation scene from "Parsifal." The remainder of the ninety minute program was given over to the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Kaisermarsch." Thus our Philadelphia audience became enthusiastic over the revolutionary Wagner, the Wagner who is not so frequently heard. But Wagner programs have been one of the most successful features of the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra during the fifteen years of its existence; and it is no exaggeration to add that the composer always has had a large coterie of admirers in this city.

Stokowski guided his men to a brilliant success in every number of the program. One would think, were it not for his power in other schools, that the young conductor were a Wagnerian specialist.

Philadelphia Notes.

Harold Bauer, the pianist, will be the soloist at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday, November 30.

Hans Kindler, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will make his first local concert appearance at the second annual concert of the Musical Art Club in Witherspoon Hall, December 9.

John McCormack will give a recital in the Academy of Music on December 2.

Paul Draper, the American lieder singer, will give a song recital in Witherspoon Hall on Thursday afternoon, December 3.

Sophia Kassmir Will Tour America.

An artist prominent in European circles, who has returned to her native country, is Sophia Kassmir, the operatic soprano. A Russian by descent, as her name indicates, but American by birth, Miss Kassmir is widely known as a Russian soprano, and her numerous favorable press notices show that her sterling worth has been fully appreciated and that her art has gained the wide recognition it deserves. Miss Kassmir is a native of Duluth, Minn., but for a number of years before her departure for Europe resided in Pittsburgh. She has now on her return to this country elected to make her home in New York, as offering a wider field for her artistic endeavors. Her return to America was quite unexpected and she has contracts for a tour in Germany and Italy which would have required her presence abroad this season but for the war. In her case, as in many others, the war rendered the fulfilling of these contracts impossible, and the resumption of these arrangements is, of course, quite indefinite.

Meantime, Miss Kassmir will remain in America, and it is not at all improbable that her success here will render her sojourn in this country permanent. Before going abroad she was widely recognized in Pittsburgh and its surroundings and throughout the Middle West. She sang there very frequently in concerts and recitals with choral societies and other organizations, and press criticisms dated from that time speak of her as "a soprano of note" and declare her to be "the possessor of an exceptionally fine voice" and in other terms no less complimentary.

Her return to this country has been welcomed in Pittsburgh and she is scheduled to appear as soloist with the Pittsburgh Male Chorus at Carnegie Hall, in that city, on December 4. During her stay in Europe she studied in Vienna and Berlin. Her debut was made in Berlin in "Faust" and caused much favorable comment, leading to the offer which called for an extended tour in Germany and Italy, which unfortunately had to be abandoned.

Frank Gittelson's Recital.

Beginning his Aeolian Hall recital, on Monday afternoon, November 23, with Nardini's E minor concerto, ending it with D'Ambrosio's B minor concerto, and between the two, playing Bach's chaconne, and three characteristic national dances by Dvorák, Sarasate and Brahms, Frank Gittelson gave ample proof of his artistic sincerity, and showed that he was not desirous of bringing forward virtuoso caperings and ad captandum tricks in order to win a galloping victory over the groundlings and the jaded critics, hungry for easy listening.

As he played the Bach E major concerto recently in New York, so Gittelson read the chaconne by the same composer, with flowing, fine tone production, musical feeling, a deep sense of reverence, excellent musicianship, and impressive technic of the left hand and the bow arm. If some of the gigantic breadth was lacking with which Ysaye presents the chaconne, it should be remembered that the older violinist has been before the public for forty years, while Gittelson's career is not three winters old. A proper comparison would be to measure the Ysaye reading before he was twenty with that of this American boy who has earned the praise of such renowned authorities as Auer, Flesch, Nikisch, and others.

The Nardini and D'Ambrosio concertos, racially related and yet intrinsically totally different in style, tested the skill of the youthful player in an exacting degree, but he showed himself equal to all requirements, and made every instant of his presentation significant and musically compelling. His technical equipment delighted all the experienced violin sharps in the audience, and at all times the Gittelson tone, phrasing and interpretative conception, answered to the severest tenets of refined taste and good art. His unconventional and very effective program arrangement also came in for much praise on the part of his colleagues, as did the extremely well made and brilliant cadenza of his own, which he used in the Nardini concerto.

Full of sentiment, rhythmical charm, and ingratiating tonal nuances were the three dances as vitalized by Gittelson, and because of their kindling nature they caused some of the most spontaneous applause of the afternoon. However, the hearers manifested their pleasure in no uncertain fashion at all points of the program, and aside from demonstrative tributes of handclapping, Gittelson also was apprised of his uncommon success through the extra numbers which he had to add to his regular list in order to still the clamor for extras. He is unquestionably one of the important younger violinists of our day.

"Is he a Wagnerian?"

"No, he is a Russian."

Kemmerer Recital, December 3.

Elloda Kemmerer, pianist, whose recital program, at 212 West Fifty-ninth street, New York, Thursday evening, December 3, is given below, is distinctly a product of the H. Rawlins Baker studio.

Fifteen years ago one of Mr. Baker's most brilliant pupils was Sadie Hardner, who, on the completion of her studies with Mr. Baker, started a class in Allentown, Pa., of which Miss Kemmerer was a member. Miss Hardner proved herself no less successful as teacher than as student, imparting the same thorough habits of work which she herself had acquired. Since entering Mr. Baker's class, Aeolian Hall, 1913, Miss Kemmerer has been most industrious. Last July, assisted by a singer, she gave a series of recitals at Buck Hill Falls Inn, Pocono Mountains. Tuesday evening, December 1, she was soloist with the Moll String Quartet, of Allentown, Pa., at its concert in Oratorio Hall.

For Thursday evening, December 3, Mr. Baker has issued cards for a recital at the American Institute studios, when Miss Kemmerer will play the following program:

Sarabande, op. 1, No. 8.....Felix Blumenfeld
Mazurka, op. 1, No. 7.....A. Liadow
Trio, Suite, op. 32.....Horatio Parker
Andante Cantabile, from op. 11.....P. Tschaikowsky
Piano soli—
Gondoliera.....Liszt
Etude, op. 24, No. 1.....Moszkowski
Quartet in C.....Haydn

Search's Second Recital.

Frederick Preston Search gave his second violoncello recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, Tuesday afternoon, November 24. Mr. Search repeated the Klengel "Wiegenlied" and gave two encores at the conclusion of the group of solos.

His program consisted of the Beethoven G minor sonata, Becker's "Andante Religioso," Tartini's "Adagio Cantabile," Klengel's "Wiegenlied," his own "Minuet" and the Saint-Saëns sonata in F.

Robert Raymond Lippitt assisted at the piano.

Malkin Music School Items.

The Malkin Music School of New York announces that Joseph Malkin, the cellist, who opens his class at the above mentioned school, December 4, has been engaged to appear in Boston as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck.

He will also appear in New York, where he expects to introduce novelties, among which are his own compositions.

This successful institution has issued an eight-page circular concerning the cellist Joseph Malkin, and his success in various countries. There are press comments from New York, England, Russia, Germany, Austria, Denmark, Holland and Mexico, all of which united in expressing the highest admiration for the cellist. Selecting a few of these notices, they read as follows:

His tone in all the register is of surpassing purity and fullness of sound.—Daily Telegraph (London), January 15, 1912.

. . . Particularly dexterous was his playing of Popper's "Danse des Elves." An audience of good size was most enthusiastic in its applause.—New York Globe.

Last Thursday the well known cello virtuoso, Joseph Malkin, appeared with the Philharmonic Orchestra at the Singakademie. With finished technic, ideal poise and appealing yet powerful tone, he brought forth on his wonderful instrument the adagio and allegro from Haydn's cello concerto in D major, as well as Saint-Saëns' cello concerto in A minor (op. 33), and deservedly received the tremendous applause of the big audience.—Deutscher Reichsanzeiger (Berlin), December 27, 1911.

. . . There were no lukewarm listeners in the large audience last night. Mr. Malkin plays the cello as a great artist plays the violin, and gets out of it all of those delicate effects that come only from perfect technic and faultless taste. Those who hear him feel that he has mastered all of the obstinate traits of the cello and has reached the limit of the instrument's possibilities. His audience, in its warmth of applause, told him that New York joins in the praise he has received in other parts of the world.—New York Telegram.

Sophie Traubman, soprano, and Maurice Kaufman, violinist, will give a joint recital at the Malkin Music School, Sunday, December 6, at 3 p. m. Tickets for this concert will be mailed on application. Both are teachers at this institution.

Phi Mu Alpha Annual.

The Musical Courier is in receipt of the 1914 Phi Mu Alpha Annual, the official organ of the Sinfonia Fraternity of America. This society, which was founded in 1898, has chapters at Boston; Philadelphia; Ann Arbor, Mich.; Ithaca, N. Y.; Columbia, Mo.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Syracuse, N. Y.; Evanston, Ill.; Baltimore, Md.; Norman, Okla.; Granville, Ohio, and elsewhere. The officers are Ossian E. Mills (Boston), Percy Jewett Burrell (Boston), Burleigh E. Jacobs (Milwaukee), and Harry D. Kaiser (Philadelphia).

Facing the title page is the following: "The object of this fraternity shall be for the development of the best and truest fraternal spirit; the mutual welfare and brotherhood of musical students; the advancement of music in America, and a loyalty to the Alma Mater." Following the reports of the different officers, Edward J. Stringham, of the Iota Chapter, has coined a set of ten "Do's and Don'ts," which he calls "The Ten Commandments for a 'Frat' Man." After a few words in regard to the convention which is to be held in Philadelphia, November 30, December 1 and 2, also in regard to the 1913 convention, and the advancement of music in America, the reports of the various chapters are given.

The brochure is handsomely arranged and profusely illustrated with pictures of the members, the officers and several clever cartoons.

Mrs. James Stephen Martin in Philadelphia.

On Friday afternoon, November 20, Mrs. James Stephen Martin, soprano, sang at a lecture given at the home of James Garbell, at Wyncote, Pa., a suburb of Philadelphia. Mrs. Martin, who is a resident of Pittsburgh, is the wife of the well known vocal teacher of that city. Connected with this lecture, which dealt with some of the poems of Robert Burns, is an interesting incident. While in Scotland several years ago, Mr. Garbell, at a great deal of expense, acquired the first volumes of these poems, which he brought back with him to his home near Philadelphia. It was the music set to words from some of these poems that Mrs. Martin sang during the course of the lecture.

Mrs. Chester Clapper Bodle Dead.

Mrs. Chester Clapper Bodle died at her home in Binghamton, N. Y., October 13. She possessed rare musical talents both vocally and as an accompanist. Her beautiful contralto voice had been long under the care of Hattie Clapper Morris, the New York contralto and teacher. For two years Mrs. Bodle had been a member of the Broadway (New York) Tabernacle choir and of the New York Oratorio Society.

Jan Sickesz's New York Recital.

Jan Sickesz, the Dutch pianist, will give his first New York recital at Aeolian Hall on Thursday afternoon, December 17.

KREISLER AND GADSKI ENGAGED FOR NEWARK.

List of Soloists to Appear at Coming Music Festival Nearly Completed—Newark Chorus Gives Musical Program—Jersey City Singers Preparing for First Rehearsal—John McCormack Sings—Musical Notes.

Newark, N. J., November 30, 1914.

Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, who returned last Tuesday from Europe, after having been wounded in the present war and on several occasions reported killed, is the latest addition to the splendid list of soloists engaged for the Newark Music Festival, which is to be held on May 4, 5 and 6 next, in the First Regiment Armory. Mr. Kreisler will appear on the final program, May 6, "Concert Night," together with Frieda Hempel, coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and the local soloist to be chosen by competition. He will play a concerto with full orchestra (100 members), in addition to a group of numbers of his own selection.

Another artist of international repute whose name as one of the soloists ought to prove a great attraction to Newark music lovers is Johanna Gadski, soprano, also of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Mme. Gadski will be the principal soloist on "Wagner Night," May 5. The other artists on this same program will be Herbert Witherspoon, basso of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and a tenor not yet decided upon.

The complete list of soloists to date is as follows: "Opera Night," May 4—Pasquale Amato, baritone; Anna Case, soprano; Paul Althouse, tenor, and a contralto to be chosen later. "Wagner Night, May 5—Johanna Gadski, soprano; Herbert Witherspoon, basso, and a tenor not yet announced. "Concert Night," May 6—Fritz Kreisler, violinist; Frieda Hempel, coloratura soprano, and a local girl under twenty-five years of ago, who is to be chosen by competition some time in February. On each of these evenings, not only will the gigantic chorus of nearly fifteen hundred voices participate, but there will also be an orchestra of 100 musicians.

Newark Chorus Rehearsal.

Last Wednesday evening, the weekly rehearsal of the Newark festival chorus drew a record number of singers to the Central High School, where the weekly rehearsals are held. The program on this occasion was divided into two parts, the rehearsal occupying the first hour and a delightful program the latter half. The numbers were as follows: Piano solo, "Papillons" (Schumann), Arthur Klein; contralto solo, "When My Ships Come Sailing Home" (Dorel), Mollie Ely; violin solo, "Pierrot" serenade (Randegger), Edwin Wickenhoefer; bass solo, "The Old Black Mare" (Squire), Millard Robaud; duet (contralto and tenor), "Oh, That We Two Were Maying" (Nevin), Mrs. Ely and M. A. Douglass; violin solo, "Meditation," from "Thais" (Massenet), Edwin Wickenhoefer; bass solo, "Rolling Down to Rio" (German), Millard Robaud; contralto solo, berceuse from "Jocelyn" (Gounod), Mr. Ely (violin obligato, Mr. Wickenhoefer); piano solo, ballade in G minor (Chopin), Arthur Klein.

All of the soloists did well and each in turn was enthusiastically applauded. Mildred Steele Allen and J. H. Huntington, Jr., were the accompanists.

The scheme to devote half of the rehearsal evening once a month to a musical program, the soloists for which are to be chosen from the choral body, seems to have met with great favor. The next rehearsal of the Newark chorus will be held on Wednesday, evening, December 2, in the Central High School auditorium.

Jersey City Chorus to Rehearse December 3.

The first rehearsals of the Jersey City Festival Chorus will be held in the Lincoln High School auditorium, on Thursday evening next, December 3. Already over three hundred names have been enrolled and over two hundred more singers have expressed a desire to join. This chorus will rehearse in Jersey City every Thursday evening, joining the Newark chorus once a month for a combined rehearsal. It is proposed to give a festival in Jersey City next year and for this reason local choruses are being organized in many of the suburban cities and towns to cooperate with Newark this year, with the understanding that next season Newark will cooperate with Jersey City for the concerts there.

Singers who desire to join either the Newark or Jersey City chorus are asked to send name, address and part they sing, stating if voice is high or low, to the office of the Newark Music Festival Association, 593 Broad street, Newark, as soon as possible, so that music can be prepared for them.

Board of Directors Meeting.

Two meetings of importance in connection with the music festival will be held this week at Lauters. On Wednesday afternon, at 4.30 o'clock, a meeting of the board of directors of the Newark Music Festival Association will be held at which a full estimate of the expenses of the festival, the complete programs and list of soloists will be presented. The officers and board of directors are: President, Frederick Frelinghuysen; first vice-president, Wallace M. Scudder; second vice-president, J. H. Huntington, Jr.; secretary, Thornton W. Allen; treasurer, Alfred L. Dennis; board of directors, Roger Young, George D. Smith, Charles Grant Shaffer, Franklin Conklin, Jr., Louis Bamberger, J. H. Bacheller, Spaulding Frazer, Edwin Prieth, G. Wisner Thorne.

Newark Advisory Committee to Meet.

The Newark Advisory Committee will meet on Friday afternoon, December 3, to arrange for the competition in February at which a local soloist is to be chosen by the association. A large number of names have already been submitted for this contest.

John McCormack Sings at the Armory.

Last Tuesday evening, about three thousand persons gathered in the First Regiment Armory to listen to John McCormack, the Irish tenor. Considering the fact that five other affairs of a musical nature took place on the same evening, the audience was a remarkable one in size. The same great enthusiasm which is always a part of a McCormack concert, was fully in evidence here, and the usual long list of encores completed a delightful program. Mr. McCormack was at his best and selected for his numbers many songs new to Newark concert goers. He added, however, several songs that have won for him such spontaneous applause in the past.

Donald McBeath, the violinist, who appeared with Mr. McCormack last year, again pleased his hearers with several well rendered numbers. Edwin Schneider was the accompanist.

Florence Mulford Hunt Gives Song Recital.

On Tuesday evening last, Florence Mulford Hunt gave a delightful song recital at her residence, 1104 Broad street, to the members of the Music Study Club and invited guests. J. Sully Shugard was the accompanist.

Music Notes.

A list of the most important musical events of the coming week follows:

December 2—Vocal and piano recital in Wallace Hall by Mr. and Mrs. Paul Petri.

December 3—Organ recital by George M. Vause, in Third Presbyterian Church, North.

December 7—Arion Concert, first concert, in Krueger Auditorium. The soloists will be Katharine Eyman, pianist, and Paul Petri, tenor.

December 8—Song recital by Miriam Arndt-Ardini, in Wallace Hall.

December 10—Orpheus Club, first concert, in Wallace Hall. Anita Rio will be the soloist.

December 11—Second Artist in Eliot Street School.

Serato's Playing Wins.

Arrigo Serato, after his impressive debut here in the Beethoven concerto, with the Philharmonic Society, at once jumped into a high place in the estimation of our local violinists and lay concert goers, and it was quite a matter of course that his Carnegie Hall recital, on Tuesday afternoon, November 24, should be crowded with a representative and expectant audience.

The hearers were not disappointed in their anticipations, for Serato had not been upon the stage many moments before he laid his auditors captive, and as the afternoon progressed he stimulated them into ever growing wonder and ever increasing tributes of applause.

Of a truly high order was his musicianship in the Bach E minor sonata, which he read not only with earnestness and authority, but also with soulful tone and essentially human appeal. Bach was learned, but he was no unimaginative pedant, and to deliver his music with professorial dryness and to rob it of its tenderness and true sentiment is completely to misunderstand the musical message of the wonderful man of Leipsic. Serato's playing of Bach made one not only respect the E minor sonata but also love it.

In the D minor concerto of Wieniawski, the opposite musical pole (not with a capital) from Bach, a different Serato, a new Serato, a transformed Serato stood before us. With delicate musical responsiveness his nature answered as completely to the sensuous call of Wieniawski as it had voiced the noble purity of Bach, and Serato's tone glowed warm and seductive in the measures of the D minor concerto. The slow movement was delivered with exquisite allurement in tone and phrasing, and the finale fairly set the fancy on fire with the infectious dash and impetuosity which Serato injected into his performance. Played in such a fashion, the D minor concerto of Wieniawski justifies its retention in the violin repertoire for many decades to come. No better work has been written in our twentieth century to enable a fiddler to reveal all those qualities which represent the most engaging and amiable traits of his instrument and of the violinistic art.

As a program close, Serato selected Schumann's ever appealing "Abendlied" and Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen." In the first named the player again "sang" to his audience in strains so searching that no one susceptible to lovely cantilena on the violin could remain unmoved. Serato assuredly is a fiddle exponent of bel canto.

Also in Vitali's chaconne, a work immeasurably inferior to that of Bach's in the same form, Serato exhibited the ability so to vary his delivery and so to plan his nuances that the attention of the listeners was held each instant and their imagination stirred unceasingly.

Altogether, in tone, finger technic, bowing, interpretation, and musicianship, Serato ranks with the real giants of his instrument and is sure to win a long series of triumphs from coast to coast in this country. His Carnegie Hall audience encored him repeatedly.

MUSICAL COURIER

M. H. Hanson Announcements.

Concert Direction M. H. Hanson announces that Theodore Spiering, who has been engaged by the St. Louis Orchestra to replace Willy Burmester, December 11 and 12, has also been engaged for several joint recital appearances with Mrs. H. H. A. Beach during the early spring.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is now concertizing in various cities of the West, the last appearance being with Myrtle Irene Mitchell, at the Shubert Theatre, Kansas City, December 4, after which she will return to Boston in time for her recital at Steinert Hall.

Marcella Craft has returned from the Pacific Coast, and after singing in private recital at Kansas City, Columbia, Mo., and St. Louis, Mo., she will sing her special "guest" engagement with the Century Opera Company in Chicago, four performances only. After this she will open her New England tour at Waterbury, Conn., on January 7.

Vera Barstow, who has been concertizing in Canada during the last three weeks and who played to a crowded house at Toronto, will make her first reappearance in New York on December 11 at the "Moment Musicale," Waldorf-Astoria, sharing the program with some of the eminent artists of the day.

Myrna Sharlow is very busy at present. After singing for the Webster Grove Arion Club, St. Louis, November 26, she sang for the Arion Club, New York, November 29; December 7, she will be the soloist of the elite concert arranged by the German Bazaar; on December 10, she will sing at Bridgeport; December 11, at the Waldorf-Astoria; December 12, at Philadelphia for the Musical Society, and she will resume her Southern and Western tour on December 14, at Columbia, Mo., under the Chester Murray management. She will be not be heard in New York again until she appears with the Mendelssohn Glee Club, February 2.

Charles W. Clark will make his first appearance as soloist at the Wage Earners' League concert at Brooklyn, Seventy-first Regiment Armory, on December 12. Mr. Clark will sing the "Pagliacci" prologue and the "Vision Fugitive" aria, from Massenet's "Herodiade," when an orchestra of 100 pieces will accompany Mr. Clark.

Edith had been to church for the first time, relates Harper's Weekly.

"And what did you think of it?" asked her mother.

"I didn't like the organ very well."

"Why not?"

"'Cause there wasn't any monkey with it."

THE MEANING OF THE "OLD ITALIAN SCHOOL OF THE VOICE." BEL CANTO AND THE VEXED QUESTION OF THE "REGISTERS" OF THE VOICE EXPLAINED.

BY HELENE MAIGILLE.

Director of the Helene Maigille American School of Bel Canto.

"What is the real meaning of the Old Italian School of the Voice"? asked a representative of the MUSICAL COURIER of Helene Maigille one day last week. "Particularly when everything vocally, it would seem, is being taught by extreme, new, modern methods."

"The Old Italian School is called old," replied Mme. Maigille, "but in reality it is always new, always the same. The same today as it has always been, because it is the one standard of voice production, which, through its natural, unstrained use of the vocal mechanism, most easily and perfectly produces in beauty and perfection the three registers of the voice. It is just nature fulfilling her mission for singing in all the languages on the globe."

"But," answered the MUSICAL COURIER writer, "registers of the voice are denied in these days, and even their use looked upon by many voice teachers and physicians as illogical and unnecessary, some even going so far as to say they positively do not exist."

"I can only repeat," replied Mme. Maigille, "that they do exist, and not one great singer has ever been heard who did not produce them and whose career was not dependent upon their intelligent use. Where they are not recognized, careers are invariably short, and the tone production of the artist always open to criticism. There is not a natural, beautiful voice in any vocal studio but proves their existence; only teachers do not recognize them except as merely hearing a beautiful voice, differently poised than the others—particularly the others, who are being experimented on by every new and utterly dangerous idea promulgated by teachers and physicians, who want to exploit something new and bizarre."

"Will you, then, explain the registers, their use, method of production and preservation?" asked the interviewer.

"Certainly," answered Mme. Maigille, "although it is not so easy to explain verbally, as it was to produce the results upon the voice you just listened to, and my explanation is not theory but fact, again definitely proven by the smooth, perfect scales demonstrating the three registers with evenness and beauty, which you have just now so much admired.

"The vocal mechanism guided by the right position of the jaw, mouth, tongue and soft palate, with the full, silent inspiration of the breath, prepares the laryngeal cartilages, the Cricoid, Thyroid and Arytenoid, for such exact adjustment of the vocal chords that the intrinsic muscles act with exquisite precision and involuntarily produce without the slightest effort the true stroke of the glottis, which nature gives for the exact production of the voice in all three registers. The 'coupe de glotte,' taken understandingly by the pupil, gives at once all that is purest, richest and best in the human voice, producing richness and fullness in the extreme lower medium tones called chest tones, which nature requires to narrow the compass of the medium notes, so that it will not lack strength and breadth in the middle register.

"There is a little less contraction of the pharyngeal muscles for the emission of the medium notes, and still less, scarcely any, for the head notes, as the chords—unless wrongly tightened—produce the head register with perfect ease and surety of emission; thus the chords have no tax placed upon them, but the glottis action assumes the burden.

"Lilli Lehmann states in her book that the chest tones, particularly the vowel E are produced in the chest and with closed post-nasal passages, hence are guttural in emission. This statement is exceedingly incorrect, as are other inconsistencies in her book, and in many other works on the voice, as well, particularly in the case of learned physicians, who make the most erroneous and misleading statements, and who ought to put their knowledge of physiology, anatomy and laryngoscopy to a more enlightening use.

"Nature calls for a tension of the vocal bands and she knew where to put it. First, it begins at the lowest tones so that the tension may not be interrupted in the entire length of the chords—hence a perfect approximation and which, unimpaired, produces with purity the chest, medium and head registers, without which a wrong emission ensues and an overstretching of the medium notes occur, weakening the entire structure of the vocal mechanism, destroying the lower tones more and more, until Nature rebels and loss of voice occurs just where the entire vocal mechanism requires the most strength and a sure foundation.

"Relax the lower notes and you tighten the upper ones, rendering them strident and unmusical, or else so relax them that only a kind of pianissimo tone results, the vocal chords being unable further to support them. And while we hear and read of vibrations, air waves, prisms, æsthetics, etc., new words replacing intelligible language, the effect is to bring about a very hazy idea of true tone production to the mind and understanding of singers, instead of giving them a good stroke of the glottis and sending them home rejoicing. The extreme ignorance with regard to the function of the glottis is proved by the repeatedly bad work heard in the fatal shock of the glottis; or, the total disregard of its action in the relaxed and strained production affected at the present day."

"What do you mean by 'relaxation'?" was the next query. "Will you explain it?"

"Now indeed you have asked a difficult and an easy question all in one. It, relaxation, is less understood than the other, the glottis action. Usually the pupil relaxes so hard and tight that all the strain comes upon the chords, so that the intrinsic muscles of the larynx become overstrained in their attempt to perform their work in an involuntary action, made impossible by the grip and tension placed upon them, and thus, strained beyond endurance, bowed chords, nodes and general breakdown of the voice and health ensues. If only it were understood how every muscle, from the lowest in the larynx to the highest in the soft palate, is placed in position to do its appointed task, there would be fewer failures in voice training."

"But just one more question for complete elucidation. How is this relaxation also applied to the old Italian school?"

"Because," answered Mme. Maigille, "the Italians all use their vowels so open and free that their unconscious relaxation produces just the right action of the vocal mechanism in speech and song, as it gives the vocal chords, directed by the intrinsic muscles, the unimpeded, perfect muscular action they demand and which so called relaxation exercises never, never produce. All the time students or professional singers are so using the voice they are in truth singing straight from the bottom of their throats."

As the MUSICAL COURIER representative left the room, where this vocal science had not only been explained but absolutely demonstrated, a better understanding of Mme. Maigille's wonderful gift of imparting her knowledge was revealed to the listener; and a standard of vocal art recognized which justified the strong title—"a school of singing which sets the standard in vocal art"—no empty pretension—but an established fact based upon a clear, erudite, unquestioning understanding of the true art of voice production, best expressed under the sane, safe and reasonable title, "The Old Italian School of the Voice."

Ethelynde Smith Sings Gilberté Songs.

A special feature of the first afternoon musicale of the Women's Philharmonic Society, Carnegie Hall, New York, November 28, was the singing of the following songs of Hallet Gilberté by Ethelynde Smith, who comes from Portland, Me.: "The Little Red Ribbon," "An Evening Song," "Song of the Canoe," minuet "La Phyllis," "The Bird," "Ah, Love, But a Day."

Miss Smith has a clear and high soprano voice, her enunciation is clean, she displays much facial expression, and is a singer of mental equipment as well; these qualities served to make her rendering of the Gilberté songs most enjoyable, the last song, "Ah, Love, But a Day," finding real dramatic expression in her interpretation.

Mme. Gilberté gave a humorous number called "Studio Notes," with much naturalness and looked charmingly pretty.

Frederick Gunther sang Gilberté's songs also; his voice has grown in power and variety of expression.

Clementine Tetedoux-Lusk is chairman of the entertainment committee.

Mr. Gilberté played all the accompaniments with crisp touch, and received homage from his numerous admirers for his always natural, refined and singable songs.

The next musicale will take place Saturday, December 26, 4 p. m.

Camilieri in New York.

L. Camilieri, who has conducted at Covent Garden Opera, London, and at Theatre des Champs Elysées, Paris, also at Queens Hall, London, has arrived in New York.

NEW YORK AS A MUSICAL CENTER.

By WILLIAM C. CARL, MUS. DOC.
Director of the Guilmant Organ School.

New York as a musical center is the one city the world is looking up to and watching at this critical moment in the history of the nations. The glory of Berlin, Paris, Vienna, London and Petrograd is veiled by the terrible conflict now going on, and in consequence a large proportion of the great artists are today harbored in the city of New York, which, with those who are resident here, should make this the most notable season in its history.

As for musical atmosphere, we have it, and can imbibe it freely without being dependent on the Old World as in former times. Guides on the sightseeing cars inform tourists daily that Jenny Lind once sang at Castle Garden in the Battery. What would the famous prima donna say if she could return to our midst now!

New York has much to offer. First in importance is the opera at the Metropolitan, where performances are given six or seven times a week during five months of the year, not counting the Sunday evening concerts and special performances of the "Ring." Here is gathered a galaxy of stars, such as can be found nowhere else, and an ensemble constantly improving, and a great orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra visits New York during the season for ten concerts in Manhattan and five in Brooklyn. The Philharmonic Society gives three series, comprising forty concerts; the New York Symphony an equal number in Aeolian Hall, and the Young People's Symphony in Carnegie Hall. Then the annual series of the People's Symphony concerts and the chamber concerts under their auspices, the Volpe Orchestra, each have their regular concerts, in addition to the visiting organizations, which, all told, make an average of at least 300 orchestral offerings during the season in Greater New York. Students have no cause to complain of either the number, quality or the prices asked, as the latter vary from sixteen cents to two dollars a seat for a single concert. For chamber music New York has an annual series by the Flonzaley, Kneisel, the Kaufman, the Olive Meade quartets, Tollefsen Trio, etc. As to vocal and instrumental recitals given by the world's greatest artists they are kaleidoscopic. Their number is legion, and so great it is impossible to keep pace with them. Frequently seats are offered at special rates to students, thus making it possible for those of limited means to attend a greater number. The Oratorio Society gives three concerts and the Musical Art Society two. The many private choral societies give their regular quota in representative programs.

In addition to all this there is much that can be heard without money or price. There is perhaps more organ music to be heard in New York than elsewhere, and these recitals are invariably free. The College of the City of New York gives two recitals each week for several months; the American Guild of Organists, Columbia University, Sunday afternoons; the Board of Education and Union Theological Seminary, each a series. The First Presbyterian Church, Fifth avenue and Twelfth street, gives a free recital every Monday night the year round, and a long list of churches give extensive series, including Trinity, St. Thomas, the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, Church of the Divine Paternity, the Church of St. Nicholas and the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church.

Musical services and the rendition of the best known oratorios are sung with great frequency, thus giving to the masses an opportunity to hear the best in church music. Even the department stores vie with each other in presenting programs of educational value and importance.

Should not all this create an atmosphere conducive to the best results? This is exactly what is being done, and a remarkable change is taking place.

As a center for learning New York stands unequalled. The numbers of schools of music and conservatories are legion, with faculties containing the most distinguished names in the profession. For those who prefer to study privately the lists would easily number in the thousands. The influence of American art is making itself felt the world over, and the day is long past when European study is a necessity. We have all that is required right here at our doors and the best in the world to choose from. America is able to hold her own, and has already taken her place, and deservedly so, in the world of music.

That students have not been slow in realizing these tremendous advantages is evinced by the enormous army of them now quartered in the city for the winter. We are bound to become a great musical nation, and the present moment is our great opportunity and one not being lost sight of.

"There's no pleasing some people," said the janitor.

"What's the trouble?"

"A family upstairs telephoned me that they were trying to play 'The Anvil Chorus' on the phonograph, and wouldn't I please regulate the knocking of the radiator so as to keep it in time with the music."—Washington Star.

Albert Spalding in Boston.

Before Mr. Spalding had drawn his bow upon the stage of Jordan Hall yesterday afternoon, his program spoke for him as the serious-minded violinist that he has been from his young days and as the ripened violinist that he has now become. The virtuoso who in recital would take things easily or who would court the ready applause of his audience hardly returns to the older classics of the violin like the sonata by Corelli with which Mr. Spalding began or the transcription from Bach for violin alone with which he continued or the concerto out of Mozart with which he ended the graver part of his program. Even in the lighter pieces to which he then passed, he chose oftener as a musician respecting his music than as a virtuoso seeking his means to effect. Even the prelude and the cherzo of his own that he included among these pieces had their persuasive sobriety. Pleasant invention, even if it were not very individual, a faculty for self-criticism, a feeling for melody, rhythm and harmony that shunned the cheap and the common without lapse into cold and negative austerity, distinguished the prelude. The scherzo displayed the feats that a violinist may do with the violin, but it respected the voice of the instrument and running fancy rather than shrewd calculation seemed to summon and order them.

As Mr. Spalding chose his music, so he played it—with the skill of a virtuoso who, being also musician, puts his resources at the service of his music. He has advanced much in ease and fluency of technical command since he last ventured a concert of his own in Boston. He bows more freely; his fingering is more sensitive; thought of the means no longer clouds his regard for the resulting voice; the bravura of flageolet tones, eerie harmonics and double-stopping lies all readily and securely within his powers. He has schooled himself to use all his technical abilities evenly and to ply them with sense of the style that the chosen music exacts. He was sobriety itself with them in Corelli's sonata; he magnified them a little in Bach's adagio and fuguc; he used them with polished discretion in Mozart's concerto; and he was becomingly warm with them in Paganini's and Joachim's semi-show pieces

Out of this technical skill and this musical sensibility flowed a tone such as Mr. Spalding for many a year of application could not summon. It is rich and luminous, edgeless and flowing, warm and transmitting, sensitive always to the unexaggerated and undistorted voice of the violin, and to the contours and the contents of the music it is uttering. . . . When it must play over one of the old allegros that begin and end Corelli's sonata, it becomes exactly the even tone, as evenly accented, that the music exacts. It is a bright tone when Mozart's music exacts such a voice and bids suavity as well. It is warmly songful and elastic to every rhythm and transition in such a piece as Brahms' dances. It lacks for the time and so for as the music went yesterday, only, that fine and spinning quality which evolves a melody as the delicatest of transitions and advance. There Mr. Spalding is still a little heavy and cold-handed.

Such a tone deserves to serve such musical understanding, intuition and sense of style as Mr. Spalding displayed yesterday and for the first time in his rare visits to this town. He plays soberly even when he warms to such a piece as the dance aforesaid, to his own scherzo or to the rondo at the end of Mozart's concerto. . . . Yesterday he proved beyond peradventure that he had them both and in some of their finest musical estates. Out of them really spring his feeling for sustained yet elastic melodic curve and for almost every attribute of instrumental song; his practiced instinct for the just accent; his quick sense of the play of ornament; the keen soft beat of the rhythm through all his playing; his evenness and warmth of phrase; and his adept sense, which is half affection, for the beauty and the emotional quality of the voice of the violin. Of "temperament" and "personality" in as fine a kind are born, too, the sense of style that differentiated the broad periods of old Corelli's music from the intertwining and sinewy sonorities of Bach's fugue and set them both apart from the purling melodies, the bright figures and the songful sentiment of Mozart's concerto. Mr. Spalding's "temperament" and "personality" need not go beyond the violin and music to conquer a finc appreciation for him. Romantic music may as yet be for them. Outside it enough and more than enough remain.—Boston Evening Transcript, November 13, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Edmund Burke with Cincinnati Orchestra.

Edmund Burke appeared in Cincinnati as soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Ernst Kunwald, which engagement afforded a further indication of the Irish baritone's popularity. Mr. Burke sang the aria, "Quand la Flamme de l'Amour," from Bizet's "Ja Jolie Fille de Perth," and the "Vision Fugitive," from Massenet's "Herodiade," while for an encore he sang Clayton John's "I'll Sing Thee Songs of Araby."

The Cincinnati Commercial Tribune declared that the baritone "confirmed the impression which he made on his first appearance here last winter. Burke is a superb artist, and while both his arias were unfamiliar, they were nevertheless received with the greatest enthusiasm."

"Mr. Burke," said the Post, "has a magnificent voice, which he handles with most artistic finish." The Times-Star characterized the singer as the possessor of "a good baritone voice and a superlative method of singing," adding: "His manner of singing might be regarded as a lesson in his art. He has diction, fervor and style, and splendid interpretative powers. He was tremendously applauded."

"Burke," said the Enquirer, "has a voice of fine quality and much resonance, a manly bearing and an artistic insight. He was received with every mark of cordiality." (Advertisement.)

DETROIT ORCHESTRA BEGINS SEASON.

Opening Concert Attracts Large and Representative Audience—A Satisfying Performance—Tuesday Musicale Concert.

Detroit, Mich., November 25, 1914.

Thursday afternoon, November 19, a large and musically representative audience assembled in the Detroit Opera House to hear the first concert of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Weston Gales, conductor. The program included the Beethoven symphony, No. 1, the "Siegfried Idyll," Wagner and the Weber-Weingartner "Invitation to the Dance." The performance throughout was most satisfying. The conductor was recalled after each number and an encore demanded at the close of the program. As the audience was largely made up of those who have been listening to the best orchestras of the country for the past eight years, the attention and discriminating applause must have been most gratifying to Mr. Gales and his men. It is little short of astonishing that so much unanimity of spirit should have been attained in so short a time. There seems to be perfect understanding between the conductor and the members of the orchestra, and the work is marked by precision, enthusiasm and intelligent interpretation. If the first concert is an earnest of things to come, Detroit may well congratulate herself upon the possession of a symphony orchestra that is well worth while.

TUESDAY MUSICALE CONCERT.

The second morning concert of the Tuesday Musicale, given at the Century Building, November 17, served to introduce two new members, Eleanor Osborne, soprano, and Claire Cornwall Burtch, pianist. Both made a most favorable impression. Helen Burr-Brand, harpist; Elizabeth Ruhlman, pianist; Bessie Booth Dodge, soprano, and Ethel McCornac Fox, contralto, were the others who appeared on the program. Margaret Mannebach and Mrs. Edwin S. Sherrill were the accompanists of the morning.

FIRST APPEARANCE OF MUSICAL ART TRIO.

Monday evening, November 16, the Musical Art Trio, consisting of Hildegarde Brandegee, violinist; Vera Poppe, cellist, and Mrs. Boris Ganapol, pianist, made its initial appearance at the Ganapol Hall. Two trios were played, op. 11, Beethoven, and op. 50, Tschaikowsky. Miss Brandegee and Miss Poppe each contributed a group of solos.

DETROIT NOTES.

Della Hagerty, violinist, gave a recital in the Green Room of the Hotel Pontchartrain, Friday evening, November 20. She was assisted by Andrew R. Davis, harpist, and Clara Koehler-Heberlein, accompanist.

William Howland, basso, gave a recital in the Woodward Avenue Church House, Tuesday evening, November 24. The program included a number of old English ballads. He was assisted by Charles Frederick Morse at the piano.

JENNIE M. STODDARD.

Alda and La Forge at Mozart Musicale.

Frances Alda, soprano, and Frank La Forge, pianist, will be heard in the following program at the December 5 afternoon musicale of the New York Mozart Society. Mrs. Noble McConnell, president: "Triana" (Suburb of Seville), Albenez, "Scherzo," D'Albert, Mr. LaForge; "M'ha preso alla sua ragna," Paradies, "Polly Willis," Dr. Arne, "The Plague of Love," Dr. Arne, "The Lass with the Delicate Air," Dr. Arne, Mme. Alda; "Im Kahne," Grieg, "Spinnlied," Moniusako, "J'ai pleuré en rêve," Hüe, "Fleur j'etee," Faure, "Ouvre tes yeux bleues," Massenet, Mme. Alda; "Romance," LaForge, "Etincelles," Moszkowski, Mr. LaForge; "Pastorale," Carey, "Haste Silv'ry Moonbeams," Dohnanyi, "I Came with a Song," LaForge, "In Pride of May," LaForge, "An Open Secret," Woodman, Mme. Alda; "Un Bel Di" (Madame Butterfly), Puccini, Mme. Alda.

Marie Morrisey's New York Notices.

At her recital last night in Aeolian Hall, Marie Morrisey strengthened the good impression she had made a year ago, when she emerged from the seclusion of the church to take her place among concert singers.

Hers is a . . . contralto of distinctly lyric quality which some might describe as a mezzo-soprano. But it is a voice of unusually pleasing and sympathetic timbre, mellow, vibrant, sweet.—New York Press.

Marie Morrisey, a young contralto, had the New York field of music all to herself last night. . . . She presented an interesting program of old and new songs to a friendly audience at Aeolian Hall.—New York Evening Mail.

That this singer has good taste was illustrated . . . by the somewhat unusual program she had prepared. There were groups of songs in Italian, German, French and English; a song cycle, "Love's Triumph," by Bruno Huhn, which, accompanied by the composer, had its first hearing . . .

All of these numbers were delivered by the singer in an artistic manner.—New York World.

Contrast and variety were the keynotes of Marie Morrisey's second annual song recital which took place last evening in Aeolian Hall.

Miss Morrisey's interpretation was delightful both from a musical standpoint and in the matter of diction.

It is a far reach from the method and manner of ancient Latin to modern Teuton, but the contralto bridged the distance artistically when she next presented lieder by Strauss, Grieg, Schubert and others. Her well trained and mellow contralto was admirably illustrated, especially in Schubert's "Death and the Maiden," and Loewe's "O Suesse Mutter."—New York American.

Her deep tones were full and rich.—New York Herald.

Marie Morrisey, contralto, . . . gave a recital at Aeolian Hall last night. . . . Her voice is agreeable, . . . her enunciation is excellent, and her taste is good.—Evening World.

A large audience and a friendly reception to the singer were agreeable concomitants of the song recital of Marie Morrisey, given last evening in Aeolian Hall.—New York Times.

Miss Morrisey, besides being a woman of unusual beauty, possesses a voice of considerable power and richness. . . . She showed not a little interpretive power and more than a little feeling.—New York Tribune.

Miss Morrisey sang a taxing program, from classical airs, including one of Haydn, through the German and French to modern English and American. An entire cycle of "Love's Triumph" was accompanied by Bruno Huhn, the composer. . . . Her voice was powerful and clear.—New York Evening Sun.

The soloist made a pleasing impression. . . . The vocalist effectively gave two representative songs of opposite sentiment, "Der Tod und das Maedchen," by Schubert, and "O Suesse Mutter," by Loewe.

A song cycle by Bruno Huhn, "Love's Triumph," was given for the first time and it had a great success.—Brooklyn Eagle. (Advertisement.)

Ilma-Goodman Recital at von Ende School of Music.

Appreciative as are the audiences that attend the musicales of the von Ende School of Music, New York, a gathering probably never has been roused to such enthusiasm as it was on November 24, the occasion being a joint recital by Alfred Ilma, baritone, and Lawrence Goodman, piano. The program opened with the rhapsodie in G minor by Brahms, played by Mr. Goodman with the virile intellectuality that characterizes that composition, and was followed by Schumann's "Romanza," the wistful motive of which was fairly breathed forth from the keys. The Schumann-Tausig "Contrabandiste" was a brilliant performance, and the interpretation of Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso" elicited from one in the audience the remark, "Mr. Goodman is capable of resuscitating the dead!"

Mr. Ilma's first number was "Vision Fugitive" from Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Ilma, who joined the faculty of the school and was presented to its patrons late last season, proved himself then a singer with a voice of great power, range and flexibility, and a musicianly interpreter. His singing places him in the foremost rank of concert singers. The aria was sung with a fine sense of rich color, and with dramatic élan. In "Wotan's Abschied" Mr. Ilma's singing vividly suggested the scene dominated by the figure of the great Teuton god, and profoundly impressed the audience with the performer's penetration of the composer's intentions and his perfect command of voice.

Mr. Goodman's playing of the Chopin B flat minor scherzo, and the Dohnyani "Rhapsody" was superb for breadth and warmth of tone. "Minuetto," by Zanella, and "Etude Fantastique," by Godard, gave further proof of the artist's versatility. His encores were the Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire" and Chopin's etude in C minor, Op. 25, and the audience was loathe to see him retire. Mr. Ilma's last offering was a group of songs: Herm. Loehr's "When the Caravan Has Rested," Hugo Wolff's "Verborgenheit" and Henchel's "Morning Hymn," which brought out the more lyric features of his art. Mr. Ilma, too, was repeatedly pressed for encores, and after the "Two Grenadiers" he was once more called out, and gave the dainty "Plaisir d'Amour" with an admirable simplicity and charm. Margery Morrison was the sympathetic accompanist.

The last recital in November at the von Ende School of Music took place Monday evening, November 30, when Minnie Tracey, of opera fame, who recently arrived in this country from Paris, sang. She was assisted by Sergei Kotlarsky, violinist, whose presence in New York is due to the war.

Saturday evening, December 5, the von Ende School of Music offers its patrons the rare opportunity of hearing the Brahms double concerto for violin and cello, played by Anton Witek, concertmaster, and Heinrich Warnke, solo cellist, both of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program also includes the Schumann sonata, op. 22, in G minor, for piano, played by Vita Witek, and the Beethoven piano and violin sonata, op. 30, No. 3, in G major.

Jan Sickesz in Pittsburgh and Jamestown.

The fascinating program was presented by Jan Sickesz, a distinguished young pianist of Holland. . . . His interpretations were marvelous. His touch was exquisite and he proved himself a poetic and sympathetic artist. His numbers received tremendous applause.—The Pittsburgh Sunday Post, November 8, 1914.

The thirty-sixth season of the Mozart Club opened yesterday afternoon with a recital by Jan Sickesz, the distinguished Dutch piano virtuoso. His playing characterizes clarity of tone, fine conception and perfect poise, combined with splendid technic.

. . . Beethoven's immortal sonata, "The Moonlight," opened the program and was presented by Herr Sickesz with reverence; especially the adagio was played with deep poetic feeling. . . . He is temperamental, as was marked in his superb phrasing of the Schumann phantasie. . . . The Brahms group was replete with charm. . . .

The program closed with his (Liszt's) sixth Hungarian rhapsodie, bristling with difficulties which Herr Sickesz surmounted with supreme ease. . . . Altogether the program was masterly.—Jamestown Evening Journal, November 12, 1914.

Herr Sickesz presented a program yesterday which gave ample scope to his varied powers, and by its very wealth and profundity of musical expression compelled the most concentrated attention from both musician and layman. The opening number was the incomparable "Moonlight" sonata of Beethoven, the adagio being exquisite in its liquid cadence, and a tempo which was the perfection of this special movement. The allegretto and presto agitato completed this trinity of harmonious beauty, which never fails to delight music lovers, when interpreted by an artist such as Sickesz.

The second number was Schumann's fantasie, op. 17. The two parts of the fantasie gave great opportunity for strong contrasts, and the tonal effects of delicate pianissimo and virile crescendo were particularly striking. A finished legato and beautiful singing tone were strongly evidenced and an enthusiastic encore testified the deep appreciation of the listeners. . . . The delicate capriccio was full of charm, and masterly technic was displayed throughout the varied movements, each eliciting its "meed of wonder and praise," both for conception and interpretative rendition.—Jamestown Morning Post, November 12, 1914. Narrow Escape of the Millers.

A narrow escape from a railroad wreck was one of the recent experiences of Reed Miller, tenor, and his wife, Nevada van der Veer, mezzo-contralto. The singers were on tour—as they have been without a break since the opening of the season—and their train had reached a point in South Dakota, when an effort was being made to make up an hour's lost time. Had the engineer succeeded a smash-up would have been inevitable, for a broken rail lay at a bad curve where it could not have been detected. As it was, a freight train which had the right of way struck the rail first, and was badly demolished.

More Successes for Anna Case.

During the latter part of October and early November, Anna Case, American soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, has not only been busy, but has also won brilliant successes one after another.

Beginning with a recital at Somerville, N. J., then followed in rapid succession by a recital with the Musical Art Society of Rome, N. Y., and the State Normal School at Ypsilanti, Mich., a joint recital with Pasquale Amato at Detroit, Mich., and a recital at Des Moines, Ia.; she was also soloist with the Apollo Club, Erie, Pa., the Shriners' concerts at Kansas City, Mo., with Antonio Scotti and others; at the New York Mozart Society Musicale; soloist with the University Orchestra at Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., and appeared in a joint recital with Friedberg and Serato, at Waterbury, Conn.

Miss Case's success in all of these concerts has been so dominating that in nearly every instance requests for return dates have been sent in; from one city three have been received and one local manager has secured an option on a series of ten or fifteen concerts for next season.

The accompanying picture shows Miss Case with her Russian wolfhound, Boris Godunoff. The following are a few expressions from the press:

Miss Case made an exquisite picture. She is young, dainty and very beautiful after a delicate fashion. Yet, what is more to the point, she revealed a soprano voice of almost irreproachable purity and a finished art that might be compared to that of Elena Gerhardt or even Mme. Sembrich. Miss Case's voice is light, yet warm, and it is youthfully vibrant. It is difficult to think of any to compare with her among the younger prima donnas of the day. With the assistance of an exceptional accompanist, Charles Gilbert Spross, she sang a program of great intrinsic interest quite out of the usual rut, dipping into Kjerulf, Monteverdi, Sinding and Bellini. For her aria, however, she went back to a more familiar world, and offered the well known number from "La Traviata," that standby of all who aspire to coloratura singing. Be it recorded that for almost the first time, Detroit concert goers heard the old Verdi number given with genuine dramatic significance, as though it were something more than a mere show piece. Miss Case's ability to display cadenzae is by no means small, but admiration for her ability along this line must be lost in wonder at her instinct for truth.—Detroit Free Press, Sunday, October 25, 1914.

Anna Case is more than a beautiful woman. She is a beautiful artist and is evidently an accomplished actress. Her singing of the big "Traviata" aria, "Ah, fors e lui," firmly established her in the good graces of the audience and in response to a demand for an encore she sang an English translation of a Norwegian ballad, a profoundly impressive vocal etching unique in concert programs.

As an interpretative artist Miss Case proved as effective as an operatic singer and her subsequent appearances were eagerly awaited. In fact, she scored one of the most emphatic successes of the evening. She sang the appealing "Depuis le jour" aria from "Louise" as Charpentier himself might have wished it sung. The audience refused to be satisfied with her encore, "A Song of India," in itself a striking number, and in response she sang to her own accompaniment "Annie Laurie" and a piquant Irish song, with a captivating "brogue."—The Kansas City Journal, November 3, 1914.

Anna Case sang. Let us forget that she is a Metropolitan opera prima donna and we see a fresh, particularly attractive young woman, impressively modest, appealing; whose voice captivated—crept into the soul of the audience, by its clarity, its volume, its timbre. Waterbury may never know a voice again so thrilling in tone, so encompassing, and such as to still the pulse of the listeners.—Waterbury, Ct., Republican, November 13, 1914.

Mme. de Cisnernos Praised by Brooklyn Press.

At yesterday's concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra at the Academy of Music, an artist who was born and bred in Brooklyn captured a large audience by her ready response. Julia Culp, the great Dutch lieder singer, was announced to sing, but at noon her manager, Mme. Antonia Sawyer, found that a sudden hoarseness would prevent Mme. Culp's singing. With a woman's quick aptitude, Mme. Sawyer rang up her other big star, Eleonora de Cisneros, who has only just arrived from Paris to begin a long concert tour, and Mme. de Cisneros was asked to sing. Without any possibility of a rehearsal, she was rushed into a concert gown, went with full speed to the Academy of Music, and was ready to take her place on the program, the second number, in less than an hour from the time she was summoned.

An announcement was made from the stage that Mme. de Cisneros had consented to sing at short notice, but this conveyed but little to the vast audience. Of course, Eleonora Cisneros needs no introduction to a Brooklyn audience. Her career in all the great cities of Europe, in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, is too well known to require mention, but she only further proved her very high artistic rank by her magnificent work yesterday, and her audience was ready to appreciate and applaud. . . . She did first a group of songs, charmingly accompanied by Andre Benoist; Martini's "Plaisir d'Amour," Wagner's "Träume," and the Strauss "Ständchen," the first in French, the latter two in German, and her later number was the big aria from Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Dalila," "Amours Viens Aider," with the orchestra, without any rehearsal. She showed all sides of her wonderful voice; its quality, range, flexibility, in this varied program, and her phrasing and interpretative skill proved her to be one of the very few great singers who are equally at home in opera and on the concert stage. She is a singer of whom Brooklyn will be proud, and one who it is hoped may be induced to come more frequently to America, for her art is supremely great.—The Daily Standard Union, Brooklyn, November 23, 1914.

Mme. de Cisneros, however, allayed doubt by her admirable singing of Wagner's "Träume" and Strauss' "Ständchen," in her group of songs. Her voice is large and rich and she sang her numbers solely with an eye to their spirit and significance, and not at all for the display of her large vocal resources. Her beauty of voice, however, supplemented the beauty of her songs. Her other song in this group was the unfamiliar "Plaisir d'Amour," by Padre Martini. Later, Mme. de Cisneros sang with orchestra the "Amour Viens Aider," from "Samson et Dalila," to which her large dramatic style is excellently adapted.—The Brooklyn Daily Eagle, November 23, 1914. New York School of Music and Arts Catalogue and Concert.

Ralfe Leech Sterner, president of the New York School of Music and Arts, has issued a handsome thirty-four page booklet, containing detailed information regarding that institution. There is much of interest in this catalogue beside the enumeration of the faculty and branches of instruction. A novel idea is the offer to send to inquirers a biography of any teacher with whom a prospective student may contemplate studying. Reference is made to the dormitory and boarding department. The course of study in all branches is outlined with special attention to a course for teachers. There is detailed information regarding the Congress of Musicians and Students which was held at the school last summer. A "United States Trade Report of 1914 on American Music Schools," published at Cincinnati, Ohio, is very flattering to Mr. Sterner and the school. Cuts of both the director and Emma Robinson Sterner, vice-president and treasurer, grace the pages. Terms of tuition are given and several flattering press notices are printed as follows:

Largest and most distinguished faculty of any conservatory in America.—The Evening Telegram.

Mr. Sterner has installed the finest corps of instructors obtainable in Europe and America.—Fine Arts Journal.

All members of the faculty have studied with famous masters here and in Europe, and some of them are widely known.—Musical Courier.

This school is open day and evening the entire year.

Tonight (Wednesday, December 2) a concert of vocal and instrumental music is announced at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, which will be duly reported in the columns of the Musical Courier.

Strassberger Conservatories Joint Recital.

The Strassberger Conservatories of Music, St. Louis, Mo., presented in a joint recital Prof. George Buddeus, pianist, and Guido Parisi, violinist, at the South Side Conservatory auditorium, on Friday evening, November 27. Prof. Charles Galloway furnished the accompaniments.

The program follows: Fantasie, op. 49, Chopin; concerto (Allegro Festoso), 1692-1770, Tartini-Pente; airs Hongroise, P. A. Tirindelli; concert etude, op. 2, No. 2, concert etude, op. 2, No. 6, Henselt; "Bigarrure," Arensky; "Vechio Minuetto," Sgambati; "The Waves," Moszkowski; "Berceuse Dramatique," "In a Garden," "Burlesco," P. A. Tirindelli; "A Dream of Love," "Spanish Rhapsody," Liszt.

Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.

Shepherds Watch, Thy Rest at Night," a Christmas carol for mixed voices, composed by H. E. Parkhurst; a very simple and melodious setting of an ingenuous poem by Gertrude Ina Robinson. The carol is intended to be sung unaccompanied, but the voice parts are written in a two stave piano score so as to be played on a keyboard if so desired.

"Christmas Sing Out With Exultation," a Christmas song for mixed voices, with soprano or tenor, and baritone solos, and with an accompaniment for organ, composed by Will C. Macfarlane, a long, brilliant and elaborate work, containing a fugatto and ending with a powerful climax. The anthem is really not as difficult as it sounds, for the voices are discreetly treated and the accompaniment contains no awkward passages.

"Faust," a lyric drama in fine acts, book by J. Barbier and M. Carré, music by Charles Gounod, vocal score by Léo Delibes, English version by H. F. Chorley, revised by Charles Fonteyn Manney, with an introductory essay by Philip Hale. This clearly engraved and well printed edition of a standard opera also contains the ballet music which is usually performed in Paris. The instrumentation is extensively indicated and the work is carefully edited. No one could ask for a better and more attractive edition of "Faust" than this new issue by the Ditson house.

"Twelve Short Poems," for violin and piano, composed by Cecil Burleigh; a pleasing and moderately difficult collection of little pieces attractive to good amateur violinists and teachers alike. All the necessary fingering is marked. Each piece has a verse of poetry to give a clue to the sentiment. The names of the twelve short tone poems are: "Fernside Farm," "The Barefoot Boy," "Sweet Fern," "At the Brookside," "At Sundown," "By the Fireside," "The Oak," "Mid-Summer," "Autumn," "The Huskers," "In Harvest Fields," "The Fishermen."

"One Hundred and Twenty-five Exercises in Passage Playing," op. 261, by Carl Czerny, newly edited and fingered by Karl Benker; a most useful, presentable and welcome edition of a long recognized standard work of the greatest technical value.

"Love's Triumph," a cycle of five songs, text by Charles Hanson Towne, music by Bruno Huhn. If frequent appearance on concert programs is any criterion of success, these new songs by Bruno Huhn are already popular, notwithstanding their recent publication. The retrospective and serious nature of the poems is indicated by the titles: "Where Are Rome and Nineveh?", "In Eternity," "Let Us Look to the Stars," "Sometimes I Watch Thee," "The Great Farewell." For these lyrics the composer has written music that is, first of all, melodious and singable, and also full of tenderness and pensiveness "which resembles sorrow only as the mists resemble the rain." Poetical and delightful as this music is, it nevertheless shows the practical and experienced musician on every page; for the composer has written his vocal phases so that they may be sung by singers with little range of voice, and his piano accompaniments are as effective as they are easy. Yet the songs have in them a wealth of feeling that make them worthy of the best artists.

Three volumes of "Lyrical Pieces," for the piano, composed by Edvard Grieg, edited by Bertha Feinring Tapper. If there are any amateur or professional pianists who do not already possess these universally admired lyrical pieces by Grieg, or who do not have an edition edited and fingered by Bertha Feiring Tapper, who has made a special study of Grieg, we call their attention to these excellent volumes, Nos. 184, 186, 188, of the well known Ditson Edition, recently republished.

Carl Fischer, New York.

Eight songs, words by various authors, music by Hallet Gilberté. An unusually attractive title page makes a good impression before one opens the pages to find the music. The publishers must be congratulated for their artistic production. Hallet Gilberté has written music worthy of the artistic title page. In his "Evening Song," "The Little Red Ribbon," dedicated to Frances Alda, and his "Song of the Canoe," dedicated to Marie Rappold, he has produced works that add lustre to the list of good songs by American composers. They are thoroughly effective for the voice, and their melodies are genuine. There is no straining after effects or any undue elaboration of harmony. Nor are the accompaniments difficult. The three songs we mention have just been issued. They are in the same high class with the first five songs of the eight now published by Carl Fischer. The preceding songs are: "Two Roses," "Les deux roses" (a French version of the first song), "Ah, Love But a Day," "A Maiden's Yea and Nay," "Forever and a Day."

G. Schirmer, New York.

"Gitanjali," song offerings, an album of six songs, words by Rabindranath Tagore, music by John Alden Carpenter.

These are peculiar and interesting song for an audience that is familiar with the most elaborate and modern harmony, and the broken recitative style of melodic declamation. Such music as this would be utterly incomprehensible to an eighteenth century public. But these songs are the legitimate descendants of Berlioz's almost unknown "Nuits d'été" songs. They are certainly well worth the consideration of artists who give song recitals. Musicians, too, will find much interesting harmony in this album.

Schirmer's have published the songs in an unusually artistic style, each page having a decorated border.

LOS ANGELES CONCERTS.

An Orchestral "Pop," Miss Craft's Song Recital and a Concert by the Woman's Lyric Club Are Recent Events.

Los Angeles, Cal., November 14, 1914.

The Lebegott Orchestra gave the second popular concert on Sunday, November 1, at Temple Auditorium. Acceding to numerous requests, M. Laparra repeated the Beethoven concerto given on October 18, and it proved to be another brilliant performance, Mr. Lebegott and the orchestra supporting him well. The new soloist was Marie B. Tiffany, who sang the aria from "Le Cid," "Pleurez, pleurez, mes yeux," in which she was accompanied by the orchestra.

MARCELLA CRAFT'S RECITAL.

Marcella Craft, the California girl, who has established a brilliant European reputation as an opera singer, was heard for the first time in some years. In fact, it might almost be said that this was her first appearance in Los Angeles, as she has not sung here before since becoming a prominent artist. A more trying position is difficult to conceive than for one to return home and make good a big reputation. One perhaps felt a little conscious of this spirit of waiting in the audience—a wishing to prove out the singer—but that Miss Craft won her audience completely there is no doubt. She is innately the actress, and even on the concert programs her rendition of the "Butterfly" arias and the Wolf-Ferarri selections made plain why she has achieved such a triumph in opera. And this in no way minimizing the beautiful work accomplished in her songs. The Italian group was a model of phrasing and nuancing altogether beautiful. The German lieder were delightful and refreshing, both because of being unhackneyed and because of the exquisite rendition. But the consensus of opinion would be that the operatic groups were the crowning feature.

Miss Craft was repeatedly recalled and was very generous with her encores. Friends and admirers heaped her with flowers and the gifted singer has reason to congratulate herself from every point of view. This recital was the first event in the second Philharmonic series.

WOMAN'S LYRIC CLUB.

The first concert by the Woman's Lyric Club was given on Friday evening in Trinity Auditorium, under the direction of J. B. Poulin. The program was pleasing, but the two most ambitions and enjoyable numbers were "O'er the Sea," by D'Indy, and "A Legend of Granada," by Hadley. The first is a beautiful number and was well given. The solo was sung by Mrs. J. I. Moyse, whose voice is very sweet and her diction artistic. The Hadley number was the longest and heaviest on the program. Solos were taken by Mrs. Wiseman, soprano, and Fred G. McPherson, baritone. The Legend contains considerable variety, being brilliant at times and bringing the religious element in strongly at the last. Mr. McPherson was in splendid voice and sang with feeling and fervor. Mrs. Wiseman's lyric soprano was splendidly suited to her solos. Mr. McPherson also contributed a number by Verdi.

If the club failed in spots to reach its usual high standard it was due to the fact that this was the first number of the season and the members have been working only a comparatively short time. Mr. Poulin and Mrs. Robinson came in for a large share of applause and appreciation.

SAINT-SAËNS QUINTET CLUB.

The Saint-Saëns Quintet Club gave its opening evening of chamber music at the Ebell club house, Tuesday evening, October 20. The club was assisted by Mrs. Minne Hance, contralto; Myrtle Ouellet, harpist; R. L. Genter, cornetist, and C. H. Porter, bass. The entire program was devoted to Saint-Saëns, but several unique numbers were featured. Mrs. Hance sang the two arias from "Samson and Deliah," and each number was encored. Especially worthy of mention was the fine work of William Strobridge, pianist of the quintet. The personnel of this group of musicians consists of E. H. Clark, first violin; W. A. Clark, Jr., second violin; Carl Angeloty, viola; Elsa von Grofe Menasco, cellist, and William Strobridge, pianist. The quintet is supported by W. A. Clark, Jr., and its services are gratuitous, no admission ever being charged for their concerts or for their services when contributed toward some good cause.

Pietro A. Yon, Organist and Composer.

Pietro A. Yon will offer the following special program for the Feast of St. Francis Xavier, on Sunday, December 6, at St. Francis Xavier Church, New York: Prelude, second sonata, Rudnick; mass, "Hosanna Filio David," P. A. Yon; Proper of St. Francis Xavier, Gregorian; offertory interlude, "Adagio," P. A. Yon; postlude, "Grand Choeur," Bossi; vespers of the second Sunday of Advent, Gregorian; hymn, Kothe; "Alma Redemptoris," Witt; motet, "Jesus Dulcis," B. O. Klein; "O Sacrum Convivium," Viadana; "Tantum Ergo," Witt.

The second sonata by Rudnick (new), which Mr. Yon is introducing, is an exceptional example of modern organ music for the church and also suitable for concert. The mass, "Hosanna Filio David," is well known all over America as an effective composition, and one which adheres strictly to the rules of the church.

ST. LOUIS HEARS GRAND OPERA.

San Carlo Company Gives Week of Opera in Southern City —Symphony Orchestra Concerts and Many Other Events Make Busy Musical Week.

St. Louis, Mo., November 18, 1914.

The San Carlo singers opened the first week of St. Louis grand opera, November 9, with "Rigoletto." This was "guest night," with Constantino in the tenor role. "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci" were received with delight on "Italian night." Regina Vicarino, coloratura soprano, was the principal singer for "Art League night" in "Traviata." Friday night, "guest night" again, brought forth Constantino, who appeared in the role of Radames in "Aida." Saturday afternoon, we heard the "Tales of Hoffmann," with Viccari and Antola. "Faust," under the auspices of the North St. Louis Business Men's Association, was given Saturday evening before a capacity audience. Monday evening, Mme. Gerville-Réache, the contralto, charmed a large and fastidious audience with her brilliant presentation of the title role in Bizet's "Carmen."

Grand opera will continue through the week.

A Symphony Concert.

The Friday concert of the Symphony Orchestra was greeted as usual by a capacity audience that applauded with vigor. Mme. Sundelius was the assisting soloist. The program opened with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." Mme. Sundelius' first number, Micaela's song, from Bizet's "Carmen," was given in a charming manner; her beautiful voice seemed never more beautiful. Ropartz's symphony, No. 4, C major, was played for the first time here, in the interpretation of which the orchestra showed skilful coloring. Charpentier's "Depuis le Jour," from "Louise," Mme. Sundelius' second number, was given with lovely quality of tone, while fine enunciation was noted also in her encore, Solvereigen.

The concluding number, Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasie, from "Romeo and Juliet," proved the most pleasing of the ensemble selections. The Saturday evening program was a repetition of that given at the Friday matinee.

Sunday "Pop."

The Sunday "Pop" was greeted by a large and enthusiastic audience despite the inclement weather and grand opera week. This month the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, with Hugo Olls as soloist, will play return engagements at the following places: November 23, afternoon and evening, Urbana, Ill.; November 24, Hannibal, Mo.; November 25, afternoon and evening, Missouri University.

Morning Choral Club.

"Members Day" was observed by the Morning Choral Club, at the Wednesday Club auditorium, Thursday morning, on which occasion the organization presented Florence Hinkle, soprano, and Herbert Witherspoon, basso. Miss Hinkle sang with equal ease in the different languages. Her limpid and well controlled voice, together with her charming personality, won immediate favor. Mr. Witherspoon's flawless technic and expressive voice of wide range also made a deep impression upon his hearers.

Mrs. Edward MacDowell in Lecture-Recital.

Theta Chapter, Mu Phi Epsilon (affiliated with the Kroeger School of Music) presents Mrs. Edward MacDowell in a lecture-recital of MacDowell music in the interest of the MacDowell Memorial Association, Monday evening, November 23, at the Wednesday Club auditorium.

Kroeger School of Music Recital.

Pupils of the first grades from the Kroeger School of Music gave a studio recital in the Musical Art Building, Saturday afternoon, November 7. The following participated in the program: Marian Riegler, Dorothy Lears, John Isaacs, Dorothy Peck, Florence Caspari, Stanley Sicher, Frances Sandperl, Ottila Yackey, Harriet Rumsey, Bertha Buck and Vera Eastman.

P. E. O. Musicale.

Chapter O of the P. E. O., Mrs. H. E. Gonter, president, gave an informal musicale at the Hamilton Hotel, October 15. Mrs. Ottmar Moll assisted. Mrs. Moll gave a paper on "Women in Music" and sang some of the solos from "In a Persian Garden," by Liza Lehmann.

Haines-Lichtenstein Recital.

Caroline Elinor Haines will give a piano recital at Henneman Hall, November 25, at 8.15 o'clock, assisted by Victor Lichtenstein, violinist.

Students Recite Song Words.

John Tower's pupils' first studio-instruction recital of the season was given last evening in the Musical Art Building, each pupil reciting the words to be sung before singing them. The following were the participants: Mary Gaines, Lois L. Goff, Mrs. J. Hoffman, John Johnson, Louisa Miller, Mary J. B. Newman, Charles Proetz, Walter Proetz, Louis D. Steding, Ruth Sudhole and Nell C. Trotter. Mr. Towers contributed a short address on "The Responsibilities of the Public Singing."

Apollo Club Concerts.

The executive committee announces that it has secured the following artists for the coming (twenty-first) season, 1914-1915: November 24, Helen Stanley, soprano. January 2, Mabel Rhead, pianist, and Beatrice Harrison, cellist. April 13, 1915, Orville Harrold, tenor. These concerts will be given at the Odeon.

Rubinstein Club.

The Rubinstein Club held the first meeting of the year at Cabanne Branch Library in the Auditorium, on Tuesday, November 10, at 10.30 a. m. Alternate meetings were held at night at 8.15 at the same place. Excellent programs have been prepared for the entire year. The officers of the club are: Mrs. Ottmar Moll, first vice-president; Mrs. George Justison, second vice-president; Magdalin Schiffele, recording secretary; Teresa Finn, National Federation secretary.

New String Quintet.

St. Louis has a new string quintet, the members of which are: Mrs. Berry Mayes, first violin; Gertrude Bell, second violin; Ellen Johnson, viola; Agnes Gray, violin; Clara Meyer, piano. This is the first time in the history of St. Louis that a ladies' quintet has been organized. They played two movements by Malling at the Violinist Guild and are now working on a quintet by Zeckner.

Henneman and Moll Pupils' Recital.

Mary Maiben Allan, contralto; Gertrude Henneman, pianist, and Margaret Allen Hinchey, soprano, gave an interesting program at the Stix, Baer & Fuller Company, which reflected great credit upon their teachers.

Clara Meyer Piano School.

Clara Meyer announces that she has appointed as her assistants Louise Schindler, of St. Louis; Myra De Witt Wilson, of Webster-Kirkwood, and Helen Ely, of St. Charles.

May Birdie Ditzler.

Leginska's New York Press Tributes.

She not only plays with technical mastership, but she has imagination and temperament and sentiment that reaches and appeals. . . . Her pronouncement of the sonata in B flat major, op. 35, was most impressive.—New York Evening World.

Miss Leginska has been heard on several occasions in this city and always with a certain definite interest. Her art is not of the heaven storming type. . . . It is an art which has individuality as well as an unusually large technical equipment. In some of the etudes Miss Leginska treated her hearers to piano playing of real beauty, in which fluency of utterance was paired with loveliness of tone and remarkable skill in gradation. In some of the studies conceived by the larger Chopin she rose to higher levels of dramatic style than she has hitherto reached.—New York Sun.

There is a distinctive charm in listening to music especially composed for the piano, music that illustrates the instrument's resources and capacity. And when the interpreter has taste, temperament and refinement, as was the case yesterday, she deserves and received the appreciation of her auditors. . . . Her technic throughout was impeccable and each selection was read with poetic charm and expression.—New York American.

Mme. Leginska chose an all Chopin program for the display of her talents, playing twenty-four etudes and the sonata in B flat minor. In all of them she showed herself again a remarkable artist and a master of the technical resources of her instrument.

Best of all, she proved that she can play Chopin without the slightest tendency to oversentimentalization, and yet with great richness of feeling. Needless to say, her tone was delightfully warm, and the clarity of her playing and her adjustment of dynamic values were exquisite.

Throughout the recital, Mme. Leginska showed at once a power and a delicacy which were the marks of an artist of the first rank.

There are few women pianists in the concert world of today the equals of this English woman. Yet she does not need the protection of her sex to enable her to stand critical analysis. She is one of the most interesting pianists to be heard in the concert halls today.—New York Tribune.

Mme. Leginska did much that was worth while in the course of her recital. . . . The finale of the sonata, as she played it, was for once mysterious, ominous. Mme. Leginska is a player of temperament and technic.—New York Globe.

Miss Leginska has already shown herself to be an artist of quite unusual quality, a rare and exceptional talent, and in this recital she showed it again. . . . There is a burning intensity in her style, a fiery sweep; her playing is impetuous and hot blooded, full of high lights and deep shadows, yet it can be exquisitely restrained and is not lacking in artistic reticences. Her tone is of great beauty, whether it is in passages of delicacy or of power, or in finely differentiated gradations between these extremes, and the brilliancy and facility of her technic rarely failed her in any of the difficulties that Chopin provided in these compositions.—New York Times.

Miss Leginska has won a sure place in her field. She is a woman of much temperament and ability, and her playing gives evidence of faithful study and thought. Her performance of the etudes was interspersed with brilliancy, coloring, skillful technical execution and emotion. She has an individual manner of doing her work that claims the constant attention and approval of her hearers.—New York World. (Advertisement.)

San Antonio Music Festival.

H. W. B. Barnes has been chosen musical director of the San Antonio (Tex.) Musical Festival Association. Nat M. Washer is the president. Guarantors have been secured and three concerts have been arranged, the first to be given at the Majestic Theatre in January. The following relative to the association appeared in the October 24 issue of the San Antonio Light:

The San Antonio Musical Festival Association, which will present its first annual mid-winter musical festival at the Majestic Theatre the third week of January, has been organized formally and the first steps have been taken for its incorporation under the laws of the State.

Nat M. Washer has been elected to the presidency, Harry L. Miller is vice-president, Dr. I. S. Kahn, secretary, and J. H. Savage, treasurer. These men, with the following, make up the executive committee of the association: Judge A. W. Seeligson, W. B. Tuttle, Rev. Philip Cook, John M. Bennett, Jr., Judge James R. Davis, T. L. Conroy, A. B. Weakley, Edward Raymond, J. B. Lewright, Lafayette Ward, Sam G. Bell, Walter Springall and Ernest J. Altgelt.

The selection of H. W. B. Barnes, choirmaster at St. Mark's Episcopal Church and director of the San Antonio Oratorio Society, now the Festival Chorus, as musical director of the association has been approved and his plan for a three-concert festival, to include a production of Handel's "Messiah," a miscellaneous concert of choral and orchestral music, with soloists, and a symphony concert has been indorsed.

At an enthusiastic meeting held this week it was voted to make the San Antonio Musical Festival Association a permanent organization for the support and production of similar high grade musical attractions in San Antonio. However, the organization will be without capital stock, but a list of fifty guarantors has been secured who have pledged themselves to give, if necessary, to the support of the first mid-winter festival.

The festival this winter will feature an orchestra and soloists of national reputation, supported by a chorus of San Antonio people numbering 300 or more.

At a meeting to be held in the near future, an advisory board of 100 prominent women of San Antonio and other cities and towns of Southwest Texas will be organized to aid in working out the details of the festival.

The chorus, which is well above 300 in membership, is to be put to work on the special numbers to be sung in the first concert of the festival. Thursday afternoon rehearsals for the women of the chorus will be resumed in the near future.

Jenny Dufau's First Concert Tour.

Starting immediately after her Chicago concert, Jenny Dufau gave recitals through Ohio, North Carolina, South Carolina, Missouri, Alabama, Kansas. She then returned to Chicago for the Emanuel benefit with the Campanini forces. She is now on a second and more extensive tour, to last about three months, which will only be interrupted by a short visit in Chicago to give a second recital. This second tour will include a large number of important cities where Miss Dufau has not yet appeared in the capacity of recitalist, although she is already known in almost all of them through her appearances with the Chicago Grand Opera Company in previous years.

Miss Dufau is looking back upon her first tour, which might well be termed a Southern trip, with sincere satisfaction. Coming unknown and quite unheralded, she met everywhere in the Southern States with the most cordial reception, and the best proof of her success is evidenced by the numerous return engagements that have already been booked. A feature hitherto unknown to Miss Dufau was the singing in some colleges for girls (she does not think that boys are so appreciative, or, as she puts it, "they must first be tamed"). At Raleigh, N. C., the sentiment became so strong during the concert that after the "grown-ups" had gone, girls and artist had a second concert, quite private, and, of course, as they were practically working against the time schedule, a thousand times nicer than the official thing. In short, this season, which began with such grief and sorrow for Miss Dufau, promises to be one of her best. She is congratulating herself upon the choice of Charles Lurvey, an "atmospheric" accompanist of rare talent.

Southerners to Hear Rogers.

Francis Rogers, the baritone, will give a song recital in Lynchburg, Va., on Saturday evening, December 5, when he will present an interesting program.

Julia Culp's Recital, December 10.

Julia Culp, mezzo soprano, will give her first New York recital at Carnegie Hall on Thursday afternoon, December 10.

NEWS FROM VARIOUS CITIES

Fort Worth.

Fort Worth, Tex., October 31, 1914.

The musical season was formally inaugurated in Fort Worth on October 29, when the Harmony Club presented Louise Homer as the first artist on the concert course for the winter. Mrs. Edwin Lapham, at the piano, gave excellent support. Mme. Homer was presented with a large basket of yellow chrysanthemums which bore a card of welcome from the music lovers of the city. A reception was held at the Westbrook Hotel on the evening preceding the concert, at which a large number of musical people greeted the singer and her accompanist, Mrs. Lapham.

A recital by Yves Nat, the new director of the piano department at Texas Woman's College, was an event of much importance in the musical life of the city. Mr. Nat will be remembered by MUSICAL COURIER readers as the young French pianist whose brilliant work on the last Tetrazzini tour elicited such favorable comments from critics on all occasions. The Texas Woman's College feels indeed fortunate in securing him as the head of its piano department. At his initial recital Mr. Nat gave a program of great brilliancy, which was rendered with the finish and assurance of a master. For his opening number he chose the Beethoven sonata, op. 57—andante con moto and allegro—giving it a dignified, impressive reading. The Schumann fantasy pieces, which followed, were gems. The Chopin group included prelude, 15; etude, 5; nocturne, 15, and polonaise, 6, op. 53. The "Tannhäuser" March, Wagner-Liszt, and the second rhapsody, Liszt, which followed, were brilliantly played.

At the meeting of the State Federation of Women's Club in Galveston next month Fort Worth will be represented on the musical program by Helen Fouts Cahoon, voice director of Texas Christian University, and Mrs. John F. Lyons, president of the Harmony Club. Mrs. Cahoon will sing on the Fine Arts program and Mrs. Lyons will talk on "Music as a Social Force."

◈ ◈ ◈

An interesting program was given recently by Sam S. Losh, the Fort Worth pianist and baritone, at Nocona, Tex. A large audience was most enthusiastic in its applause for Mr. Losh's splendid work, both as singer and pianist. His numbers for voice included "A Heart from Kerry," Beverly; bacchanal, Chopin; "The Asra," Rubinstein; "Gypsy John," Glay; Mohacs Field," Korbay; "Since You Went Away," Johnston; "The Ringers" and "The Little Grey Home in the West," Lohr. The piano numbers were polonaise in A flat, Chopin; "The Wedding Day," Greig; barcarolle, Godard; "Etincelles," Moszkowski; "La Fileuse," Raff-Henselt, and a group by Fort Worth composers, "Ingeborg," by Carl Venth; etude in C major, by Carl Beutel, and "Concert Waltz Bravura," by Sam Losh.

Oscar Seagle, the American baritone and teacher, spent the week of October 18 in Fort Worth as the guest of his friend, R. B. Bishop. Mr. Seagle's visit, as he himself put it, was purely for pleasure and in no sense professional. For many years Seagle and Bishop have been warm personal friends and for equally as many years they have promised themselves the pleasure of a visit and a hunting trip together. Business has always interfered until this year when the opportunity came between Seagle's Colorado and Texas dates, so both the visit and the hunting trip materialized. Mr. Seagle has had many concert dates in Fort Worth, and his many admirers were anxious to hear him sing again, but he insisted that this was not a professional visit. An opportunity to meet and talk with him, however, was given by Mr. Bishop and his charming wife at a reception held at their home. To the great delight of all present Mr. Seagle sang a number of songs—favorites of his friends. He was accompanied by Yves Nat and Frank Bibb.

◈ ◈ ◈

The following pupils of Thomas Holt Hubbard were heard recently in a satisfactory program: Mrs. Edwin H. Neu, Mrs. Joe M. Strupper, Mrs. John Cassidy, Mrs. I. A. Withers, Mrs. A. S. Bradley, Emma Griffiths, Lillian Hamilton, Lucy Dunwoody, Ethel St. Clair and Mermod Jaccard.

Hartford.

Hartford, Conn., November 13, 1914.

On November 4 the Hartford Grade Teachers' Club presented Henry S. Gideon, of Boston, in a lecture-recital, assisted by Cara Sapin, contralto of the Boston Opera Company. Contemporaneous opera was the subject for the evening and the lecturer discussed briefly the Russian, French, Italian and German schools. The influence of the folksong and church music on Russian opera was illustrated at the piano and excerpts from "Boheme" and the "Parsifal" vorspiel were played in a pleasing manner. Besides those illustrated, the operas of Verdi, Puccini, Montemezzi, Debussy, Dukas, Wagner, Humperdinck and Strauss were touched upon. Mme. Sapin gave a dramatic rendition of an aria from "Samson and Delilah" and also the familiar "Voce di donna," from "Gioconda."

Morris Perlmutter, the local pianist, gave the first of a series of three recitals at Unity Hall last Tuesday evening to a good sized audience. The growth of this young artist has been remarkable. His aptness in things musical is shown by this incident while Perlmutter was at school. In a certain chorus number he used to play a second part for piano. Once, instead of following this custom, Ralph Baldwin, supervisor of music, who was conducting, gave the baton to his second pianist and himself played the second part. The program on Tuesday evening follows: Fantasia con Fuga, A minor, Bach; andante, F major, Beethoven; "Moments Musicaux," op. 94, 3, 2, Schubert; phantasy, op. 17, Schumann; etudes, op. 25, 1, 7; scherzo, B flat minor; fantasia, op. 49, Chopin. Those who heard Perlmutter last year can but note the improvement shown. He produces a fine singing tone from the piano, his phrasing is good and his technic, always admirable, is much cleaner cut than when last heard in recital.

Felice Lyne, the young soprano, visited Hartford on November 12, under the auspices of the Musical Club. Her program included

"He proved himself a well rounded artist by his interpretation of the Bach Chaconne. The infinite variety and sincere beauty of his tone was well brought out in this composition and the three dances were very charmingly played with rare grace and finish."

"Caro Nome" ("Rigoletto"), "Shadow Song" ("Dinorab"), valse ("Romeo et Juliette"), and several groups of songs.

H. D. PRENTICE.

San Diego.

San Diego, Cal., November 1, 1914.

The musical activities of this city have been improved by the amalgamation of the Mendelssohn and MacDowell Clubs, both of whom last year had separate organizations and expended much unnecessary strength. The new club formed of the two has justified the course of the directors and has already presented two splendid programs. The first of these introduced Mercedes Ciesielska, a young soprano from Los Angeles. This initial concert was a delightful event, the singer (who is a pupil of Jaroslaw de Zielinski, of Los Angeles) charming her audience with her voice and quaint mannerisms. The second affair of this club was of more varied quality and interest, reintroducing Gretchen Steinbach, pianist; Dean Blake and Gladys Burch, violinist.

One of the advances of the season has been the entry of the music Teachers' Association into local musical affairs. Mrs. H. D. Farnham is the secretary and is enthusiastic regarding his future. The State meeting, held here last summer, was an unqualified success and, among other unusual things, provided a balance in the bank which is now the nucleus of an entertainment fund.

◈ ◈ ◈

A number of outside artists are being brought here to give recitals. Grace Widney Mabee, of Los Angeles, was the first selected, and she sang a number of Gertrude Ross' compositions, the latter accompanying the singer.

Wesley Peterson, aged nine years, appeared in recital for his own benefit and musically for the benefit of many of his listeners. The affair was held at the San Diego Club House, October 23, and the program was a varied and ambitious one. This remarkable boy is a pupil of Florence Schinkel Gray, and has a scholarship at the Bishop's School at La Jolla, Cal.

The San Diego Symphony Orchestra began its series of concerts last Friday, under the baton of B. Roscoe Schryock. Very ambitious programs are planned for this season. Willhelm Kreutz, pianist, was the soloist and played the Liszt E flat concerto. The next concert will be given on December 11.

TYNDALL GRAY.

Portland, Oregon.

445 Sherlock Building,
Portland, Ore., October 25, 1914.

Last evening the Apollo Club, William H. Boyer, director, assisted by Julia Claussen, the contralto, opened its seventh season at the Heilig Theatre. Mme. Claussen, who was here last year with the Chicago Grand Opera Company, offered works by Wagner, Saint-Saëns, Sjogren, Berger, Grieg, MacDermid and Tuckfield. She sang with thrilling majesty and was recalled many times. Director Boyer and his male singers threw themselves into their work with spirit, sincerity and fervor. Schubert's "Omnipotence," the final number, was sung by the club and Mme. Claussen. Truly, it was an excellent concert and must be registered as such. The audience filled the large theatre. Sibyl Sammis-MacDermid, the Chicago soprano, will appear at the club's second concert, February 8, 1915.

Recently an interesting organ recital was given under the auspices of the Oregon Chapter of the American Guild of Organists, when these musicians appeared in the Trinity Episcopal Church: Martha B. Reynolds, Annette Stoddard and William R. Boone, with Delphine Marx, contralto, assisting. All gave much satisfaction. The officers of the Oregon Chapter, which numbers thirty organists, are: Frederick W. Goodrich, dean; Carl Denton, sub-dean; Daniel H. Wilson, secretary, and James A. Bamford, treasurer.

Some sixty members of the Portland Symphony Orchestra attended its third annual banquet, which was held in the Crystal Room of the Benson Hotel, on Friday afternoon, October 16. Mose Christensen, the genial president of the organization, was toastmaster. Notwithstanding the fact that the MUSICAL COURIER correspondent is not a member of the orchestra, he received an invitation to the banquet. Much good fellowship prevailed and all enjoyed the big treat.

◈ ◈ ◈

The Musicians' Club held its first luncheon of the season recently and elected the following officers for 1914-1915: William R. Boone, president; Frederick W. Goodrich, vice president; Daniel H. Wilson, secretary; Waldemar Lind, treasurer; Carl Denton, George E. Jeffery and W. Gifford Nash, executive board. The club, at the request of Mr. Goodrich, passed a resolution favoring the federation of the officers of the following local organizations: The Musicians' Club, the Portland Symphony Orchestra, the Musicians' Mutual Association, Local No. 99, A. F. of M.; the Oregon Chapter of the American Guild of Organists, the Monday Musical Club, and the MacDowell Club.

Portland's popular trio—Susie Fennell Pipes, violinist; Ferdinand Konrad, cellist, and J. R. Hutchison, pianist—will give another series of concerts at the Museum of Art, beginning November 7. Three concerts will be given before Christmas.

The Columbia Singing Club, a Swedish organization, will visit San Francisco next June, where the Swedish singers of the Pacific Coast will hold a music festival.

The students of the Lincoln High School have been invited to attend the next rehearsal of the Portland Symphony Orchestra.

Orchestras have been organized in many of the public schools of Portland.

Later Portland News.

Portland, Ore., November 7, 1914.

A musical treat was vouchsafed the writer and those who attended the opening concert of the Portland Symphony Orchestra, November 1. Harold Bayley conducted the organization. No end of praise is due Mr. Bayley and the orchestra for the masterful interpretation of the program, which included Schubert's C major symphony, Thomas' "Mignon" overture, "Wotan's Farewell," from "Die Walküre," Wagner, and other works. Grieg's "Evening in the Mountains," a dainty musical confection for oboe, horn and strings, evoked much enthusiasm. Frederick Starke, formerly of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, who played the oboe solo in the Grieg number, and Charles Walrath, who offered the horn solo, deserve special mention. The organization, following the rule of the last four years, did not present a soloist. A large and demonstrative audience heard the performance. This orchestra is made up of fifty-seven

An all-MacDowell program was offered at the last meeting of the MacDowell Club. Mrs. Thomas Carrick Burke, president of the organization, read a paper on MacDowell. Edna Blake, pianist, played three numbers. Imogen Harding Brodie, contralto, and Delphine Marx, contralto, contributed several selections. Anne Shannon Monroe told of a summer she spent at the MacDowell home.

San Antonio.

San Antonio, Tex., November 10, 1914.

Monday, October 26, the American baritone, Oscar Seagle, appeared in concert here, under the local direction of Oscar J. Fox, organist and teacher. Mr. Seagle's program, from the first to the last number, was received enthusiastically by the large audience. He was obliged to repeat several songs, and gave the prologue from "I Pagliacci," by special request. Frank Bibb, Seagle's accompanist, gave four numbers by modern French composers, which were greatly enjoyed.

January 11, 1915, Mr. Fox will present in recital Florence Hinkle, soprano.

The rehearsing of "The Messiah," under the direction of H. W. B. Barnes, has been continuing for a number of weeks. The chorus already numbers nearly three hundred. The San Antonio Musical Festival Association has been formed, with leading men of the city as officers. Famous artists will be brought here to sing the solo parts, and the orchestra will be one of national reputation. Three concerts will comprise, one orchestral, one of mixed choruses and solos, and the third one "The Messiah."

The Tuesday Musical Auxiliary Chorus has been rehearsing since October 1. At present the chorus is studying a dramatic scene, "The Death of Joan d'Arc," by Bemberg. The soloist has not as yet been chosen. This chorus will give one program at the Tuesday Musical Club, one invitational recital, and one recital for charity.

The Tuesday Musical Club has held two meetings this season, with excellent programs, led by Mrs. James Chalkley, Mrs. Bertrand, Mrs. Snider, Mrs. Flannery, Mrs. Stanley Winters. The subject for the next program will be "Grand Opera," led by Mrs. Fred Jones and Mme. D. Acngna.

Later San Antonio.

San Antonio, Texas, November 18, 1914.

On November 12, the Philharmonic Orchestra gave two concerts, matinee and evening, under the direction of Arthur Claasen, recently of New York, but now of San Antonio. The orchestra has made marked progress under Mr. Claasen's supervision, for the program was a difficult one. The selections which seemed to please most were four numbers from the "Peer Gynt Suite," Grieg, and the second rhapsody, Liszt. The orchestra consists of amateurs, semi-professionals and professionals. Rose Brack, soprano, a San Antonio girl, was the soloist. She sang "The Song of the Page," from "Huguenots," Meyerbeer; "Ave Maria," Gounod, with violin obligato played by Wilhelm Marx, concert master of the orchestra, harp obligato by Octavia Bullis, and organ accompaniment by Mr. Claasen. Miss Brack is the possessor of a beautiful soprano voice of great volume and range.

"In a Persian Garden," by Liza Lehmann, was recently given here by four teachers of singing. They were Mrs. C. C. Higgins, soprano; Elsa Harms, contralto; Charles Cameron Bell, tenor; Gilbert Schramm, bass. The concert was a decided success, as the participants are the possessors of beautiful voices. The concert was given for the benefit of Christ Episcopal Church.

MRS. STANLEY WINTERS.

Lafayette.

Lafayette, Ind., November 18, 1914.

Lafayette's musical season was formally opened Tuesday evening, November 10, by a concert given by Enrico Aresoni, dramatic tenor, and Martin Bruhl, pianist, at the Victoria Theatre. The concert was the first of a series of three given under the auspices of the Lafayette Oratorio Society. The two musicians shared honors, each thoroughly delighting his hearers and receiving an ovation. Mr. Aresoni's admirably selected numbers gave his hearers a good conception of his voice and all its possibilities. His opening group of songs, "At Dawning" (Cadman), "My Heart Is a Lute" (Woodman), and "Hymn to the Night" (Campbell-Tipton), revealed the richness and beauty of his voice. For his second number he sang the aria from "Tosca," "E Lucevan le Stelle" (Puccini). He also sang an aria from the "Girl of the Golden West" (Puccini), and for his closing number he gave with dramatic fervor the arioso from "Pagliacci," Canio's lament (Leoncavallo). Mr. Bruhl made a distinct impression as a solo pianist and accompanist and contributed a large share to the evening's entertainment. For his first group he played "With Naïve Tenderness" (MacDowell), "Canzonetta Salvator Rosa" (Liszt) and "Fireworks" (Debussy), and for the closing group he played "Benediction to God in the Solitude" (Liszt), "Chimes" (Oldberg) and "Rakoczy March" (Liszt).

"How to Listen to Music" was the theme of an interesting lecture-recital given by Robert J. Ring, of the piano department of the Lafayette Conservatory of Music, before the students of the Jefferson High School, at the convocation hour, November 14. For forty-five minutes Mr. Ring held the undivided attention of some five hundred boys and girls. He explained the three elements of music, rhythm, melody and harmony, and illustrated each element in a pleasing manner. He said that to become familiar with music makes it more enjoyable and urged that the young people take advantage of hearing great singers, violinists, pianists and orchestras whenever the opportunity should present itself. For technical display, Mr. Ring played a brilliant octave study by Czerny and the "Staccato Caprice" by Vogrich. Other numbers of his program included etude, G sharp minor (Chopin), "Witches Dance" (MacDowell), "To a Wild Rose" (MacDowell) and prelude (Chopin).

Dayton.

Dayton, Ohio, November 2, 1914.

On Friday evening last occurred the first of the six concerts which will be given in the Civic Music League Symphony Course. The Paulist Choristers of Chicago, under the direction of Father Finn, were the attraction that brought together an audience of nearly three thousand delighted listeners. The remaining five concerts will be given by John McCormack, November 19; Alma Gluck, December 19; Josef Lhevinne, January 18; New York Philharmonic Orchestra, March 15, and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, April 12. For the entire six concerts the League charges but $3.50. Following is the board of managers: B. B. Thresher, president; Houston Lowe, first vice-president; W. L. Blumenschein, second vice-president; Mrs. E. M. Wood, third vice-president; Ethel Stoddard, fourth vice-president; William G. Frizell, fifth vice-president; Mrs. Walter D. ◈ ◈ ◈

Mme. Schumann-Heink was heard here on October 16. The ever popular contralto was greeted by a large audience. Mme. Schumann-Heink's recital was the first of a series to be given under the management of A. F. Thiele. The second concert, set for October 27, has been postponed, owing to Dr. Kunwald's late return from Europe. The remaining are given below: Monday, November 9, violin and song recital by Maud Powell, violinist, and Enrico Aresoni, dramatic tenor; Tuesday, November 24, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Ernst Kunwald conducting and Henri Scott, baritone, in an operatic program of Wagnerian music; Monday, January 4, Kittie Cheatham in her interpretations of songs of childhood and negro melodies; Friday, January 15, The New York Symphony Orchestra and Alexander Saslavsky, soloist; Tuesday, February 2, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Ernst Kunwald conducting in program of American composers (soloist to be selected); Monday, February 8, Fannie Bloomfield Zeissler, pianist, in recital; Wednesday, February 24, The Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Emil Oberhoffer conducting; soloist, Cornelius van Vliet, famous Dutch cellist; Tuesday, April 6, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Ernst Kunwald conducting in a popular program (soloist to be selected).

Louis Waldemar Sprague gave an interesting impromptu talk on music and music study before the general assembly in the auditorium of Steele High School, Monday morning.

The Dayton Choral Society has begun rehearsals for its third season under the direction of Urban A. Deger, organist, teacher and choral director. The concerts will include "The Messiah," to be given on Christmas evening, and it is planend to give Elgar's "Apostles" early in the spring. The chorus started work with more than one hundred voices and the membership is still growing.

Ann Arbor.

Ann Arbor, Mich., November 4, 1914.

The first number on the pre-festival Choral Union concert series at Ann Arbor, Mich., was given by Mme. Gadski in Hill Auditorium. Mme. Gadski is always welcome in Ann Arbor, and last evening she was greeted by a capacity house. She was in excellent voice and her program was delightfully given. She was obliged to respond to several encores. Walter G. Charmbury, who played the accompaniments and also appeared in a couple of solo numbers, added much to the evening's entertainment. He is an excellent musician and a most sympathetic accompanist. The next number on the Choral Union series will be given by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, under Leopold Stokowski, December 2.

Thursday afternoon, November 5, the second concert by members of the faculty of the University School of Music will be held in Hill Auditorium. The program will be given by the School of Music Quartet: S. P. Lockwood, first violin; Mrs. S. P. Lockwood, second violin; A. J. Whitmire, viola, and W. E. Parker, cello; Mrs. George B. Rhead, piano, and Theodore Harrison, baritone.

◈ ◈ ◈

The date of Ferruccio Busoni's recital has been changed from November 11 to January 14.

The work of the University School of Music has opened most auspiciously with a large increase in attendance and an unusually large number of advanced students. A goodly number of professionals, who were prevented from European study on account of the general war, have come to Ann Arbor for special work under heads of departments.

The local musical season is now well under way, recitals and concerts by resident and visiting artists occurring with frequency. The Redpath Lyceum Bureau is conducting a course of ten events this season, several of which are of a musical nature. The variety of attractions offered, their excellence, and the low prices of admission have made the course very popular, so that the artists have had the satisfaction of appearing before large audiences. The musical events in the series thus far have been Mme. Schumann-Heink, Marcus Kellerman and the David Duggan Grand Opera Company.

Under the management of Evelyn Hopper, George Hamlin, the tenor, appeared in recital at the Brandeis Theatre on the afternoon of November 5 and made a fine impression. Mr. Hamlin's program gave great pleasure, no small part of which was due to the excellence of the accompaniments played by James Whittaker.

Two recitals were given here last week by the contralto, Mme. Gerville-Réache, the first for the Nebraska State Teachers' Association, and the second for the general public. They were held at the local auditorium and were managed by Blanche Sorenson, who thus re-entered the managerial field after an absence of several years.

◈ ◈ ◈

Assisted by Dr. B. R. MacHatton, reader, and Cecil W. Berryman, accompanist, Alice MacKenzie gave a Lieder Abend last week at the Y. W. C. A. Auditorium. Miss MacKenzie has recently opened a studio here, and on this, her first public appearance, succeeded in making a decidedly favorable impression. She has a soprano voice of wide range and good quality, and showed by her work that she has made a careful study of the singer's art.

MacDowell's "Keltic" sonata was featured by Martin W. Bush in his annual piano recital, given last evening at the First Baptist Church. Other numbers played by Mr. Bush were Liszt's fantasie and fugue on the name B-A-C-H, an intermezzo and a scherzo by Brahms, and a modern French group. Two brilliant transcriptions by Liszt and Taussig brought the program to a close.

◈ ◈ ◈

In the course of the past fortnight the home of George A. Joslyn has been the scene of a number of musical affairs occasioned by the presence of Archer Gibson, the New York organist.

Luella Anderson, late of Brussels, where she was correspondent of the MUSICAL COURIER, has recently opened a studio for violin playing in the city. Miss Anderson announces a recital at the First Baptist Church early in December.

Emily Weeks, the new director of music at Brownell Hall, a local girls' school, gave an introductory piano recital there last month. Her program included Chopin's F minor fantasie, a nocturne, polonaise, and the A flat ballade, also numbers by MacDowell, Debussy, Rachmaninoff and Wagner-Liszt.

Marie Mikova has returned from Paris, where she has spent several years in study of the piano, and expects to remain in Omaha indefinitely. She will be heard in recital in the near future.

◈ ◈ ◈

The Tuesday Morning Musical Club opened its season recently with a recital by Rafael Navas, pianist, of Wichita, Kan.

Louise Jansen Wylie, of this city, gave a recital before the Matinee Musical Club, of Lincoln, Neb., on Monday of last week.

Memphis.

Memphis, Tenn., November 25, 1914.

Energy and enthusiasm have marked the beginning of the Beethoven Club's work for this season, and while all of the plans for the year have not been perfected everything points to a satisfactory and artistic season. Mrs. David L. Griffith, president, has assumed her duties in a business like way, and is receiving much encouragement from old as well as new members. Mrs. Griffith is a thorough musician, being one of the leading voice teachers of Memphis, and soprano soloist of Calvary Church, and the club anticipates a splendid year's work under her administration. One of the interesting features to be introduced by the musical culture department will be a series of study classes, consisting of musical history, the operas old and modern composers. Lectures will be given by the different members of the club, and the subjects illustrated in a novel and instructive manner. Through the courtesy of the O. K. Houck Piano Company, these meetings are being held in their concert hall, 102 South Main street. The club presented these four artists in joint recital at the Lyceum Theatre: Myrtle Elvyn, pianist; Enrico Aresoni, dramatic tenor; Irene Jonani, soprano; Martin Bruhl, accompanist. Myrtle Elvyn, who was heard here last season under the auspices of the Beethoven Club, was warmly welcomed, receiving enthusiastic applause after each number, the audience standing and insisting upon her responding, which she did in her own gracious way. Much interest was shown in the appearance of Enrico Aresoni. Each number was a delight, and after his rendition of "Canio's Lament" from "Pagliacci," he was recalled again and again, finally responding with the "Rigoletto" aria. Martin Bruhl accompanied in a thoroughly artistic manner. He played entirely from memory. Irene Jonani proved very pleasing, and Birdie Chamberlain, who accompanied her, showed herself well qualified to be one of the club's official accompanists.

The Memphis Glee Club composed of nearly fifty men under the direction of Ernest F. Hawke, choirmaster and organist of Grace Church, and the Ladies' Glee Club of forty voices, will give a joint recital at the Goodwyn Institute, November 17. The program includes numbers for full choruses and a number of selections for each organization.

Grand Rapids.

Grand Rapids, Mich., November 16, 1914.

Never has Grand Rapids shown more interest in music than now. The St. Cecelia Society has outlined an acceptable course of music for the coming year. Unusual interest is manifest in the regular meetings. The student division is very much awake under the leadership of Mrs. George Dennis. On November 6, Harriet Story MacFarlane, who has made a success of student work in the Detroit Tuesday Club, addressed the class. Mrs. MacFarlane aroused new interest in the student division, and inspired the class to greater work this coming year. The class in "The Development of Music" under the leadership of Cornelia R. Hopkins, is well attended, and a request has been sent in for the work to be repeated. The "Poetry Motive in Music," under Charlotte Hughes, has proven instructive. The purpose of this class is to study poetry in its relation to music. Readings are given in the original and in translation, by natives of each country. A live interest is growing in the committee work for civic music. The first free public concert under the auspices of the Civic Music Committee was given in the St. Cecelia Auditorium Sunday afternoon, November 1.

Leo Sowerbey is giving a series of "Modern Music Talks" at the Ladies' Literary Club. Mr. Sowerbey is a Grand Rapids boy, young in years, but mature in thought.

◈ ◈ ◈

The tickets are now on sale for the orchestral concerts to be given at the High School Auditorium. This is an attractive course, including the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Fritz Kreisler, and the Cincinnati Orchestra.

The next attraction booked in the "Mary Free Bed" course is Alma Gluck, soprano, and Leon Rennay, French baritone, at Powers Treatre, December 10.

Charles Wakefield Cadman and the Princess Tsianina Redfeather were heard in an interesting program of Cadman works at the St. Cecelia Auditorium, Wednesday evening, November 4. They found many friends awaiting this return engagement, as they were heard with such favor here last year, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Kelsey.

◈ ◈ ◈

John McCormack's first appearance on his return to America was in Grand Rapids. His voice seemed never better and he sang to a capacity house.

Primary Course in Ear Training and Melody Writing
By BESSIE WILLIAMS SHERMAN. Price, 35c.
Simple and explicit directions for training the ear and establishing an understanding of melody with a class of little children—to be used in connection with a small set of Piano studies by the same author, "On the Road to Toneland."
What the Montessori method is in other branches of work with the child, this course is for music—the child acquires a knowledge of the scale, intervals, rhythm, accent, cadences, etc., etc., quite unconsciously, just as he earlier learned to talk—with no conscious effort. Confusing technical terms have been avoided—in their place words have been used which are in keeping with appropriate little melody-stories which are all that is visible to the child of the real study he is making.

MUSICAL COURIER

VOL. LXIX.—NO. 23. NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1914. WHOLE NO. 1811.

BERLIN'S DEMAND FOR CONCERTS UNDIMINISHED.

Box Office Is Not Suffering During War Times—Russian Conductor and Tenor Cordially Received—Many Famous Artists Heard—Beethoven the Most Popular of Composers—Carl Flesch's Plans.

Berlin, November 6, 1914.

The musical life of Berlin since my last writing to you has presented many interesting features. Our two great operatic institutions, the Berlin Royal Opera and the Charlottenburg Opera, both having been giving well attended nightly performances at normal prices. Rudolf Krasselt, one of the principal three conductors of the Charlottenburg Opera, who now is at the front, has been decorated with the Iron Cross for bravery on the battle field. Ignatz Waghalter is conducting again and in German uniform. Waghalter, who was a Russian subject, was not allowed to appear, so he took the oath of allegiance to the German colors, which is practically identical with becoming naturalized. He now is permitted to sit in the conductor's chair again as a "Preussischer Kapellmeister" in uniform. The Charlottenburg Opera is giving a very successful performance of the "Ring."

Siegfried Wagner Concert.

The public is always interested in seeing the son of Richard Wagner and the grandson of Franz Liszt. To be sure, he offers nothing original either as a conductor or as a composer, but he is an interesting personality. He gave a concert for the benefit of the war relief fund, which was highly successful. The large hall of the Philharmonie was crowded with a distinguished audience. Two novelties by Siegfried Wagner figured on the program. "Glaube," an entre-act to his opera, "Der Haidenkönig" (The Heathen King) is a well sounding, smoothly flowing composition, but very harmless in content. More applause was bestowed upon the other novelty entitled "Fahnenschwur" for male chorus and orchestra, a bombastic and "popular" piece, massive in its effect, although commonplace in its ideas.

The rest of the program was made up with compositions of Richard Wagner and consisted of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the "Meistersinger" vorspiel, "Wotan's Abschied," and the "Vorspiel" and "Liebestod," from "Tristan," four of the most popular numbers written by the concert giver's father. Vocal soloists were Frau Hofgren-Waag and Bronsgeest, both of the Royal Opera. The male chorus of the Berlin Cathedral under Hugo Riedel sang with great fire and precision in the "Fahnenschwur."

Flesch and Schnabel Sonata Evening.

On the same evening in the neighboring Beethoven Hall, Flesch and Schnabel played Beethoven sonatas in D major, E minor, and A major (op. 47). These two artists also played before a crowded house. As the season progresses, I am more and more astonished at the public patronage of concerts. The firm of Bote & Bock, where the greater part of concert tickets are on sale, reports that the demand for tickets for all the important concerts is just as great now as it ever has been in times of peace. There is, happily, however, one great difference between this and other former music seasons—the mediocrities and inferior debutants have all been weeded out. The public knows that when it goes to a concert now it will hear something really worth while. Carl Flesch and Arthur Schnabel played magnificently and with a perfect ensemble. What I heard of their performance could be measured only by the very highest artistic standards.

First Elite Concert.

The Philharmonie was well filled, although not sold out as in former years at the first Elite Concert, which was given by the Concert Direction Sachs, with the assistance of Emil Sauer, Willy Burmester, and Eva von der Osten, of the Dresden Royal Opera. Sauer played two groups of soli, closing with Liszt's fifteenth rhapsody ("Rakoczky March"), revealing all his old time polish, refinement and charm. Burmester, who is in fine form, gave a rousing performance of Bruch's G minor concerto. Later he was heard in a group of classical pieces in his own arrangement and in the final number in Sarrasate's "Zigeunerweisen," which he played with brilliant virtuosity. Eva von der Osten sang Schubert's "Allmacht" with dramatic effect and later three effective lieder by Hans Hermann, in which she had the assistance of the composer at the piano.

Slezak Sings.

A great crowd assembled at the Philharmonie last Friday, when Leo Slezak was heard in a program of arias and lieder. The favorite tenor was in fine voice, and his interpretation of the lieder made an imposing impression. With the remarkable vocal material at his command, Slezak is an extraordinary singer. He had the assistance of Paul Schramm, the pianist, who gave a refined performance of Mozart's E major sonata.

Fiedler and the Ninth Symphony.

Berlin's largest music hall was again filled at the first of the series of four concerts, which Max Fiedler has announced. The program was well calculated to draw out the masses since it consisted of Schubert's "Unfinished" and Beethoven's ninth symphonies. Fiedler gave an admirable rendition of both works. His interpretation of the "Ninth" is quite different from that of Nikisch, but it was a conscientious and praiseworthy performance. He had the assistance of the Bruno Kittel Choir in the finale, which acquitted itself very creditably. The solo quartet was sung by Mrs. de Jong and van Eycken and Messrs. Meder and Selig. George Meder, by the way, a most excellent tenor, is an American.

Elena Gerhardt, Leo Blech and Wüllner.

Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony was also the principal instrumental work of a concert given by Leo Blech, the well known conductor of the Royal Opera, with the assistance of Elena Gerhardt and Ludwig Wüllner as soloists. Blech gave an excellent reading of the symphony, although one missed the sweet melancholy, the dreamy poetry, that pervades the work. The conductor was much more in his element in the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel and in the "Kaisermarsch," which brought the program to a close. Elena Gerhardt scored a pronounced success with arias by Gluck and Handel and with three of the most popular Richard Strauss lieder. She was in admirable voice. Wüllner did not sing on this occasion, but was heard in recitations by Schiller, Goethe, and Lillienkron. With his temperamental and inspiring delivery he roused the public to the highest pitch of enthusiasm.

An Aristocratic Occasion.

On October 31 a concert was given in Beethoven Hall that was largely attended by the aristocracy of Berlin, partly because it was given under the patronage of the Prinzessin von Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, the wife of the Austrian ambassador in Berlin, nee Archduchess of Austria, but also partly because of the superior artists who assisted. For the aristocrats of Germany, let it be understood, are for the most part very musical. One frequently finds remarkable performers on the piano, violin or the cello among them and also among the higher officers in the army. I have often been greatly astonished at social functions to see a major or a colonel in full uniform sit down at the piano and play Chopin and Liszt and accompany songs by Schumann and Schubert from memory. Lula Mysz-Gmeiner, the Hungarian mezzo soprano, sang a group of lieder most impressively. Carl Flesch and Arthur Schnabel also took part, their contribution being a most beautiful performance of Beethoven's A major sonata.

Jadlowker, the Russian.

In a concert given in the Künstlerhaus Hermann Jadlowker, the Russian tenor, was heard in Berlin for the first time since the war began. The Germans are really very tolerant in such matters; anyhow Jadlowker is a great favorite with the public, being the star tenor of the Royal Opera. He also is a special protégé of the Kaiser. Nevertheless Count von Hulsen, the General Intendant of the Royal Opera, has not thought it advisable to let him appear on the stage during the war, so Jadlowker has officially been given a year's leave of absence.

Silvio Floresco.

Another new violinist, Silvio Floresco by name, a Roumanian, also made his debut in the same hall with the Philharmonic Orchestra. So it will be seen that the debutants after all have not been weeded out completely. Floresco played Tartini's D minor concerto and a novelty by Hermann Gredner in form of a violin concerto, a work which is well and effectively written for the solo instrument, but which lacks original thematic material and contrasts in the handling of it. Floresco is a talented performer. He is not so far advanced as Telmanyi, but his playing has one pronounced feature—a beautiful singing tone in the cantabile.

BUSONI AND TELMANYI.

A new Hungarian violinist, Emil Telmanyi, made his debut in the Singakademie with the Blüthner Orchestra under the leadership of Ferruccio Busoni. His program included Busoni's concerto for the violin in D major, op. 35, a most difficult but very interesting composition, of which the youthful violinist gave a most excellent account. He was also heard in the concertos by Brahms and Mendelssohn. Telmanyi has a clear and fluent technic and an appealing tone. He has not yet reached the highest rung in the ladder, but his playing has character and promises well for the future.

STERN CONSERVATORY ACTIVITY.

The principal teachers of Stern's Conservatory gave a concert at Beethoven Hall for the benefit of needy musicians, which was well attended. Noticeable among the listeners were many wounded soldiers in uniform. Most of them had their arms in slings. Schubert's B flat major trio received an excellent performance at the hands of Gustav Holländer, James Quast, and Heinrich Kiefer. Mrs. Quast, Mr. and Mrs. Eugen Brieger and Carl Mayer also participated. The concert was a decided success.

OTHER CONCERTS.

Edwin Fischer, one of the most gifted and finished pupils of Martin Krause, gave a recital on Wednesday evening at Bechstein Hall, which earned for him enthusiastic and well deserved applause. The young man is a remarkable combination of a musician and virtuoso. He played the Beethoven thirty-two variations and Bach's chromatic fantasy like a master.

The Society of Music Friends gave a concert with the assistance of the Philharmonic Orchestra under the baton of Ernst Wendel from Bremen, the proceeds of which were given to the relief fund for needy musicians. The orchestra under Wendel's leadership was heard in Beethoven's "Egmont" overture and fifth symphony, while Franz von Vecsey gave an admirable rendition of the violin concerto. It was a Beethoven program.

BEETHOVEN'S POPULARITY.

Never in the history of music in Germany has Beethoven's unparalleled popularity been so manifested as in the present time. Everywhere the public is clamoring for Beethoven, and a Beethoven program, if offered by well known artists, is sure to attract a large audience. Brahms and even Wagner cannot cope with the master of Bonn.

CARL FLESCH'S SEASON IN GERMANY.

Carl Flesch is a Hungarian by birth, and as the government of that country has refused to issue without exception any more passes to men between the ages of nineteen and forty-five, Flesch will be unable to fulfil his engagements in America this year. Carl Flesch was in Zandvoord, a small seaside place in Holland, when the war broke out. He immediately went to Amsterdam to see the Austro-Hungarian general consul with regard to the war and was assured that he would be exempted from all military duty. Thereupon Flesch wrote his managers, Haensel & Jones, that they could depend upon his appearing in America, and that he would come earlier than had been announced. When Flesch returned to Berlin, however, he was informed by the Austrian consul general that he belonged to the so called Landsturm II, which means that he will be subject to military duty in case of necessity, although he has never served in the army. Then the question arose as to whether he would be able to get a pass since he was a possible subject to military duty. It would have been an easy matter for him to go from Holland without a pass, but in order to leave Germany for America a pass would have been an absolute necessity. Although Flesch is well known here to the authorities he was unable to secure the desired papers. So with a heavy heart he has just cabled his managers in New York of his plight, requesting them to cancel the large number of engagements already closed. The celebrated violinist fully intends, however, to tour in America as soon as the war is over, and next time he means to take his friend and partner, Arthur Schnabel, to the States with him. The sonata playing of Flesch and Schnabel is justly famous, and their ensemble would prove to be of great interest to the American musical public.

Meanwhile Flesch is having a very busy and successful season in Germany. Contrary to all expectations at the beginning of the war, most of the important music and orchestra societies are giving their concerts as usual, and that means, of course, that they are engaging noted soloists. Only the fees are somewhat lower than in ordinary times. That, of course, is understood. Flesch has been asked to play with Nikisch in Berlin and Leipsic, with Mengelberg in Amsterdam and at The Hague, in Cologne in the Gürzenich concerts, in Frankfort at one of the Museum Concerts, and also in Hamburg, Dresden, Wien and other important German and Austrian cities.

ARTHUR M. ABELL.

Glenn Dillard Gunn's Tribule to Gittelson.

On November 13, 1914, Frank Gittelson was soloist with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in Chicago, performing the Brahms concerto and eliciting unstinted praise from the press and public. Among the encomiums is the following opinion of Glenn Dillard Gunn, among the best known critics west of New York.

Frank Gittelson's performance of the Brahms concerto with the Chicago Orchestra was the notable event of the season thus far. Not since Elman's debut has the attention of the musical world been similarly challenged. This remarkable young American has the musical authority of a master. His tone is wonderful in its flexible beauty; his rhythms rebound with resilient impulse; his command of the mere mechanics of his instrument is so complete that the listener gives it no thought. In short, he must take rank with the great ones. (Advertisement.)

EATING FOR VOICE.

By Stewart W. Tufts, M. D.

(There is no subject of importance to the singer which has been left so untouched. Dr. Tufts is the pioneer in formulating an exact science of "Eating for Voice," upon which he has written for the Musical Courier a series of articles, one of which will appear monthly.—Ed.)

The human voice is the most wonderful and most beautiful organ of music. Only rarely, however, can we hear it give complete evidence of its excellence because in all the world we have only a few singers who are masters of it, although there is an army of enthusiastic and intelligent students who are spending millions of hours and dollars attempting to master it. This widespread failure is caused mainly by the fact that so little is understood of the relation of food to voice, and of methods of controlling the diet of the singer so as to make the larynx produce uniform results. As a consequence, professional singers frequently come to their performance with high hopes of success only to find, to their chagrin, that they are in bad voice; and students, to their financial loss and discouragement, are not in good voice more than half the time for lessons. At any one time the voice may be of easy, oily production with full, rich tones, or it may be just the opposite, requiring huge effort to overcome its tightness of production, a condition resulting in thin, strained tones liable sometimes to sharp and sometimes to flat. Being in bad voice is the great bugbear of the singer, and the trickiness of the action of the larynx is a colossal handicap to him. It is certain that irregularity is more characteristic of vocal conditions than uniformity.

It must be remembered that voice is first physical, and that the larynx is a part of the body and either flourishes or suffers with the body. Many influences are felt in the voice before they are observed in any other part of the body, and this is especially true of the effect of food. Wrong foods, and errors even in the use of the right ones, will seriously clog and handicap laryngeal action. It is more difficult to keep the beautiful, keen edge of the voice in good condition than the edge of the sharpest razor. For superlative results the singer should always be in training, and thus in fit condition. "Eating for voice" is just as much a necessity to the singer as dieting in the training of an athlete. In fact, "eating for voice" is training for voice.

The new science of "eating for voice" is a method of adjusting the diet of the singer so as to enable the larynx to give uniform and superlative results at any time desired.

This system is the result of twenty years' persistent endeavor to perfect it as an art and science, requiring exhaustive work in the study of dietetics in general, of anatomy and physiology, of the relation of all foods to the mucuos secretion of the air tract, and a thorough study of the science of voice building. During four years of the work I practised daily, and made every meal and combination of meals an experiment in "eating for voice." New signs of the various stages of hunger, as related to vocal variations, were discovered, as well as subtle signs indicating overfeeding and underfeeding, and also the cumulative effects of the different classes of foods and their combinations used to excess, and the effects of an insufficient supply of food.

All foods and their combinations have been classified in regard to their effect upon voice production, endurance and quality of voice, strength of tone, and last but by no means least, upon the ear as related to singing in tune. These varied relationships are indicated by many signs of nutritional states as related to vocal results, but, intricate as is the method of determining these relationships, their practical application does not necessitate the weighing of foods or the use of aggravating rules which require constant thought and attention. On the contrary, the art can be learned so as to become a habit, although this knowledge is a subtlety equal to any in the science of voice, and can only be learned from an adept in both the art and science of "eating for voice."

It is adaptable to any stage of the development of the voice, to all conditions of air, food, exercise, temperament, climatic changes, and produces the greatest general efficiency, the inevitable result of which is a voice that is the highest expression of the body in superlative condition. This reacts upon the mind and produces complete vocal assurance, because the singer who has been uniformly in good voice a hundred times in succession knows that he can command this most gratifying result at any time desired.

A thoughtful consideration of the foregoing statements must make it obvious to the most casual reader that a set diet cannot be given to singers in general which will give results in particular cases, and that "eating for voice" must be taught to suit individual needs, the stage of development and the type of voice.

LOS ANGELES BREVITIES.

Recent Musical Doings in Southern California Metropolis.

Every year L. E. Behymer puts Los Angeles nearer the center of the musical map, and so far this season the Philharmonic course concerts have more than upheld the usual high standard. Mr. Behymer deserves the thanks of every music lover in giving us the opportunity of hearing Rudolph Ganz in recital. Mr. Ganz has been heard here before, but never alone. Two years ago he appeared in joint recital with Riccardo Martin, the tenor, and made a decidedly fine impression. Tuesday evening he held his audience through every note of a program that included two Blanchet works, a Korngold composition and two beautiful numbers of his own. The writer spent a memorable hour with Mr. Ganz during his Los Angeles visit, and he talked of many things, especially of the trend of modern music.

American Operatic Association.

Mrs. Kinney, president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, is in the city assisting the local committee in plans for the 1915 festival. Mr. Blanchard, president of the American Operatic Association, and his committee are expending every effort to make this event a colossal success. Mr. Blanchard has designed a most attractive pin. Upon the payment of ten dollars this pin is secured and a voucher crediting the party paying for it with ten dollars' worth of tickets for the musical events of the biennial. Many plans are in formation which will be expained in due time.

Pageant of American Music.

The Harmonia Club repeated for the benefit of the Friday Morning Club the successful pageant given before their own members and friends last May, a full account of which was published in this paper at the time. The same numbers were given and the same performers who made it such a success last year again appeared. The poem, which strung together the many old and modern songs, was written and read by Mrs. Colburn.

Paul Ertel, the Berlin critic and composer, has finished a new opera called "Gudrun," with a text by H. Horwitz.

Christine MILLER'S Triumph

At the great National Saengerfest at Louisville, Ky., on June 24 and 25, 1914. With the Chicago Symphony Orchestra the soloists were Marie Rappold, Christine Miller, Rudolf Berger and Clarence Whitehill.

PRESS NOTICES

This is Miss Miller's third appearance here and with each return she reveals new beauties of voice and person. As Armida she was vocally effective and visually alluring. Miss Miller's voice has increased in volume and dramatic quality since she last sang before a Louisville audience, but it has lost none of the vibrant, cello-like vitality that distinguishes it from all other voices and gives it a personal and vivid character. Her singing of the seductive notes of Armida was accomplished with that artistic understanding which her hearers have learned to expect from her, and she invested the part with the sinister charm inseparable from its nature. Audience, chorus and orchestra united in expressions of the liveliest admiration for her rendition and she has added another to the long list of her triumphs. She is one of the most popular singers on the concert stage and the serenade tendered to her after the performance by the Indianapolis Männerchor, directed by Rudolph Heyne, was a fitting testimonial to a sincere artist and beloved woman.—Katherine Whipple Dobbs, The Times, June 25, 1914.

Christine Miller carried the burden. Admirably dramatic and of presence most graceful, she restored the balance.—E. A. Jones, The Herald, June 25, 1914.

Christine Miller sang the part of the fairy, Armide, delightfully, and her beautiful voice was fully equal to the demands of the immense hall.—Anna L. Hopper, Courier-Journal June 25, 1914.

Christine Miller's voice was heard to even better advantage than in the first concert. The dramatic opportunities were ample for the display of that command of tonal color which is one of Miss Miller's strong points, and she missed nothing of the possibilities of contrast, leading up to the tragedy of the song with superb effect. In "The Young Nun" her singing was remarkable for its beautiful legato, the sustained tones penetrating through the orchestral harmonies with rich, organ-like purity. The last song revealed the vocalist's ability in another phase. Miss Miller has established herself as a favorite in Louisville, and will always be a most welcome visitor.—Katherine Whipple Dobbs, The Times, June 26, 1914.

Christine Miller, in delightful voice and no less delightful stimmung—it make so much difference—sang with purity of tone and a really dramatic inspiration. Louisville has learned to love "Die Schöne Müllerin.—E. A. Jonas, Herald, June 26, 1914.

Next to the vociferous welcome accorded the singing of "Dixie" the highest compliment of the evening was paid to Christine Miller when the vast throng achieved an unprecedented hush while she sang "The Lorelei." Even the waving of fans was partly abandoned as an instinctive feeling that every little sound counted pervaded the audience. If one could not hear a pin drop, one could hear Miss Miller. She sang Liszt's mastersong with exquisite feeling and her rendition of Schubert's "The Young Nun," a number so difficult that it is seldom heard, was a treat to be long remembered.—Anna L. Hopper, The Courier-Journal, June 26, 1914.

Miss Miller sang the Liszt setting of "Die Lorelei" with fine dramatic effect, so that the entire audience was impressed. There can be no question of her dramatic power as a concert artist, nor of the capacity of her voice to fill the great auditorium.—Richard G. Knott, Evening Post, June 26, 1914.

A Pittsburgh Music Critic and Promoter.

An energetic personality, an appealing enthusiasm, a faithful love for her activities in the musical and dramatic fields of Pittsburgh are characteristic of Catharine J. Elston, one of the best known figures and authorities in the art circles of the Steel Town.

Miss Elston is at present librarian of the University of Pittsburgh, musical critic for the Pittsburgh Dispatch, and is identified in the majority of the efforts to bring prominent musicians and artists to Pittsburgh.

Although the greater part of Miss Elston's musical knowledge has been gained by study and cultivation, she was equipped naturally for her work by an intense artistic strain inherited from her mother's side of the family. When only a child Miss Elston took up the study of the violin, but soon gave it up for financial reasons. Her education was received in private schools and in the Bishop Bowman Institute. Later she took a library course at Drexel Institute, Philadelphia, and at the Brooklyn Public Library.

Miss Elston has been librarian at the University of Pittsburgh for the past nine years, and for the past four years she has been music critic on the Dispatch. In this last work she succeeded Charles Wakefield Cadman, the composer, and a great deal of her musical appreciative sense is due to her association with him. Her criticisms partake to a large degree of Mr. Cadman's peculiar, pungent, vivid style of writing. Miss Elston stands alone in Pittsburgh in her phrasing and wording. She is a modernist of modernists and never hesitates to form new combinations of words and ideas when she wishes to express some particularly virile thought. She gives the credit of much of her musical knowledge to Laura Holton, an aunt and teacher of piano, and to Mr. Cadman.

CATHARINE J. ELSTON.

Miss Elston is profoundly interested in the problem of bringing the great artists to Pittsburgh at prices low enough for the middle class people. She has studied the musical situation in her home town and believes that the mass should be catered to rather than the favored, moneyed few. It is her humane quality which makes her writings much sought after.

Miss Elston is a socialist and the only member of the Fabian Society in Pittsburgh.

Personally, Miss Elston is a slight, bright faced, alert woman, passionately fond of Panlike wilds, of freedom and of animals. She prizes her pets, a splendid Russian wolfhound, an Irish terrier and a French poodle, the latter a gift from Minnie Maddern Fiske, almost as much as she does her work. Her home is in Edgewood, which is practically a settlement of artistic and musical people. Miss Elston does not mingle much in the social life. Her vitality is given first to her work, then to her home, her real close friends, her pets and to nature.

Klibansky Artist-Pupils Engagements.

The doings and engagements of various artist pupils of Sergei Klibansky just at this time, and in the immediate future, are briefly as follows, all going to show the demand for their services: Lalla Bright Cannon has been engaged to substitute at the Broadway Presbyterian Church, New York. She sang the solo in "Die Allmacht" at the New York Rubinstein Club concert, December 8. Virginia Estill last week sang with great success at Sweet Briar College, in the town of that name in Virginia. Jean Vincent Cooper sang a fortnight ago at the Anne Morgan House, and on November 24 at the Wanamaker anniversary concerts in New York. In January she sings at Aeolian Hall, New York Paul Eichhorn, baritone, has been engaged as soloist at St. Andrew's P. E. Church, Yonkers, N. Y. Marie Louise Wagner will give a recital, December 10, at the Sinton Hotel, Cincinnati. B. Woollf, tenor, gives a recital with orchestra at the Montefiore Temple, the Bronx, New York City. Badrig Guevchenian gave a recital in Sandford, Fla., November 20, when the papers spoke highly of his voice and musicianship.

Every Wednesday from 5 to 7 p. m., pupils of Mr. Klibansky sing in the studio rooms, American Institute, 212 West Fifty-ninth street, New York, when guests are welcomed.

A McCormack Month in Music.

John McCormack's career in concert work during the past month seems almost like a fairy tale. His business has exceeded even that of last year, one of the most prosperous in his history.

Mr. McCormack opened the season this year at Grand Rapids, Mich., and was immediately engaged again for next year. Three days before the Indianapolis concert, Mrs. Talbot, the local manager, wired Charles W. Wagner and asked for a second night, which was impossible, on account of other engagements. His last two New York and Brooklyn concerts occasioned entirely sold out houses, and at the last New York concert Manager Wagner was obliged to return money at the box office, as the house had been oversold.

At Boston McCormack gave two concerts in three weeks, and at the last was accorded one of the greatest ovations ever witnessed in that city. He was immediately engaged for February 21 and 23.

In Buffalo, Mrs. Smith, the impresaria, had one of the largest sales in her career and one of the most distinguished audiences; McCormack was immediately booked for a return to Buffalo in April. The same thing occurred in Rochester and at Pittsburgh. At Dayton, Ohio, 3,200 people were put into a hall that seats 2,500, under the splendid auspices of the Civic Music League, which is really doing something for music in Dayton and Southern Ohio. At Columbus, his first visit in three years, McCormack had another record house, under the able management of Kate Lacey, who entered the field this year in order to give Columbus the music that her public wants. Miss Lacey has no fads or fancies; her idea is to give the public the best in the musical world, working on the same plan as the Civic Music League of Dayton.

Toronto had a sold out house for December 4, and he sang in Chicago December 6.

After six weeks on the Pacific Coast, Mr. McCormack will return to New York, February 14, for his first concert. He has decided to remain in America all summer and all next season, and will sing until June 1. Mr. McCormack seems destined to beat even his former records everywhere.

Thanksgiving Day was spent by the McCormack party at the Iroquois Hotel, Buffalo, and since the party consists of an Irishman, two Germans and an Australian, Manager Wagner sent the following invitation to the party: "The Allies and the Germans will meet in the dining room of the Iroquois immediately after the McCormack concert to dispose of Turkey." Mr. McCormack accepted as follows: "Will accept if General Thanksgiving is in command."

Werrenrath in Boston.

As intelligently and artfully, Mr. Werrenrath sang. His ear heard the quality of tone that he was producing and kept it clear, true, smooth, animated and sensitive. He is able now to spin it in fine, bright threads as occasion warrants; he is master of soft upper tones . . . his middle notes are suave; his lower do not become harsh or throaty. He sings flowingly with thought always of the melodic continuity, but with no artificial and adcaptandum broadening of it. Phrase fuses into phrase yet over them play artful modulations of pace and rhythm born of the acute and imaginative singer. With each song he sees the end from the beginning and he draws and shades his tonal design accordingly. He draws it also with imagination and with the differentiating imagination that in finer fibred songs than his American and Italian pieces of yesterday becomes sense of style. To his Latin piece, for example, he brought large and warm Italian phrasing. . . . He knows the easy sentimental and the easy narrative vein of American songs and adapts voice, artistry and manner to them.

The more rewarding the material upon which Mr. Werrenrath exercises these perceptions the higher and finer they run. Against the cool quiet and the sober shadings of his tones in Brahms' song, he set the warmer voice and richer color that he gave to Weingartner's. Sinding received the broad and climacteric sonorities, the mounting exaltation of his song, while Grieg in turn and in character mused and murmured. To do such things is to sing with imagination and sensibility, and in all the play of both, over his imparting of the varied moods, content and suggestion of his songs, Mr. Werrenrath showed the same designing intelligence that had guided and controlled him on the purely musical side. He does all things with thought and pains; yet he does not lack animation, warmth and ease. Shrewdly as he has considered his musical and his interpretive purpose, he fuses both into spontaneous utterance. His finesse never becomes finical; he does not slip in taste or manner. Men-singers of his faculties and distinctions in intimate songs are rare in our concerts.—Boston Evening Transcript.

It gave Bostonians at last an opportunity to hear a young American singer whose praises have been sung elsewhere for several years. His singing yesterday justified this enviable reputation. . . . on account of the thoroughly artistic style in which he delivers every song. His voice is of wide range, a virile organ under complete control, and . . . is capable of eloquent expression.

Mr. Werrenrath sang with delightful diction and with a breadth of intelligence and sympathy that marks him one of the most commanding figures on the present concert stage. As a song interpreter, he proved yesterday that he has few equals among native artists. The audience waxed enthusiastic over his spirited performance.—Boston Journal, November 16, 1914.

Mr. Werrenrath has . . . a fine mind, an authoritative musical sense and the ability to perceive and communicate feeling. He knows, as do few singers now endeavoring to do public work, either in opera or in concert, how to manage the voice as a piece of well-governed, automatic mechanism; he knows how to lay out the plan of a song in such a manner that he will disclose its message, but with the greatest amount of variety of style and with the most advantageous employment of his own vocal resources. He can make an audience listen to a mediocre song. . . . The second group of four songs in Italian brought forth singing of a rare artistic satisfaction. . . . A wealth of vocal beauty, ravishing in mezzo voce, inspiriting in more impassioned measures, dramatic in diction and accent, singing imbued with rich, poetic feeling.—Boston Globe.

He is not merely accomplished in the art of song, in the controlling of a mellow and responsive voice, but his interpretations are always interesting and far above the average. Ambitious in the matter of repertoire he has been reproached for unconventional and ultra-modern programs. Yesterday his songs were discreet. Some were familiar. Of the four in Italian "Tristezza Crepuscolare" was the most effective.

Mr. Werrenrath, as usual, sang admirably, with taste and emotional eloquence. His diction was excellent.—Boston Herald.

Mr. Werrenrath's voice, beautiful in itself, is pruned of early defects and cultivated by intelligent training, governed by purity of taste, almost fastidious in its insistence on style and beauty of tone. Sincerity, ease, and loveliness are to be preserved at all costs! . . . What this artist is capable of when under the spell of a fine work was shown in the early numbers, above all in Sinding, where his voice took on more resonant beauty, and carried an enkindling spark to the hearts of the audience.—Boston Daily Advertiser. Lesley Martin, Vocal Specialist.

At a jovial party in which four languages were spoken, Lesley Martin, master of them all, was persuaded to tell a little of himself. In brief, he came to America twenty-seven years ago and went direct to San Francisco, where he was music critic, taught music and lived a generally active musical life for a dozen years. Coming to New York City he attracted pupils who are especially prominent in stage life. Many singers now before the public studied with Lesley Martin. Many original ideas are his, betokening the thinker as well as the doer. Few voice instructors play the piano with the style and authority of Mr. Martin, thus enabling him to coach singers in superior interpretation.

"I look for a real coloratura soprano voice to show my best results as a teacher," said Mr. Martin. "Such voices are not uncommon in America, and when I find it I will stake my reputation on the results of an application of my principles of vocal development."

Here is a chance for singers possessing the florid voice. Mr. Martin is at the Metropolitan Opera House studios, 1425 Broadway, New York City.

Ruth K. Emblen at Bellaire.

Ruth K. Emblen, soprano, recently gave a concert at Bellaire, Ohio, where her artistic singing and excellent musicianship won for her the appreciation of the large audience. A noteworthy feature of her program was the singing of "Lo! Hear the Gentle Lark," with flute obligato, both singer and instrumentalist winning justly deserved praise. As an encore Mrs. Emblen [illegible] "The Last Rose of Summer," which she gave with rare beauty of tone and fine interpretation.

Charles de Harrack's American Critiques.

In joint recital Ch. de Harrack, the royal pianist, shared honors and applause.—Boston Herald.

De Harrack is a young pianist with marked poetic tendencies. His particular genre is in refined playing a la de Pachmann. De Harrack is full of emotional fancy, sympathy and will win for himself a place in the pianistic world as an interpreter of intimate tonal tales.—Cleveland Press.

It was a treat to hear Ch. de Harrack play the piano.—New York Evening World.

De Harrack displayed beautiful touch and great power.—New York Evening Journal.

Mr. Ch. de Harrack displayed daintiness and was at his best.—New York Herald.

Ch. de Harrack proved himself to be an artist of high intelligence. He plays with deep musical understanding and knows how to entice beautiful effects from his instrument. He merited spontaneous applause.—New York Review.

Too much praise cannot be given Mr. de Harrack for his excellent rendition of selections from Liszt, Beethoven and others.—Boston Morning Telegraph.

Ch. de Harrack's selections were interpreted in a satisfactory manner, the audience demanding encores.—Boston Globe.

Mr. de Harrack is a lion on the piano, a virtuoso.—New Haven Morning Journal Courier.

Some of the passages were as soft as velvet and as rippling as the summer rivulet. The purity of his tone seems to be all of his own device, and naturally everything passes through his characteristic shading and comes from furnace at white heat, with his mark upon it.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Mr. de Harrack is the possessor of unusual and exceptional pianistic gifts. His technic is nothing short of brilliant and there is so much of originality, poetry and artistry to his interpretations that the spiritual side of his playing is as brilliant as the technical. Temperament abounds in his work and his bravura style calls forth admiration. His tone is of remarkable clarity and his runs are brilliant and sparkling.—Cleveland Leader.

De Harrack is one of the coming great pianists; he has genius of a high order and marked individuality.—The Press, Akron, Ohio.

Under his masterful fingers, the Beethoven "Sonate Appassionata" took on new beauty, and the Liszt rhapsody was rendered in a style which proclaimed him one of the leading pianists of the day.—News, New Castle, Pa.

A rare treat—given Warren music lovers last night—De Harrack an artist.—Daily Tribune, Warren, Ohio. (Advertisement.)

Marie Sundelius in St. Louis and Kansas City

Yesterday afternoon the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its second group of its symphony concerts at the Odeon, presenting Marie Sundelius, soprano, as the soloist. Mme. Sundelius appeared at one of the Sunday concerts last year and scored such a sensational success as to establish her firmly in the estimation of the patrons of the orchestra. She demonstrated then that she possessed a remarkable voice, excelling chiefly in its exquisite quality, and that she was an experienced and finished singer, capable of appealing to the finest sensibility of an audience, accustomed to listening to the greatest artists. Mme. Sundelius was given a cordial welcome when she appeared on the stage yesterday, and at least a dozen recalls after her two numbers, "Micaela's Air," from "Carmen," and the "Depuis Le Jour."

. . . One will rarely hear a more beautiful voice than hers, or find himself in the presence of a more captivating personality.—St. Louis Republic, November 14, 1914.

No finer soprano ever came before a St. Louis audience than Marie Sundelius, who carried every one with her from the moment she appeared on the stage. . . .—St. Louis Globe Democrat, November 14, 1914.

. . . Gifted with a full effective soprano, which she uses with authority, she was most satisfactory in the two arias of her program.—St. Louis Times, November 14, 1914.

Marie Sundelius . . . ingratiated herself anew with a large and fashionable audience present.—Sunday Republic, November 15, 1914.

. . . The Symphony audience was cordial and gave the singer a reception that amounted to an ovation.—St. Louis Globe Democrat, November 15, 1914.

A well chosen group of French songs was charmingly sung by Marie Sundelius, a soprano of pleasing personality and sympathetic voice, who is winning great popularity this season.—Kansas City Star, November 11, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Spalding in Boston and Minneapolis.

His art has broadened and matured. . . . He plays now as the artist, with a quiet and sovereign mastery over the mechanical problems of his instrument. . . .

The sincerity of this young violinist is apparent in all he does. . . . Proved an expert craftsman, he evidences also a cultured mind, that boon too often neglected by the striving musician.

Did Mr. Spalding play with less emotional conviction, or even with phrasing less polished in surface, the ravishing loveliness of his free, unforced tone would be difficult to escape. . . .

The program included a sonata by Corelli, an adagio and fugue (G minor) by Bach, unaccompanied, played with admirable simplicity, clarity, dignity and repose. . . .

At least not the cadenza of Eduard Herrmann familiar to students, was that of the first movement his own? If somewhat opulent in style for Mozart, it was a masterpiece in its beautiful, double stopping, impeccable in thrills and running passages. The slow movement was sung as only a finished stylist could do it. The rondo was a model of lightness, clearness, playful humor.

Of his own pieces, the prelude and the "Scherzo Giocoso," the musical ideas in the first would seem preferable—a composition of established moods, well expressed in effective melody, well harmonized and clear in form. . . .—Boston Globe, November 13, 1914.

SOLOIST WITH MINNEAPOLIS ORCHESTRA.

. . . The third violin concerto of Saint-Saëns . . . Mr. Spalding's rendition has grown in artistic maturity since he first delighted us with his fine American manliness seven years ago on a Sunday afternoon and since his ideal playing of the Mendelssohn concerto three years ago. . . . While he does not strive for big tone effects, or, indeed, for any sensationalism, he gives us the best European traditions with an added individuality of a genuine American gentleman of the highest refinement. . . .

Mr. Spalding's encore in Beethoven's second romance was in exquisite taste as to judgment and execution. . . .—Minneapolis Daily News, November 7, 1914.

Mr. Spalding played, as his program number with the orchestra, Saint-Saëns' B minor concerto for violin and orchestra, and played it so virilely well that its essential conventionality and occasional effeminacies were almost lost sight of. In response to an enthusiastic encore he gave a beautiful interpretation of the Beethoven romance in F major.—Minneapolis Evening Tribune, November 7, 1914.

Albert Spalding was the soloist. The eminent American artist gave a remarkably subtle and tender performance of the third Saint-Saëns violin concerto, the energy of his bowing being masked by superior smoothness of action. His tone is even mellower than before, but has lost nothing of its masculine character. The phrasing was throughout of rare finesse, as was the support offered by Mr. Oberhoffer and the orchestra. Enthusiastically received, Mr. Spalding responded with the Beethoven romance in F major with orchestral background, doing loving justice to its crystalline purity of sentiment and form.—Minneapolis Journal, November 7, 1914.

Carrie Louise Dunning at Syracuse University.

Carrie L. Dunning, of New York, was the guest of honor at a luncheon given by the Alpha Chi Omega Sorority at the sorority house yesterday afternoon. Mrs. Dunning came to this city to give a musical recital at Apollo Hall last evening. The recital was largely attended by musicians and teachers of music. Mrs. Dunning is a pupil of Theodore Leschetizky, of Vienna, and is a recognized authority on teaching.

Mrs. Dunning realizes that the musical profession must keep pace with all other lines of education and that there is no reason for children spending so many years in studying it. The average teacher of music, according to Mrs. Dunning, lacks application, concentration and dispatch, the latter allowing of quick thinking. "I learned the greatest lesson of my life in one short hour when studying with the great Leschetizky," Mrs. Dunning stated yesterday.

"He told me, after spending many years of my musical life under the instruction of eleven of the best instructors in the United States, that, although I was an adept with my fingers, I did not use my mental powers enough. The teachers of today need to know something of the history of music, of the musicians, as well as the technic."

According to Mrs. Dunning, the principle of teaching anything is to draw out the pupil instead of trying to pour something into him. That music has been a laggard in the line of progression, Mrs. Dunning admits, but she adds that the world of music is awakening, and lovers of it are delving to bring better systems to the front, so that the future generations need not have the drudgery experienced by those of the past.

"Do not misunderstand me," she explained. "There must always be drudgery in anything worth working for, but progressive musicians are bending their efforts to make that drudgery in music a pleasure, which for years was made a penalty to the child."—The Post-Standard, Syracuse, N. Y. (Advertisement.)

Ye Olde Tyme Concerte.

A unique costume concert was given at the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, on Tuesday evening, December 1, which attracted a large and friendly audience. The participants were Edna S. Dunham, soprano; Bessie Bowman Estey, contralto; Wm. Wall Whiddit, conductor and tenor; Frederic Martin, basso; Marion Marsh, harp, as well as male and female choruses. The program consisted of popular solos, trios, quartets and choruses and was greatly appreciated by all present.

Mme. Gabrilowitsch to Give Recital.

Clara Gabrilowitsch, who recently appeared in joint recital with her husband, the Russian pianist, will give a song recital in the Little Theatre, New York, Tuesday afternoon, December 15. The contralto will sing groups of songs of Schubert, Schumann and Brahms, in addition to numbers by Falconière, Pergolese, Paisiello, Tschaikowsky, Glieri and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Mr. Gabrilowitsch will assist at the piano.

BREATH-CONTROL IN SINGING.

By Otto Torney Simon.

Among the media for the production of musical art, the voice in singing would seem to be the most direct and spontaneous.

Other instruments in their construction are the result of man's ingenuity, and the direct result of endeavors to express the innumerable play of his emotions through varied tone colors aroused by the vibration of string, reed or metal.

The instrument of singing, the human voice, is part of a physical organism. With a limited monotony it serves also the purpose of conventional speech. In a nature aroused to greatest warmth, it may express with increased tonal color and intensity the exalted sentiments of the spoken word of the drama and of oratory.

Between emotional speech and the next step there is a time of pulsating silence, for here an impressive art is born, an art that envelops a word with a gossamer of charm and lightness, that colors it with innumerable richer tints of deeper significance, or that throws it under a spell of gloom as sombre as that of the deepest night—the art of singing.

Music, through the instrument of singing, illumines the word. A new and added correlation is awakened between the spirit and the word thus transfigured.

Of the intricacy of muscle and cartilage action of the vocal instrument it may be unnecessary to know. The broader principles of tone production are well understood. These include the vibration of the vocal bands in the larnyx caused by the outward flow of the air passing over them, the resulting elementary tone, and its consequent reinforcement in the resonating cavities, such as the chest, the throat and the mouth.

The element of breath control in singing is its recognized basic principle.

This knowledge is "the keystone to the arch" upon which the entire development of the vocal instrument rests. Without its correct application there can be no vocal art. How to explain this and how such correct action may be obtained has always been the most sought for truth among students of singing, and today it is as eagerly looked for as in the past.

The desired characteristic of a basic tone in singing is one of steadiness, equal weight, evenness and of control in production in any dynamic, the result of proportionately equal emission each moment the breath passes over the vocal bands.

The breath should pass over the vocal ligaments as the controlled bow of the violin is drawn across its strings, slowly and reposefully.

The act of filling the lungs for artistic singing requires an unusual enlargement of the chest space and this is accomplished principally by the descent of the diaphragm, a fibrous, dome shaped muscle extending through the centre of the body and on which the lungs rest. Such action is assisted by the intercostal muscles between the lower ribs to which the diaphragm is attached at the back and sides.

Effective breath control is therefore the result of correctly and definitely applied muscle action which results in breath economy. The body should always be master of the breath and of the tone.

The singer who strives for a psychological tone, unsustained by a vigorous body, chases a shadow.

To omit processes of intelligence in training the voice, to breathe naturally, to sing naturally, are precepts as fatal to beauty of tone as the superficial act of the surgeon, who dreamily operates, and makes his incision naturally.

Such inadequate suggestion lacks the genius and penetration of the thinker and specialist.

The natural breath is usually the result of relaxation. Singing, on the other hand, is the result of applied action, and a different adjustment becomes necessary.

The inflation will be only partial and incomplete, and therefore ineffective, if the upper part of the chest is expanded without the requisite diaphragm action. This is known as "high" chest breathing and is especially conducive to the undue waste and quick expulsion of the air;

VIDA
LLEWELLYN
PIANIST

CONCERT DIRECTION M. H. HANSON

if the diaphragm is abnormally distended, shown by the protruding lower abdomen, as to preclude sufficient chest action. In this case there will always be difficulty in recovering or regaining the breath quickly. Pathologically, too, it is a pernicious method, as it may result in serious and injurious prolapse of vital organs.

Correct and complete inflation involves the following activity: The lower ribs in the back and sides are well extended as an essential factor in flattening the diaphragm. At the same moment, the lower abdomen, as additional support, is drawn inward and upward into the arch of the diaphragm. A further increase in the upper chest should then take place in order to complete the full inflation. This is accomplished by the extension of the upper ribs and a slight raising of the sternum. The shoulders should remain unmoved and the point of each shoulder well drawn backward.

The lungs are now filled to completion for artistic singing.

The economy in breath emission is at this moment the essential act for the singer.

The problem has a direct, effective and immediate solution in the application of the diaphragm as a necessary resisting force in the production of tone, as it is played upon by the lower abdominal muscles pressing upward, and the limited approximation of the upper chest and back.

The control of the diaphragm so that it cannot slip upward precipitately to its dome shaped position, resulting in a collapsed chest and a rush of air uncontrolled outward, is made by "setting" or "locking" the diaphragm.

The "locking" of the diaphragm is the basic act of breath control and is the missing link in many so called systems or methods of vocal training.

Such physical action should precede the production of tone.

The grip of muscles restrains and limits the upward movement of the diaphragm, but does not rigidly fix it.

The critical judgment and correction of tone should be in singing a psychological one for master and pupil, but after, and not without, the consummation of the act of "locking" the diaphragm.

The sensation of stringency of the breathing muscles should remain during the act of singing or speaking. Faulty conditions of the closed throat, the firmly held larynx, the rigid chin, are all the result of voice production with this essential body activity only partial and incomplete.

The breathing mechanism has now been prepared for the act of "pressure and resistance," by which, at will, the breath is equally and proportionally "spun out" over the vocal bands, resulting in a tone that is the foundation of all singing of excellence, namely, the tone of equality, evenness and control. This action gives also to the phrase, or the sequence of single tones, that desired smoothness of production resulting in the necessary "cantilena."

Mme. Kate Rolla's Activities.

With a distinguished career such as Kate Rolla has had in the musical world, having been a prima donna soprano at Covent Garden, London; the Imperial Opera House, Moscow; the Imperial Opera House, St. Petersburg; San Carlo, Naples, and the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, this artist is thoroughly equipped with broad experience in singing, and therefore the pupils who are now studying with her at her studio, 251 West Eighty-first street, New York, are receiving training, the results of which must be of marked benefit to them in their future artistic pursuits. Mme. Rolla established herself in New York as a vocal teacher only a few years ago, and last season opened her Paris studio. However, owing to the war, she decided to return to New York, where she has surrounded herself with a number of excellent voices some of her students being professional singers.

Robert Craig Campbell, the tenor, who has been singing in public for some time, is at present coaching with Mme Rolla, and among the young women students with especially fine voices is Miss Graham, who has a rich contralto voice, well trained under Mme. Rolla's care.

Aside from the advantage of having sung for many years in public, Mme. Rolla is a capable pianist, and is in consequence a thoroughly efficient accompanist for her pupils. Although Mme. Rolla is an American, life and study abroad have made her a fluent linguist, so that she is able to teach the Italian aria, impart the German lied as well as the French chanson. Mme. Rolla does not permit herself to take many pupils, as she wishes to devote ample time to those who are fortunate enough to be under her tuition.

"QUO VADIS." Dramatic scenes for soli, chorus, orchestra and organ. Book by A. Jüngst, English version by Grace Hall, music composed by Felix Nowowicjski.

This volume of 317 pages contains the complete vocal portions of the work, a great deal of the organ part and a condensed piano arrangement of the full orchestral score, with the names of the leading instruments indicated. This work has had an enthusiastic reception wherever it has been performed. The attention of American choral directors is earnestly called to this excellent edition of a remarkable work. "Quo Vadis?" has the advantage of a story which is familiar to everybody. Its appeal will therefore be far more direct than can be the attraction of an unfamiliar drama which has to be learned from the program book during the performance of the music.

"THE CHOIRTRAINER'S ART." By A. Madeley Richardson.

This volume is by an organist and choirmaster who has had a long and varied experience in church work in a country where church music is especially well cultivated, England. It is divided into three parts, and sub-divided into eleven chapters. The principal subjects treated in the book are: Choirs, power of music, choirmaster, management of boys, men, women singers, practice room, rehearsals, English and American boys, methods of production, tone, resonance, directions for standing, vowel equality, consonants, muscles, habits, humming exercise, agility exercises, scales, trills, sight reading, use of hymns, training of altos, church music, words, ritual music, choral style, plain song, monotones, advances in England and America, versicles and responses, litany, psalm chanting, Merbecke, Tallis, bars, unison chanting, anachronisms, time beating, accuracy and expression, hymns the choirmaster's great opportunity, anthems, services.

The author has related in a simple, direct and conversational manner many of his experiences as a choirmaster and has produced a work of prime importance to church choir trainers in particular and choral conductors in general.

A. Madeley Richardson, the author, is an Oxford Doctor of Music, a Fellow of the Royal College of Organists, and for twelve years was organist and director of the choir of Southwark Cathedral, London. At present he is devoting his skill and experience to the improvement of church music in Newport, R. I. It is his American experience which has enabled him to compare and contrast American and English boys as material for boy choirs.

"SONGS." By Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

There are four of these new songs, which are as far removed in style from the popular ballad as it is possible to be. If there is any fault to be found with them it is that there is nothing distinctively American in them. The music is written to German texts and the music is as German as the words are. From an art point of view this is the highest praise. But there is not the slightest insinuation of plagiarism. There are no phrases that are distinctly Brahms, Schumann or Wolf. A style compounded of these three might have furnished the manner in which these four new songs are written, though the actual melodies and accompaniments are the product of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

The names of the songs are: "Ein Altes Gebet" ("An Old Prayer"), "Deine Blumen" ("Flowers and Fate"), "Grossmütterchen" ("With Granny"), "Der Totenkranz" ("The Children's Thanks"). An English translation accompanies each song.

White-Smith Publishing Company, Boston.

TWO SONGS: "WHEN MY LADDIE TURNS BACK HAME," "REINCARNATE." By Charles Wakefield Cadman.

In the first of these the composer has succeeded very well in imitating the Scotch style, not merely in the catch, but in the general spirit of the melody. Purists may object to the free use of consecutive octaves and fifths in a style which is not modern, but that, of course, is only a matter of taste.

The second song is an impassioned setting of a passionate poem, in which both words and music are happily mated. Both of these songs are worthy of the composer and should enjoy a lasting success.

John Church Company, New York.

"A SONG CYCLE OF LOVE." Poems by John Proctor Mills, music by Charles Gilbert Spross.

These songs are named "To You," "Love Me," "Tomorrow You Will Love Me," "Ah! Since You Love Me." They are all melodious and vocal, like the rest of the works by this experienced song writer and accompanist. In the first song the piano has an accompaniment of sweeping arpeggios admirably suited to the nature of the melody. The second song has the stately rhythm of a sarabande, but with modern harmonies. The third song is a graceful and entrancing waltz, in which the voice and the piano carry on a melody duet throughout the entire number. The fourth song is rapid and full of animated expression. This song cycle of love is published for high and for low voice. It ought to please an audience extremely when it is properly interpreted.

Sieveking Invents Piano Improvements.

Martinue Sieveking, who is still attending strictly to business in Paris, notwithstanding the war, and even has some pupils from America, sends a very interesting letter to the MUSICAL COURIER, a portion of which is published below. Sievcking is as great a thinker as a piano player, and some improvements which he has invented for the piano are bound to be used sooner or later; for instance, a slight incline to the white keys, which makes fingering very much easier, especially in playing the chromatic scale; also, the placing of the two pedals fifteen inches apart from one another, which makes it impossible for a pianist to lose his balance, no matter how far he has to reach to either end of the keyboard.

The accompanying snapshot shows the remarkable resemblance between the hands of Rubinstein and Sieveking, and the quotation from the latter's letter follows:

"The hand of Rubinstein is taken from a plaster cast in the Petrograd Museum. It is a well known fact that Rubinstein never played correctly, on account of his hand being too large for the present keyboard. He complained that the tips of his fingers were too broad to get between the black keys, so he asked Becker (piano manufacturer in Petrograd) to make the black keys smaller. But that had a worse result, for he did not feel any surface any more under his fingers, but the idea of having a larger keyboard made did not occur to him. 'I cannot wear women's shoes or gloves, but I have to play on a keyboard which suited the time of Cristofori (1703),' he said, and at that time the smaller instruments, as virginals, spinetto, clavecembalo were only used as an amusement for ladies. Every part of the piano has been improved or altered, as the hammers, double escape (Sebastian Erard), sostenuto pedal (Debain), cross strings (Steinway), steel frame, and the size has been increased, but the keyboard has not changed."

Sororities Honor Christine Miller.

Before Christine Miller sailed for Europe last spring she was elected an honorary member of Beta Pi Omega sorority, through the Alpha Chapter in Cincinnati. On her return to America this fall, and after her recital in Detroit before the members of the Wellesley Club, the Delta Chapter of Sigma Alpha Iota sorority conferred a similar honor upon this popular American contralto.

Miss Miller's season began—as has been noted—immediately upon her arrival from Germany on the steamer Potsdam, November 3, and her bookings have kept her very busy since then. On December 11 Miss Miller will make her first appearance in Portland, Me., under the auspices of Will C. Macfarlane, the municipal organist. On this occasion, she will sing several of Mr. Macfarlane's songs,

Mrs. Beach in the West.

A representative of the MUSICAL COURIER saw Mrs. H. H. A. Beach in Chicago recently while she was en route to Kansas City (where the following evening she was to give a recital, assisted by Marcella Craft, soprano), and the composer had some interesting things to say on the outcome of this year as a musical season. "I think this year ought to be very good," commented Mrs. Beach, "as I understand that crops have been especially good and farmers are getting more money for their grain than ever before in the history of this country, and, in order to make the world's equilibrium even, the unhappiness of Europe should bring prosperity to this country. As far as the concert season is concerned, of course I must judge chiefly by my own prospects. I have now enough dates to be quite satisfied, especially as I want some of my time left for composition. Tomorrow night I appear at the Schubert Club in Kansas City with Marcella Craft. In Boston I will give a recital of my own compositions on December 16, with Mme. Fricke and the Hoffman Quartet assisting. I will play then two new piano works from manuscript which I composed while in Munich. Mme. Frick will sing also several new compositions from my pen with English and German texts, and at the end of the program we will perform my piano quintet. Other dates already secured are Portland, Me., where I will be assisted by Lafayette Goodbar, soprano, and early in February I am booked to appear in Detroit and Columbus."

Mrs. Beach informed the representative, too, that she is an honorary member of the Browning Club in Boston, the membership having been offered to her after one of the annual Browning receptions, which take place every year on May 7. Upon her admission to the club Mrs. Beach dedicated to that organization her Browning cycle, including the very popular "Year's at the Spring."

Alice Preston's Musicale Tea.

Alice Preston gave on Wednesday, November 18, at Garden City, L. I., the first of a series of teas at which a number of interesting voices were heard. Mrs. Stilson Hutchins, who possesses a beautiful mezzo soprano, sang a group of songs by Brahms, and of Amherst Webber. The wife of the Brazilian Minister to Japan, Mme. Regis de Oliveira, an accomplished musician of the French school, sang a number of her own compositions and some modern French songs with great charm and a voice of exquisite quality.

Among those present were: Mr. and Mrs. Eloy Martinez, of Havana; Mr. and Mrs. de Menocal, Mrs. Paul Morton, Mrs. Stuart Duncan, Zia Bey, Maria de Barril, Mrs. Owen Johnson, Lucrezia Bori, Harriet Ware, Helena Augustin, Mrs. Mortimer Flagg, Mrs. Cornelius Wagstaff Remsen, Mrs. Albert Sterner, Mrs. Guy Scull, Mr. and Mrs. Imre de J. Herczeg, Robert Keeling, Chevalier de Finnochiars, Walter Bogert and Childe Hassan.

KANSAS CITY ORCHESTRA ENTERS ON FOURTH SEASON.

Some New Faces Appear Among the Players—Orchestra Seems Improved—Metropolitan Opera Singers in Concert—Schubert Club Men's Chorus Heard—Other Events.

Kansas City, Mo., November 27, 1914.

The fourth season of concerts by the Kansas City Symphony Orchestra opened Monday afternoon, November 2, at the Shubert Theatre. A number of new faces appeared among the players. The general tone of the orchestra seemed improved. Especially satisfying was the addition made among the first violins. The program opened with a creditable rendition of Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3. The Haydn symphony in D major did not reach up to the spontaneous "ausgelasenheit" so necessary in Haydn. In the "Vorspiel to Godoleva," by Tinel, the enthusiasm returned. It was a splendid reading on balance and contrast, and reflected credit upon Carl Busch in his masterly handling of the score. Henri Shostad appeared for the first time as concertmaster.

Margarete Matzenauer, soloist of the occasion, sang here for the first time. She gave us a rich feast of splendid singing in the aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio" and "Senta's Ballad" from "The Flying Dutchman," which she was obliged to repeat. Officially no encores are allowed, but when the audience refuses to hear the rest of the program until the singer is heard again, the rule is broken. The program was concluded by Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre" and Ippolitow-Ivanow's "Caucasian Sketches," affording Hans Peterson, solo viola, and Carlo di Nardo, English horn, opportunity for a charming duet.

Metropolitan Opera Singers in Concert.

The Shriners made their annual contribution to the musical life of the city recently at Convention Hall in the form of a concert of operatic music by four Metropolitan Opera singers—Antonio Scotti, baritone; Anna Case, soprano; Sophie Braslau, contralto, and Giovanni Martinelli, tenor. Anna Case proved a delightful singer, sweet to look at and beautiful to hear. Sophie Braslau scored a success. Martinelli won the audience at once with his fine tenor voice. Altogether the concert was a huge success.

A Faculty Concert.

Members of the faculty of the Horner Institute of Fine Arts gave their opening concert in the auditorium of the Athenæum Club House, recently. Earl Rosenberg, director of the school and head of the voice department, revealed a fine baritone voice in a large group of songs. Three songs by Erick J. Wolff were new and very interesting. In the singing of the Handel songs Mr. Rosenberg gave evidence of good schooling and much individual taste in his interpretation. Floyd Robbins, pianist, gave ample evidence of years of study with leading teachers. His playing of the Brahms scherzo was especially good. Forrest Schultz, violinist, added much to the musical value of the program.

Mrs. MacDowell's Lecture-Recital.

Through the initiative of the Kansas City Musical Club we had the privilege of coming into close communion with Mrs. Edward MacDowell. Those few hours were of real inspiration to all lovers of MacDowell's music and there are many of them here. The needs of the MacDowell Association, which seem to have fallen on the slender shoulders of Mrs. MacDowell awakened response in the form of many wishing to help. At least one MacDowell Club is to be formed with the idea of contributing money. But more of it later. At the end of the lecture Mrs. MacDowell played a long program of request numbers in her charming informal way, giving new lights and shades to much we have known so long and well.

Schubert Club Chorus and Maud Powell.

Last week the Schubert Club Men's Chorus gave the first of three concerts for the season. Clarence D. Sears is entering upon his third year as musical director. The novelties for male chorus by Bliss, "The Redman's Death Chant" and the "Plainsman's Song" were a pleasure to hear. Maud Powell, violinist, assisted in a generous program of her own. From her superb playing of the Wieniawski concerto in D minor, to the end of her program, the big audience was with her. Nothing could be more exquisite than the Powell playing of the Nardini larghetto. Mme. Powell was splendidly accompanied by Francis Moore.

Helen Ware En Route.

Helen Ware, the young American violinist who is making her third concert tour, was in town over Thanksgiving en route from Emporia, Kansas (where she played in the State Normal School) to Houston, Texas, where she plays tonight. Kansas City hopes to hear her in March.

Louise Parker's Studio Musicale.

Louise Parker gave a musicale in her beautiful studio last Saturday. Miss Parker has the unique distinction of ST. LOUIS OPERA AND CONCERTS.

Symphony Orchestra Programs—A MacDowell Lecture-Recital—Apollo Club Concert and Various Affairs Spell Activity in Musical Circles—Formation of Large Chorus Contemplated.

St. Louis, Mo., November 27, 1914.

The local season of grand opera was successfully concluded Saturday night, November 21. "Martha" was given Friday and Saturday afternoons. Friday a special matinee performance brought out 1,700 children. Friday evening "Trovatore" was presented to a large and appreciative audience. Mme. Gerville-Reache as Azucena scored a success. Saturday evening "Rigoletto" was presented. Constantino, the tenor, was assisted by the leading principals of the San Carlo Opera Company.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Friday matinee program, November 20, of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra consisted of a symphony by Beethoven, a piano concerto by Schumann and a symphonic poem by Liszt. The soloist was Carl Friedberg, pianist, who played Schumann's concerto in A minor in a poetical and masterly manner. The soloist and the orchestra cooperated in fine style. Mr. Friedberg was recalled a number of times. The performance of the orchestra was excellent.

SUNDAY "POP."

Minna Nieman, who has just returned from her studies abroad, won new honors last Sunday at the "Pop" concert. Miss Nieman played the first and second movements of Saint-Saëns' piano concerto in G minor with orchestral accompaniment. She has matured into an artist, she has a facile technic, and her phrasing is excellent. Miss Nieman played as an encore "Soiree de Vienne," by Schubert-Liszt. Conductor Max Zach presented an interesting program, including a Grieg number, the "Faust" fantasie and two first time numbers.

REBEKAH LEVY SONG RECITAL.

Rebekah Levy, of the Kroeger School faculty, gave a very successful song recital last Tuesday evening at the United Hebrew Congregation Church.

MRS. MACDOWELL'S LECTURE.

An instructive and enjoyable lecture-recital was given Monday evening at the Wednesday Club Auditorium under the auspices of the Theta Chapter Mu Phi Epsilon, by Mrs. Edward MacDowell, the subject being "MacDowell and His Ideals." Mrs. MacDowell illustrated her lecture with stereopticon views. At the close Mrs. MacDowell gave a request program of twelve or more MacDowell piano works, in addition to her other piano solos, embracing compositions by the lamented composer.

ST. LOUIS PAGEANT CHORAL SOCIETY.

It is planned to have this the biggest mixed civic chorus in existence. A meeting was attended yesterday by representative men and women, most of whom were active workers in the pageant and masque. The chorus at the first concert, November 30, will sing the music of the "Masque of St. Louis." The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra will play the "March of the Pioneers," by E. R. Kroeger, of St. Louis. The soloist will be Stella De Mette, of this city, now singing with the San Carlo Grand Opera Company.

APOLLO CLUB CONCERT.

The first private concert this season of the Apollo Club was given last evening at the Odeon to a capacity audience. Helen Stanley, soprano, who was to have sung, was taken suddenly ill at the last moment, so the club substituted Marie Caslova, the young St. Louis violinist, and Francis Ingram, contralto of the Chicago Opera Company. The concert opened with "Courage and Faith" (Meyerbeer-Silver), which was sung magnificently. Miss Caslova displayed an abundance of technic and a fine mellow tone. For an encore she performed Ethel Barnes' "Swing Song."

Miss Ingram has a powerful and rich contralto voice. She sang with pathos and her vocalism, together with graceful manners, delighted the audience. John Doane presided at the piano. The chorus closed with "Reveries" (A. M. Storch) and "Margarita" (G. W. Chadwick), sung in an effective manner. "The Forest King" (Stange) was given as an encore. Mr. Galloway, as usual, proved to be a gifted and talented conductor.

MAY BIRDIE DITZLER.

THE Chickering is well called "The Musician's Piano." Those whose judgment on musical matters is authoritative beyond question, are not chary of their praise for the Chickering.

It has been so for more than ninety years and it is so today. Leaders in the world of music invariably recognize the superior tone qualities, the sympathetic interpretation of this noble instrument.

To own a

Chickering
Piano

is to have a piano which is more than a decorative combination of sound producing mechanisms. It is to own a musical instrument with a glorious history of achievement behind it. It is to own a piano whose possession is proof of the deepest appreciation of all that is best in music.

NEW YORK BREVITIES.

Topping-Patterson Recital — Massell Pupils' Heard—Hauser-Saslavsky Concert—Langevin Sings—Hotel Bossert Costume Recital—Nobel Organ Program—Tollefsen at Columbia University—Samoiloff Students to Sing To-Night—Lenox Academy Affairs—Notes.

Elizabeth K. Patterson and Elizabeth Topping united in a recital at the Patterson residence studios, December 3. The spacious parlors were well filled with an audience much interested in the singing of Miss Patterson's pupils, Geraldine Holland, Frankie Holland, Agnes Walters, Estelle Leask and the brilliant piano playing of Miss Topping. Estelle Leask has a pleasing voice and an ingratiating style. Agnes Walters' voice is one of much promise, and Geraldine Holland has been frequently mentioned as one of Miss Patterson's most artistic singers. Miss Topping, the pianist, has "the grand style," plays with repose and controlled emotional interpretation. Following each of her solos she had to play encores.

Massell Pupils Sing.

J. Massell, the vocal instructor, gave his second pupils' recital November 28, at his Metropolitan Opera House studios. Several professional pupils appeared, among them Helen Heineman, who recently sang Josephine in "Pinafore," at the Hippodrome. Following her appearance as Josephine other lucrative openings came to her. Lenore Sherwin has an exquisite soprano voice, and, like Miss Heineman, sang songs by Hallet Gilberté, the composer at the piano. Others participating were Sarah Turitz, who sang an aria from "Samson and Delilah"; Miss Levin, Miss Banks and Miss Goldsmied, who sang American and Italian songs.

Hauser-Saslavsky Concert.

The pianist, Isabel Hauser, and the Saslavsky String Quartet united in a concert at Aeolian Hall, December 2. The quartet played a "Prize Work," composed in 1891 by Joseph Miroslav Weber, this work having won first prize at a competition of chamber music held in Petrograd, in 1892; Brahms' sonata in D minor for violin and piano, and Saint-Saëns' piano quartet, op. 41. The climax of the concert was undoubtedly the Saint-Saëns work, in which the beautiful harmonies of the music and the competent cooperation of the participating artists secured very artistic results. There was a good sized audience in attendance.

Orphee Langevin Recital.

Orphee Langevin, the baritone, established in New York after six years continuous work abroad, is a sympathetic artist and was the principal soloist at a musicale given for charitable purposes at Carnegie Lyceum, December 1. His clear, resonant voice, of rare timbre and dramatic power, rang through the varied emotions of pity, love, joy and sorrow, as required by his well chosen program. Those who were his privileged listeners hope to hear him again.

Hotel Bossert Second Costume Recital.

Maude Ethel Jones, chansoneuse; Tomijiro Asai, Japanese tenor; Antonia Griffin, harpist; William Morris Kincaid, flutist, with Woodruff Rogers at the piano, gave a costume recital at the Hotel Bossert, Brooklyn, November 30, which was particularly interesting because of the Oriental character of the affair. Miss Jones wore both the native dress of the usual Japanese lady, and later a Chinese costume. Mr. Asai pleased the audience especially with his little talks before each selection, singing them all in his native tongue. The playing of the flute and harp also interested the audience, affording a welcome relief from the Oriental coloring of the program. Woodruff Rogers played accompaniments with unusual skill and the recital was well attended.

Noble Organ Recitals.

December 3, T. Tertius Noble gave a recital, the thirtieth, in a course of recitals of the American Guild of Organists, New England Chapter, at Emmanuel Church, Boston. Mr. Noble played works by living composers, including his own toccata and fugue in F minor. Concerning this work, the following annotation on the Boston program is of special interest:

This piece was written in 1889 at the request of the late W. T. Best, the following remarks from a letter by him written June 12, 1889, may be of some interest: "Having glanced over your crowded twelve stave paper, I am compelled to give an unfavorable opinion, the toccata has no development, there are fine chord passages, interrupted throughout by others in a delirium of demisemiquavers till the chords re-enter again in a stern sort of way, rebuking the cat-like frivolity of your proceedings on the swell that is full. The fugue subject is a halting one, and not of a melodious turn, this you have worked out well, but academic fugues are not required these days." For a number of years this composition was laid aside, but a few years ago was taken up by a London firm, and since its publication has enjoyed considerable popularity.

Sunday evening, December 13, at 8 o'clock, Mr. Noble and May Muckle, cellist, will give a joint recital at St. Thomas' P. E. Church, Fifty-third street and Fifth avenue. Mr. Noble says: "I think this will be very fine, as she is certainly one of the finest performers to be found in any country today." The festival chorus, under Mr. Noble's direction, is making excellent progress. The German Requiem will have its performance under Mr. Noble's direction at an early date.

Tollefsen Trio at Columbia University.

The Tollefsen Trio, consisting of Mme. Schnabel-Tollefsen, pianist; Carl H. Tollefsen, violinist, and William Durieux, cellist, gave a concert of chamber music at Horace Mann Auditorium, Columbia University, November 28. Three trios were performed wholly or in part, with solos by the three instrumentalists, each of whom had to give an encore. Prominent on the program was an andante espressioso by Cornelius Rübner, Mus. Doc., dean of the department of music at Columbia University.

Samoiloff Students' Recital.

Lazar S. Samoiloff announces a song recital by the pupils of the Samoiloff Bel Canto Studios, December 9, at 8 o'clock, at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, when a program of fourteen numbers, consisting of songs and operatic arias, ensemble music, etc., will be performed.

Lenox Academy of Music Items.

The Lenox Academy of Music, H. H. Reppert, director, announces a concert at school headquarters, 172 East 117th street, Sunday, December 20. Wednesday evening, January 27, a concert will be given at the Central Opera House, when Mr. Reppert will also play a violin solo. Ensemble and solo numbers by members of the faculty and students will make an interesting program. The interested visitor at this institution finds all departments busy, and the director, his mother and four assistants training instrumental and vocal students. There are classes in sight singing, sight reading, musical dictation, etc., all of which shows the thoroughness of the training received. The school is open evenings all the year. Players of string and wind instruments are invited to join the orchestra, there being a few vacancies. Another concert will be given November 17, at Central Baptist Church.

Notes.

Clifford Demorest, F. A. G. O., began a series of six free organ recitals at the Church of the Messiah, Park avenue and Thirty-fourth street, December 3. Mr. Demorest has probably never played better than in the allegro from the sixth symphony by Widor. Following the recital there was an informal meeting of the Guild of Organists in the lecture room, when R. Huntington Woodman read a paper on "Musical Tradition: Does It Help or Hinder?" The next recital in the guild series takes place today, December 9, noon, at Trinity Church, and is given by Moritz E. Schwarz. The remainder of five recitals by Mr. Demorest will occur Thursday afternoons, at 4 o'clock, December 10, December 17, January 7, January 14 and January 21.

The Fraternal Association of Musicians held its regular monthly meeting, Tuesday, December 1, at the home of Edward W. Berge, West End avenue, when a program somewhat out of the ordinary was given. Augustine Ohol, of India, arrayed in Hindu costume, gave an illustrated lecture on "The Land of the Moguls and the Rajahs," with interesting descriptions of Hindu life and customs, and Mabel Owen sang several operatic arias. Mr. Ohol's account of the elaborate ceremonies attending the "toilet of the gods," which are performed every day in Hindu temples, to the accompaniment of special music designed for each phase of the rites, was of unique interest to his hearers.

Tomorrow (Thursday), December 10, at 8 o'clock, there will be a gathering of the National Association of Organists at Janes M. E. Church, Brooklyn. Following the recital a luncheon will be served in the church parlors. Arthur Scott Brook is the president of the association.

Bertha Garver-Sisson, contralto, sang for a time at Grace M. E. Church, where she made many friends. A circular issued by her contains press notices quoted from newspapers of Cincinnati, Richmond, Cleveland and New York.

Robert J. Winterbottom, A. G. O., has issued a folder containing press notices from Brooklyn, Chautauqua and elsewhere. The critics all agree that Mr. Winterbottom is a masterly player. His pedal technic is especially mentioned.

Zilpha Barnes Wood announces a competitive examination for free scholarship in vocal music today, December 9, at 3 p. m., at Carnegie Hall.

Amy Grant continues her Thursday afternoon reception musicales from 4 to 7 o'clock weekly. December 3, Florence de Courcy, contralto, was the special soloist, singing a series of French songs with charming interpretation and attractive expression. Elmer Zoller was at the piano, also playing enjoyable solos.

L. Uribe's opera concert at Berkeley Theatre, November 29, brought forward several artist-pupils who sing well, as well as this teacher himself. He sang the "Trovatore" duet with Anita Gilman, both being in costume; the solo tenor part in the "Rigoletto" quartet and the same part in the duet from "Aida," showing a fine, real tenor voice, coupled with warm temperament. Daisy M. Fisher, Lucila de Aragon, Lyla MacNames and Signor Ingrassia, Frank Oglesby and Warren Rishel were the other singers, all showing the excellent schooling received under Signor Uribe. Philip Morrell, pupil of J. M. Gegna, contributed well played violin solos, and an interested audience applauded with vigor. Bethune Grigor supported with artistic piano accompaniments.

Erie Symphony Season Opens.

Under the spirited direction of Franz Kohler, the Erie Symphony Orchestra recently gave its first concert before an audience which completely filled the Park Opera House, Erie, Pa., and which tendered the musicians and their capable conductor an enthusiastic welcome. The feature of the concert was the playing of the "Rustic Wedding" symphony by Goldmark, which was given a sympathetic rendering at the hands of Mr. Kohler. Saint-Saëns' "Le Deluge" ranked second, perhaps, as a favorite with the audience, while Ippolitow-Ivanow's "Cortege du Sedare," with its Slavonic rhythm and characteristic pageantry, seemed to thrill the entire audience with its barbaric spirit. The other numbers for the orchestra alone were the overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and three dances from Germann's "Henry VIII."

Josephine Bonazzi was the piano soloist, giving the first movement of Grieg's concerto for the piano, op. 16, with orchestral accompaniment, and displaying an excellent technic and care in her interpretations. Mrs. James Neeld played the violin solo in the Saint-Saëns number with much charm. The vocalist was Mrs. Charles McKean, who gave "Hear Ye, Oh Israel," from the "Elijah," accompanied by Mrs. Neeld and Marie Miller, harpist.

The concert was a great success and the next one, which will take place in January, is looked forward to with great interest by the music lovers of Erie and vicinity.

The credit for this concert and for the organization of the Erie Symphony Orchestra is due to Franz Kohler, who by his earnest efforts has successfully presented to the music lovers of Erie and vicinity the need of an organization of this kind. It is to be hoped that he will receive the same loyal support throughout the season as that which marked the recent concert, and which he most justly deserves.

Lucile Collette Heard in New York.

In addition to her appearance as soloist at a concert at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, November 27, a review of which appeared in the Musical Courier of last week, Lucile Collette, the young violinist, was heard at Hotel Astor, New York, on December 4, and with the Greek Society at the Palm Garden on December 6. This gifted young artist, whose appearance is marked with a naive charm, will appear again at the Waldorf-Astoria on December 15.

Florence Austin's Violin Recital.

December 3 Florence Austin gave a matinee violin recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, playing the program printed in the MUSICAL COURIER last week. Like Gabrilowitsch, Miss Austin is to be commended for her prompt beginning of the recital. Her first number, Handel's sonata, in A major, was played with classic repose and steadiness. An achievement for both the violinist and her assistant at the piano, Edna Rothwell, was the Goldmark suite in E major; particularly charming was the third movement. The highest possible tones for the violin were, however, in the andante, which came out clearly and well. Miss Austin played the work from memory without a slip, and Miss Rothwell's playing was altogether satisfying.

Vieuxtemps' concerto in D minor is one of Miss Austin's best interpretations, the first movement sounding quite as if improvised. Her tone in the adiagio religioso and the technical difficulties in the martial final movement brought her recalls, when she played a waltz-like movement in G major, by Zdenko Fibich. Sweetly sentimental music was "Souvenir," by Weitzel, and "Sweet Fern," by Burleigh. "The Fisherman," by Burleigh, had to be repeated. These short compositions are all dedicated to Miss Austin. There were all manner of musical fireworks in the "Capriccio Valse," by Wieniawski, including double stopping, legato and spiccato, serving to show her splendid technic. This brought her an encore, when she played her teacher's (Ovide Musin) waltz. The spring-like day created a warm atmosphere inside the concert room, and every violinist knows that this is not conducive to a violin remaining in tune. Following the recital the greenroom was crowded with many people prominent in the musical and social world, bringing Miss Austin, "America's Violinist," warm congratulations, among them Amy Fay, Henry Schradieck, Nestor of the violin teachers of America, and others.

Following are the names of some of those who occupied boxes at Florence Austin's recital: Mr. and Mrs. Ovide Musin, Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Reid, Florence Foster Jenkins, Mr. and Mme. Sapio, Dr. Julia Seaton, Clara Wilson Thompson, Mrs. Leith Macgregor, Mrs. Carmen, Henry Mildred Dilling's Appearances.

Mildred Dilling, harpist, will appear in a joint recital with Henri la Bonti, tenor, in Cortland, N. Y., this evening, Wednesday, December 9. This will be the second concert in the Sutorius Course in Cortland. The first concert was given by the Russian Symphony Orchestra. The third will present Mme. Schumann-Heink to a Cortland audience.

Sunday evening, December 6, a musicale will be given by Mr. Hochstein, violinist, late of Berlin, and Mildred Dilling, harpist, at the residence of Mrs. Karl Bitter, New York.

Maurice Aronson Returns to America.

After an absence of eleven years from America in the pursuit of a most successful pedagogic activity in Berlin and Vienna, the pianist pedagogue, Maurice Aronson, returned last Wednesday to America, accompanied by his wife, the concert pianist, Vera Kaplun-Aronson, and their little daughter, Astrid.

During his long pedagogic activity in Chicago and in Europe, Mr. Aronson has established such an excellent reputation as an instructor of piano playing and as an editor of piano music as not to need any reintroduction to MUSICAL COURIER readers. His talented wife has appeared in European music centers with success and everywhere has been recognized as a pianist of high attainments.

Mr. and Mrs. Aronson will establish themselves in Chicago, where their presence is sure to make itself felt worthily.

As soon as certain managerial details are completed (announcements of which will be made in these columns),

MAURICE ARONSON AND VERA KAPLUN-ARONSON.

Vera Kaplun-Aronson is to enter upon her first American concert tour. She comes highly endorsed and recommended by Alexander Glazounow, director of the Imperial Russian Conservatory of St. Petersburg, and bears also the following letter of introduction from Camillo Hildebrand, conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra:

"During the winter season 1913-1914 Vera Kaplun-Aronson gave a concert with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin under my direction. Upon this occasion I learned to know in Vera Kaplun-Aronson a most excellent pianist, whose playing bears the stamp of high art. Her musicianship as well as her technic and conception are in a rare degree fascinating. I have no doubt that Vera Kaplun-Aronson will achieve equal success in the new world.

Richard Knotts as the Wizard.

In the accompanying picture is shown Richard Knotts, the baritone and vocal instructor, of Pittsburgh, as he appears in the role of the Wizard in the musical extravaganza, "The College Hero," which was presented at the Schenley Theatre, Pittsburgh, during the week beginning November 30, with six evening performances and two matinees. Over 700 took part in this production, making it the largest event of the kind ever held in Pittsburgh.

Rubinstein Club Concert.

Tuesday evening, December 8, occurred the first concert of this, the twenty-sixth, season of the Rubinstein Club, Mrs. William Rogers Chapman, president. This concert was given in the usual place, the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, under the direction of William Rogers Chapman.

Lucy Yates, coloratura soprano, of the Berlin Royal Opera, and Edouardo Ferrari-Fontana, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, were the soloists.

Part songs made up the numbers of the choral members.

Because this concert took place too late for review in this issue, the extended report will be deferred until next week.

A Huss Musicale.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Holden Huss have issued invitations for an informal musicale at Studio 61 in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Monday afternoon, December 14, at 4 o'clock.

Bloomfield Zeisler-Ware Joint Recital.

Emporia, Kan., November 21, 1914.

One of the musical treats of the season was given the music lovers of Emporia last evening by Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler and Helen Ware, who gave a joint recital under the auspices of the Emporia Normal School. Seldom does an Emporia audience become as enthusiastic in expressing its appreciation. These two artists were applauded without reserve from the beginning to the end of the concert.

Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler opened the program with the Beethoven sonata, op. 57. This composition was rendered with the broad conception and spiritual as well as emotional powers that characterize all of her playing. Fatigue seems an unknown quantity to this artist, for all through her program one perceives the same inexhaustible store of energy.

The sonata was followed by an interesting group played by Helen Ware, the interpreter of Hungarian and Slav music.

In the "Ballade," Dvorák, and "Hungarian Dance," Brahms-Joachim, Helen Ware gave abundant evidence of the wonderful emotional as well as poetic powers that have given her such prominence in the violinistic world.

The Chopin group played by Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler, by its originality of conception and brilliant technic, once again proved her eminence as a musician as well as pianist.

In her second group, Helen Ware scored with the "Ave Maria," from Schubert-Wilhelmj; her own arrangement of a beautiful Hungarian love song, and the "Carmen Phantasy" by her master, Hubay, proved of strong contrast emotionally as well as technically.

In the "Ave Maria," Miss Ware entered into the prayerful spirit. Her double stops were even and the climaxes rousing. The Hungarian love song proved a musical gem. In the last part the double harmonics were played without a flaw and with great ease.

Her last number, the "Carmen Phantasy," gave this spirited young artist ample opportunities to display the fine nuances of her musicianly phrasing, as well as her true appreciation of contrasts in her art.

The intricate and difficult passage work of the finale was played with bravure and a pliable fluent technic.

As an encore Miss Ware played the "Tambourin Chinoise," by Kreisler, and the melodious "Scotch Pastorale," by Saenger.

Mme. Zeisler's brilliantly rendered "Arabesques" on the Strauss "Blue Danube" waltzes, brought to an end one of the most successful concerts ever given under the auspices of the Emporia Normal School.

Pietro A. Yon Introduces Novelties.

Pietro A. Yon will perform the following program on December 13, at St. Francis Xavier Church, New York:

Prelude, Toccata e Fuga.....T. Tertius Noble
Mass in E flat.....Bimboni
Proper of the Third Sunday of Advent.....Gregorian
Postlude, Finale in D minor.....Matthews
Prelude, Theme and Variations.....Bonnet
Vespers of the Third Sunday of Advent.....Gregorian
Hymn.....Choral
Alma Redemptoris.....Grassi
Motet, Salve Regina.....P. A. Yon
O Salutaris.....P. A. Yon
Tantum Ergo.....P. A. Yon
Postlude, Toccata in E minor.....De la Tombelle

"Toccata e Fuga," by T. T. Noble, organist of St. Thomas' Church, New York, is brilliant and classic in form.

The mass in E flat by Bimboni is unique in style, exceedingly modern and very melodious, bringing new effects of mysticism with new harmonic combinations, and free and effective counterpoint.

Mrs. Willis E. Bacheller's Pupil Scores.

Sara Fuller, coloratura soprano, and pupil of Mrs. W. E. Bacheller, won her audience at a concert on Saturday evening, November 28, in Forward Auditorium, New York. Her numbers were Gluck's "Dolce Ardor" and "Ah fors' e lui" from "Traviata," in both of which she displayed excellent tone and control. She received much applause and responded with the following encores: "The Butterfly," by Noel, and Arditi's ever popular "Il Baccio." Miss Fuller's singing is another convincing evidence of the good work accomplished at the Bacheller studio.

Beethoven Society Musicale.

The Beethoven Society, Mrs. James Daniel Mortimer, president, will give its next musicale, followed by dancing, on Saturday, December 12, in the Astor Gallery of the Waldorf-Astoria, New York. A reception will be held at 2 p. m., followed by the musicale at 2.30 p. m. The program will consist of numbers by the American String Quartet, Katherine Lurch, contralto, and De Los Becker, tenor. Harry M. Gilbert will be the accompanist.

Harold Bauer's Recital.

On Saturday afternoon, December 5, Harold Bauer played a program of Chopin compositions to an audience which filled every part of Aeolian Hall, New York. Comment on this well known artist's performance is hardly necessary, as Harold Bauer's Chopin interpretations are familiar to the musical public.

The program was as follows: Etude in C minor, op. 25; three posthumous etudes, fantasie, op. 49; sonata, op. 35; ballades in F minor and A flat, barcarolle, nocturne in C minor, scherzo in B flat minor. The octave etude in G flat and the E minor valse were added as encores.

OBITUARY.

John Chatterton.

Under the foregoing caption few persons will recognize Signor Perugini, the name the old time tenor used when he was on the stage. Signor Perugini, to give him the title most familiar in association with him, died last week at the Forrest Home for Actors, in Pennsylvania. He was sixty years old. Born in England, he first became known here when he sang with the McCall Opera Company, after he had been appearing in Europe in grand opera. He later also sang with Patti at the Metropolitan, and finally became a member of the Casino cast, where he met Lillian Russell and married her, in 1894. The couple subsequently were divorced. Signor Perugini was a man of genial disposition and gentle ways, and had a host of good friends in New York, where he resided until about a year ago.

Charles de Beriot.

M. Charles de Bériot, the celebrated pianist and esteemed composer, has passed away, aged eighty-one, in his daughter's home at the Château de Courtempierre, at Sceaux-du-Gâtinais (Loiret). He was for fifteen years professor of one of the upper classes at the Conservatory.

M. Charles de Bériot was born in Paris, son of the illustrious singer, Mme. Garcia-Malibran, whose second husband was de Bériot, the celebrated Belgian violinist-composer, author of many standard methods and concertos.

Richard Heuberger.

Richard Heuberger, the Vienna composer and writer, died in that city recently, aged sixty-four. He was born in Graz, June 18, 1850. Aside from the fact that he wrote a successful comic opera, "The Opera Ball," the ballet "Struwelpeter" and the folk opera "Barfüssele," he also was a teacher at the Vienna Conservatory, conductor of several singing societies and music critic, at various times, on the Vienna Tageblatt, Neue Freie Presse and Neue Musikalische Presse.

Ignaz Haroldi.

Ignaz Haroldi, a Polish violinist, who toured the United States a few years ago, died recently at Los Angeles, Cal.

STEINWAY

¶ Your long-cherished desire to own a Steinway Grand may now be easily realized. Style M is a small Grand, having all of the supreme qualities of every Steinway, at a price no higher than asked for other instruments of inferior tone and workmanship.

¶ This style is designed to meet the popular demand for a Grand piano suited to the limited space of modern homes and apartments. Its smaller size makes possible various economies in the manufacture of frames and cases, and these are applied to your advantage in the price, namely, $750.

Will you see and hear this new small grand? We shall be glad to have you test its qualities.

THE MUSICAL COURIER EXTRA
Published every Saturday by Musical Courier Co.
Devoted to the interests of the Piano Trade.

Felix Berber, the German violinist who was heard in America a few seasons ago, has been decorated with the Iron Cross for conspicuous bravery on the field of battle in Belgium.

Fritz Kreisler, who was killed at Lemberg by the Cossacks several months ago and then resuscitated by the MUSICAL COURIER, will give a recital at Carnegie Hall next Saturday afternoon, December 12.

Judging by the general expression on the collective countenance of the audience in Carnegie Hall at a recent concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is safe to wager that the Finnish symphony never will oust the "Unfinished" symphony from its present popularity.

How in the world are Germany and England to determine the real nationality of Handel? It is a question which surely will come up when the terms of peace are ready to be discussed. In the meantime, is "The Messiah" to have its usual number of performances and its customary success in England pending the fearful question as to whether the composer is Georg Händel or George Handel.

Trustworthy information received in New York justifies the belief that the International Music Society was not disbanded at the instigation of the English members, as had been charged, but owing to the machinations of a small clique in Berlin which now is being condemned heartily on every side. The majority of the association's members desired not to allow war or politics to interfere with abstract matters of art.

Paderewski will not visit America this season, for he is too good a business man to risk a tour during war times and in a neutral country overrun for the time being with concert pianists of the first class. The Paderewski appearances in America last year were not everywhere up to the financial records of his former undertakings here. In some cities the receipts disappointed the artist and in others the receipts disappointed the local managers.

This paper alone had the courage promptly to call Charpentier's "Julien" a prodigious failure when it was done here last winter. Forthcoming Metropolitan repetitions of the work—if there are to be any—will prove unequivocally that the MUSICAL COURIER was right again, as was the case also with "La Wally," "Germania," "Le Villi," "Le Donne Curiose," "Versiegelt," "Mona," "Cyrano de Bergerac," "The Pipe of Desire," "Pique Dame," and "The Girl of the Golden West."

In the foyer of the Paris Opera is a collection of the portraits of those musical composers whose works are in the Opera repertoire. Each portrait is accompanied by a dedication which is a homage from the master to his interpreters. Lately one of a little group from the orchestra stopped before that of the German composer, Richard Strauss. "Take away that thing," said he. Suiting the action to the words he tore down the portrait and ripped it up. This is vouched for by an eyewitness.

It is worthy of note that there was no soloist at the first pair of concerts of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra on November 20 and 21, and that the advance program of the second pair of concerts, scheduled for December 18 and 19, also makes no mention of a soloist. If this is to be the principle on which this excellent orchestra is to be run, it is easy to predict that it will have its troubles with the public. Soloists who draw help to lessen the deficits, please the auditors and keep up the enthusiasm of the guarantors. The orchestra's divorce from the management of L. E. Behymer (who, with Harley Hamilton, built up the organization) probably is responsible for the new order of things. The result will be watched with apprehension by all those interested in seeing that the number of symphony orchestras in the United States does not decrease.

At the Philharmonic concerts on Thursday night and Friday afternoon at Carnegie Hall the "Sinfonietta" by Erich Korngold will be heard. Though the composer has given the title with the diminutive termination, the work is of symphonic dimensions and is in four movements. The second half of the program will be made up of familiar Wagner numbers, the "Tannhäuser" overture, "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," prelude to "Meistersinger," "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal," and the "Rienzi" overture.

Almost imperceptibly the performances of MacDowell's works in all forms are increasing numerically all over this country, especially on the programs of important soloists and organizations. It is a good sign and the best possible proof that the MacDowell works possess worth and vitality, for if they did not, no amount of mere championing or patriotic urging could have succeeded in making them outlive their composer so long. The "Indian Suite," the piano concertos, the piano sonatas and at least a dozen of the MacDowell songs deserve a permanent place in the world's concert repertoire and now seem to be in a fair way to win it.

Weber's "Euryanthe" faces an early revival at the Metropolitan, and our local musicians rejoice at the opportunity to become acquainted with this long neglected work of Weber. They rejoice at the opportunity, we say, but they will not go to hear "Euryanthe," for our local musicians are never, or at least hardly ever (as Gilbert once wrote) seen at the Metropolitan. Whether the general public will be interested in the Weber work is to be doubted, but Giulio Gatti-Casazza evidently is making the production as a labor of love and of reverence for musical art considered from its historical side. Every opera given at the Metropolitan is not a box-office asset.

Several conferences between Henry Russell since his return to Boston last week and the directors of the Boston Opera have not changed the decision to abandon the season of 1914-1915. Not unless the theatre is rented by some visiting company will there be any opera performances given there this season. However, we are led to understand that these deliberations have confirmed the possibility of opera in Boston for next season. Mr. Russell is to leave for New York and Chicago as a beginning toward the working out of these possibilities. The rumor that the two cities just mentioned intend to combine opera forces (that is, use the same company) has no basis except a plan outlined by Mr. Russell purely as a suggestion.

It is reported that six principals of the Century Opera Company, now in Chicago, have volunteered to reduce their salaries twenty-five per cent. in consideration of the lack of financial success which is attending the performances of the organization in the western city. The trouble, however, lies not in the amount of the singers' salaries, which are well earned, but in the indifferent attitude of the public of Chicago, which seems like New York to prefer opera of the brand known as "star." We had hoped for better artistic understanding from our sister city, which in musical matters often has shown itself to be far more independent and perspicacious than the metropolis. If Chicago rejects the Century Opera project, perhaps other inland localities will patronize it. At any rate, the company seems destined to undertake further early travels or else to acknowledge the final collapse of an idea which was fine in the conception but foundationed on an altruistic dream rather than based on a practical demand or even an artistic need.

GERMANY'S MUSICAL MILL.

With a view to determining how much musical activity is being exhibited in Germany outside of Berlin, the MUSICAL COURIER commissioned Arthur M. Abell, its representative in that city, to investigate the conditions carefully through the country and to send a report of his findings. Mr. Abell's summary is appended herewith:

"The Leipsic Gewandhaus is giving its concerts as usual under Nikisch's unparalleled leadership. The program of the opening concert consisted of Beethoven's 'Egmont' overture, the Brahms E minor symphony and Max Reger's organ fantasy on the well known Lutheran choral. At the second Gewandhaus concert Schubert's 'Unfinished' and Schumann's D minor symphonies, lieder by Brahms and Wolf, and Reinecke's entre act from 'Manfred' were heard. The soloist was Julia Culp, who received an ovation. The third concert presented an Austro-Hungarian program—Liszt, Dvorák, Smetana, etc.

"The Leipsic Philharmonic Orchestra under Winterstein has not yet resumed activities, but the Leipsic Männerchor is giving concerts once a week in the Albert Hall to sold out houses. The Riedel Verein is also holding forth. This institution opened its season with a very fine performance of Handel's 'Judas Maccabeus.' Among the soloists who have given concerts in Leipsic thus far with success are Willy Burmester, Paul Schramm and Marta Oppermann. The Leipsic Opera is giving works by German and Italian composers only.

"The musical life in classic Weimar consists this season chiefly of the doings of the Court Opera. At present a very successful cycle of Mozart's operas is being given, which includes all of this master's works for the stage except 'Titus' and 'Idomeneo.' The local oratorio society is also planning a performance of Mozart's 'Requiem.' The series of concerts given by the Court Orchestra will occur this season as usual.

"The programs of the Bremen Philharmonic concerts under Ernst Wendel will contain this season among other things all of the Beethoven symphonies. German compositions only will be performed. The list of soloists for Bremen includes Franz von Vecsey, Arthur and Therese Schnabel, Frau Grumbacher and several others of fame.

"The Musikverein of Düsseldorf is giving a series of four evenings, two of which will be devoted to oratorio performances, the 'Creation' by Haydn and 'St. Paul' by Mendelssohn. The other two will be instrumental concerts. The municipal orchestra in Düsseldorf under Carl Panzner will give a series of ten concerts with prominent soloists and with strictly German programs.

"The Musikverein of Essen is to give a series of eight symphony concerts with the Municipal Orchestra under the baton of Hermann Abendroth. At these, too, prominent German soloists will assist.

"The famous Gürzenich concerts in Cologne will be given, but in limited number only. Thus far six have been announced, for which the prices of admission are considerably less than ordinarily. The programs will be chiefly classical. In the place of Fritz Steinbach, who retired from his post last summer, Gustav Brecher and Hermann Abendroth will officiate.

"The Munich Court Orchestra will give eight subscription concerts and two extra concerts, making ten in all. The program of these will also be chiefly classical and will include all the Beethoven symphonies. The prices of admission in Munich, as in most of the other German towns, have been reduced.

"The symphony concerts of the Wiesbaden Royal Orchestra under Hugo Mannstaedt will be given as usual. The program of the first one, which was largely attended, consisted of Weber's 'Euryanthe' overture, Strauss' 'Tod und Verklärung' and Brahms' C minor symphony.

"Dortmund, Magdeburg, Frankfurt, Halle, Chemnitz, Mayence and many other towns will give their regular series of concerts with the local municipal orchestras, although in most instances the number of concerts as well as the prices of admission have been reduced.

"Coburg's Opera recently gave the premiere of a new opera, 'Der faule Hans,' by Alexander Ritter. The conductor was A. Lorenz.

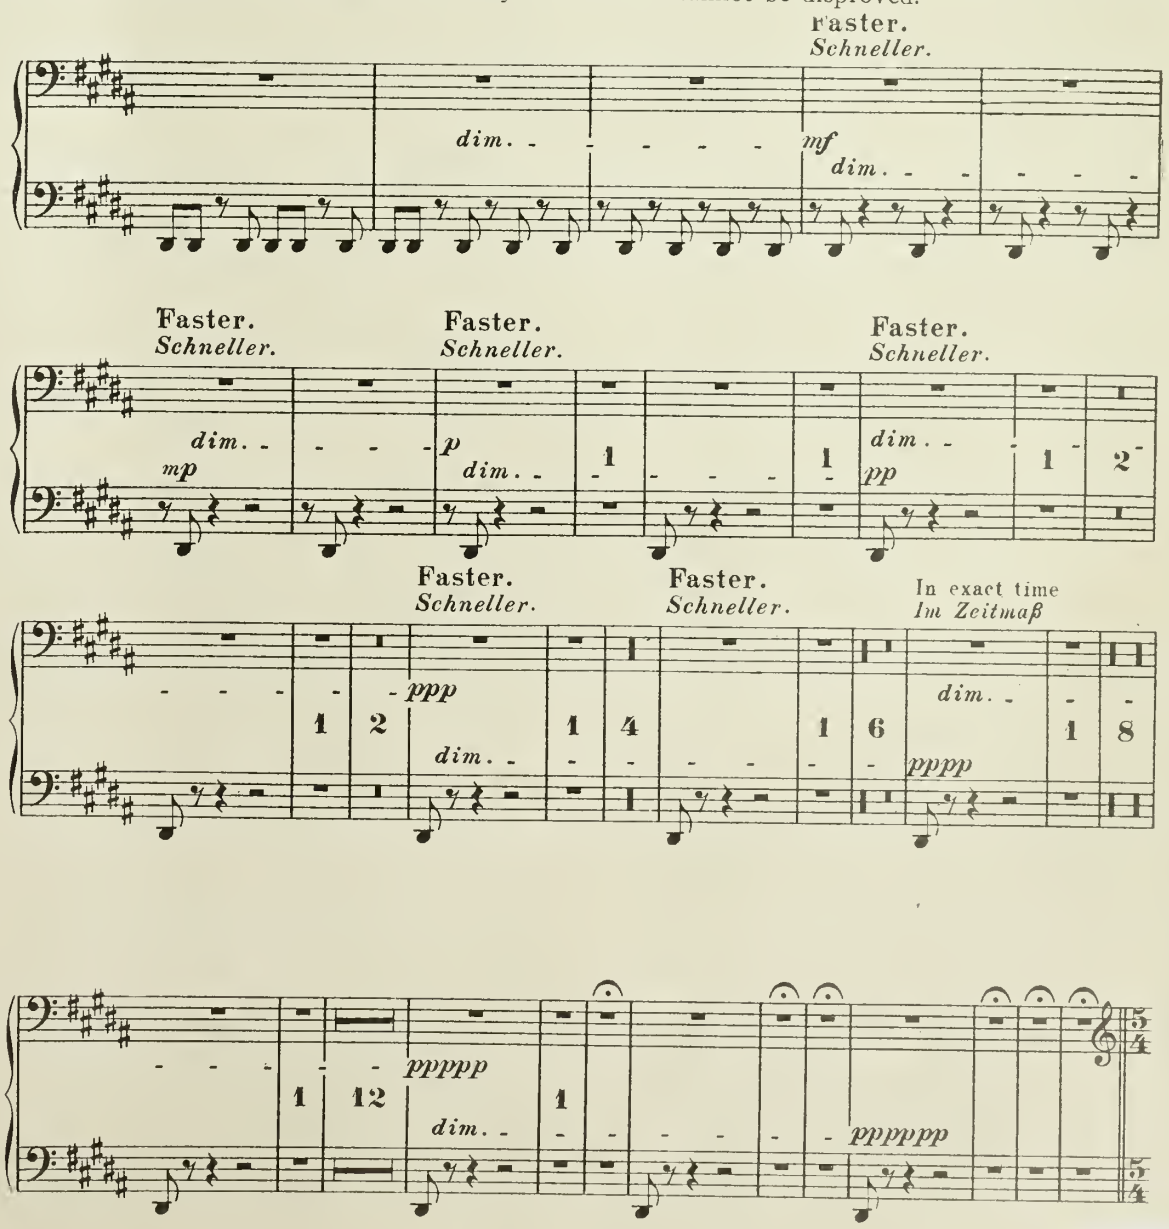
"Prof. Friedrich Brandes not long ago conducted two sacred concerts in the Dresden Kreuzkirche. Over 7,000 persons attended.

CURIOSITIES OF MUSIC.

If Israel Disraeli, father of the famous statesman, Benjamin Disraeli, could win a permanent position in the history of the English language by his "Curiosities of Literature," why can not some patient seeker find material for a volume on "Curiosities of Music"? The curiosities exist. We are constantly running across them in unexpected places.

Schumann, for instance, begins his "Manfred" overture with a syncopation which, of course, is altogether void of effect because there was no rhythm established to make syncopation recognizable. It exists only on paper for the reader of the score and not at all for the hearer. Music that is for the eye rather than for the ear may justifiably be included in the volume on curiosities. It is Schumann, too, who has put at the beginning of one of his movements, "As fast as possible," and later on has added, "Still faster."

The soprano parts of some of the choruses in Beethoven's "King Stephen" are so absurdly high that they are veritable curiosities.



But the great gold mine of musical curiosities is mainly to be found in the expression marks of some of the new and advanced composers of our day. A teeming Golconda of these curios was [illegible] MUSICAL COURIER recently. With the value of the music itself we are not concerned at present and we shall mention neither the composer nor the publisher.

From among the many directions in English, German, Italian and in signs, we select some of the English phrases intended as guides to an intelligent interpretation of the music:

"In a weird manner," "with intensity, but subdued," "with veiled cheerfulness," "fatefully," "less tensely," "ethereally," "dartingly," "ecstatically," "enthusiastically," "playfully," "rather slower," "cautiously," "timidly," "faster with some timidity," "lugubriously," "vexatiously," "almost frantically," "in reminiscent mood," "even prankish in manner," "coquettishly," "coaxingly," "boisterously," "trickishly," "with good humor," "barbaric throughout," "with gradually increasing wildness," "sturdily," "meditatively," "somewhat revived," "entreatingly," "gleefully," "soaringly," "with hilarity."

The last page in the album ends with a whole measure of rest, at the end of which the composition is presumably supposed to terminate. This rest is preceded by the chord, G A B C E, five times repeated.

We reproduce a section from the middle of one of the pieces. The reader will see that it is a study in monotone. The success or failure of this passage hangs on the rhythm and the dynamics. Considerable charm results from a delicate and soulful interpretation of the three measures of whole rests at the end of the passage. The profoundly emotional effect of that final burst of silence depends on the non-performance of those rests in perfectly equal divisions of nothing. It is most inartistic to get more nothing into one measure than into another. A marked distinction must be made between pppppp and ppp, even if ppp has to be played loud in order to have something to diminish from. Perhaps the composer wants the pppppp to be considered like the concept of a chemical atom—that is to say, something which no one has ever seen, but which cannot be disproved.

POPULAR SONGS.

In a recent issue of "T. P.'s Weekly" (London) there is an interesting article by the editor in reply to a critic who found fault with "It's a Long Way to Tipperary," and regretted that the taste of the British soldier was so low. The words of the editor are worth repeating:

"Many otherwise amiable folk think it a little degrading that our soldiers should prefer to set their fighting to what are contemptuously called 'music hall songs' rather than to more imposing song structures, such as the 'Marseillaise' and the 'Wacht am Rhein.' There is a curious mental kink in all such criticisms of the tastes of the common people which, to my mind, reveals the almost impassable gulf between the cultured few and the uncultured many. Culture seems to kill psychological insight. It helps us to understand ideas and to work out problems with logical exactitude, but it always neglects the final human equation which, in the long run, is the only thing that matters. . . . It is quite a chance that our soldiers sing 'Tipperary.' Two years ago they would have sung with equal gusto 'We All Go the Same Way Home.' The thing to remember is that it is not always the musician or the poet who makes songs. Songs are made also by the circumstances under which they are sung. Some songs, the oldest and the best, have neither authors nor composers; they seem to have grown out of the national life and to have gone on living because the national life has lived. Thus 'Tipperary' has been reborn. In the ordinary course of things 'Tipperary' would have passed into the limbo of forgotten popular airs, but Mr. Thomas Atkins (the British soldier) has done for it what its author could never have done; he has given it immortality."

Of course, it remains to be seen what kind of immortality "Tipperary" is to have. It's a long way to an endless immortality. If "Tipperary" enjoys the strictly limited immortality—otherwise everlasting life—of that paragon of melodic charm and rhythmical splendor, "It's a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," which was floated to fame on the emotional waves of our Spanish-American war, it will do well. "Dixie Land," "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," "The Star Spangled Banner," might never have become known to the nation if the emotional fire that is kindled in battle had not set them ablaze. Surely no cultured or uncultured person in cold blood would have selected the tune of "The Star Spangled Banner" as the national anthem of a great nation. But there it is, and the wars of 1814 and 1864 made it what it is.

War made popular all over the continent of Europe the tune of "Marbrouk," a corruption of Marlborough. That old melody now does duty in American on convivial occasions when bibulous and boisterous youths deem it necessary to state with emphasis that they "won't go home till morning." Another famous French song found its way into England and became enormously popular with the army. We refer to the vivacious "Ca ira." One of Purcell's instrumental airs happened to be selected by the author of a foolish and nonsensical ballad called "Lilli Burlero." It struck the popular fancy and was sung all over England. Dr. Percy, in his "Reliques of Ancient English Poetry," says that "the rhymes, slight and insignificant as they may now seem, had once a more powerful effect than either the Phillippics of Demosthenes or Cicero, and contributed not a little towards the great Revolution of 1688. A contemporary writer, Burnet, relates that "a foolish ballad was made at that time, that made an impression on the king's army, that cannot be imagined by those that saw it not. The whole army, and at last the people, both in city and country, were singing it perpetually. And perhaps never had so slight a thing so great an effect."

It never seems to have occurred to these writers that the emotional upheaval of those troubled times had much more to do with the making of the song than the song had to do with causing the revolution.

It was a fortunate chance that Austria had one of her most illustrious sons, Joseph Haydn, on hand at the right time to profit by the Napoleonic wars and compose the beautiful Austrian hymn.

And it is equally unfortunate that such a commonplace tune as "Tipperary" should have been on deck when the present war was launched. It has a vogue to which its intrinsic merits do not entitle it. At the same time, it must ever be kept in mind that the finest product of a musician of culture is useless if it cannot be made the vehicle of the emotions of the multitude. Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" and "Wedding March," Schumann's "Träumerei," Rubinstein's "Melody in F," Nevin's "Rosary," Chopin's "Funeral March"—to mention haphazard a few of the hackneyed successes—appeal to the public. Fortunately these popular works are works of art of great merit. They have something in them that required no war to make them attractive to the multitude. "Tipperary" is a poor specimen of an art song; but it has caught the ear of a public already stirred by the emotions of wartime. We hardly think it will outlive the war. But whether it does or not, it is as well for the musician to note the important fact that a composition may be logically correct and psychologically wrong. The composer who lacks the psychological something which attracts the sympathy of his hearers in general is a failure, no matter how logically perfect his work may be when measured with the standards set up by the science of musical theory. The composer who cannot learn to employ musical science to help him express more clearly and powerfully the psychology of the art is doomed to neglect and oblivion. These popular composers strive only to reach the hearts and sympathies of their hearers. They do not know that a highly cultured musician gets a certain amount of pleasure from fine style and great skill even though the emotional appeal is small.

But, after all, which is best and which worst?—to travel along the wrong road with perfect style and art, or to plod along the right way with poor art and an uncouth taste?

CRITICIZING THE CRITIC.

Mr. Webster is the music critic of the Chicago Tribune, and Mr. Webster has been much abused recently by some of the Chicago musicians, who object to the tone and the content of his writings on the tonal art. The dissatisfied ones indited letters to the Tribune, but all they got for their pains was the spectacle of Mr. Webster continuing his writings and the Tribune supporting Mr. Webster by endorsing him in an editorial.

It stands to reason that no reputable newspaper would discharge any of its staff under such fire as Mr. Webster is undergoing, for such a dismissal at once would reflect on the judgment of the Tribune for having placed Mr. Webster in the position he now occupies. To point out a critic's technical mistakes is one thing, but to attack him personally with abuse and ridicule is quite another matter and carries no weight with an editor.

From what we have seen of Mr. Webster's writings we should say that he is not likely to make many technical errors, for he does not criticise music from the technical side, but confines himself more to generalities and to the recording of facile impressions. It is a method which has its advantages and should not be decried unreservedly. The critic who acknowledges frankly that he is not voicing eternal profundities, but merely expressing personal and transient opinion—swept aside after breakfast with the eggshells and the newspaper itself—is a person very much to be respected and often may be read with profit and entertainment. The pernicious (and pathetic) critic is the one who takes himself seriously. When he is taken seriously by the editor his destructive activity usually ends summarily.

Strangely enough, just after writing the foregoing words, we chanced across a quotation from F. M. Colby's "The Journalist and His Betters," and it is so applicable to the owlish critic we have just described that we reproduce the passage herewith:

> And there is another burden that the newspaper man is free from. He does not have to talk in such a very large way about his work as art, or to feel oppressed with that sense of responsibility for nature's priceless gifts. Being without worries of this kind, he has more chance to meet people on equal and agreeable terms. That is the great thing about being unliterary and uneternal. You do not have any of those dreadfully serious duties toward yourself. You are not obliged to sing psalms to the holy things inside you or to act as if you were a special little ark of the covenant for something that no one but yourself knows the value of. That leaves you leisure and a light heart—a low level, but with its humble joy. A newspaper man does not envy the general run of authors. He would be scared to death by the consciousness of all that talent. Indeed, if he should ever feel inside him what certain literary characters sometimes call their "muse," he would see a doctor and take something for it.

KREISLER'S EXPERIENCES.

Fritz Kreisler, now in New York, returned to this country via Berlin, and while there talked freely to our Berlin representative, who reports as follows:

"I had the pleasure of spending an afternoon with Fritz Kreisler on Saturday. It was Kreisler's intention to rejoin his regiment at the front, but the wound in his right leg produced by the lance of a Cossack is much more serious than he at first realized. The great violinist now walks with a pronounced limp. Marching or even standing for a long time is now quite out of the question with him, so he has been compelled to renounce all future military aspirations. This is news that the musical world will hail with joy; there are thousands of lieutenants, but there is only one Kreisler. The violinist was one of few in his company who escaped with his life. Shortly after the battle in which he was injured, his company led an attack on the Russians, and in this battle every officer and most of the men were killed. If Kreisler had been with them his life in all probability would have been sacrificed. The musical world cannot afford to lose a Kreisler. So the news that the wound in his leg prevents his returning to the front should fill with joy the hearts of all who ever listened to Kreisler's wonderful, thrilling tones.

"While Kreisler and I were walking down the Friedrichstrasse on Saturday afternoon we met a great number of German officers and soldiers. They one and all saluted their Austrian comrade with great respect and reverence. In going about town Kreisler in his Austrian uniform attracted a great deal of attention. Since he can be of no further use here to his country, Kreisler decided to sail for America, where he should have arrived safely by now. Fortunately he can play the violin as well as ever. His left arm was not affected at all and the injury to his right shoulder caused by the blow from a hoof of a horse has improved so that he can play again.

"I was much interested in hearing from Kreisler's own lips the description of the great battle in Galicia. For twenty-one days the violinist did not sleep under cover, having been compelled to spend the greater part of the time in the trenches. He said that there were about four times as many Russians as Austrians participating in the battle. The fire of the Russian artillery, he said, was very effective, but the infantry proved to be singularly inferior, and as to the élan and impetuosity of the Cossacks, he says, that is all a myth. The Cossacks proved themselves wretched cowards; they are the worst fighting men in the whole Russian army, it seems."

NO MUSIC IN PARIS.

"Paris, la Ville Lumiere, is still steeped in melancholy, darkness and silence, despite the continual good news arriving from the theatre of war," writes J. F. Delma-Heide to the MUSICAL COURIER. "The streets remain deserted at night," he continues, "although at the hour of the 'aperitif,' a short time before sunset, the main thoroughfares, the grand boulevards, are animated with crowds of old-time Parisians and strangers (French, Belgians and English). Cafes are closed at eight and restaurants at about nine o'clock—after which beautiful Paris becomes a city of the dead. There are no theatres open, no Opera or Opera-Comique, no music halls or variety shows; only a few cinematograph exhibitions cater to public interest. Thus Paris lives and waits and watches for the final success of which she feels well assured.

"Many thousands of artists are in these dark times unable to utilize their art, consequently their sources of revenue are cut off. They know that none has the heart to be gay, but they say: 'We, too, have the same anguish, yet we must not die of hunger. We will not ruffle the tenderest feelings nor add one pang to bruised hearts, but give us the possibility to earn by our own talents the wherewithal to live.'

"During the siege of 1870 the war songs sung by Mmes. Thérésa, Bordas, Amiati kept the patriotic flame burning very bright in Paris. Also in these hard times, it is well to remember that a percentage of the receipts goes to the Public Assistance.

"Carmen Vildez has pleaded the cause of the Parisian singers, who are sure that songs by Victor Hugo, Coppée, Dérouldède, which they would interpret, could but console, soothe and reanimate all one's patriotic courage."

FRENCH WAR SONGS.

One hears of "Die Wacht am Rhein" and "Tipperary," but it seems to be forgotten that Frenchmen, too, always have sung in marching to the front, and have other national songs beside the "Marseillaise."

Without going back so far as Taillefer, the boon companion of William the Conqueror, who won the Battle of Hastings to the sounds of the "Song of Roland," Olivier, Charlemagne and his Paladins, a hundred examples could be quoted of this gay bravery from the French nation's history, the times of Henry of Navarre, of Villars, Denain, and above all during the Revolution. There are innumerable patriotic songs of this period. Lyric specimens sometimes lively, sometimes sad, the "Bastille," the "Rights of Man," the "Forced Loan," the "Invasion." The last bursts into splendid lyricism. For the October 22, 1792, the French had the following:

"Que le grand roi des Hulans,
Des pandours et des Brigands,
Ait cru prendre pour ses peines
La France en quatre semaines,
Sans obstacles en son chemin," etc.

"GUNSGRAD."

Raoul Gunsbourg, impresario of the Monte Carlo Opera, whom a fanciful correspondent accredited with the intention of changing his name to Gunsgrad, sends the following:

"MY DEAR DIRECTOR—If I were Russian, as your correspondent playfully says, Gunsgrad would not suffice me; Gunsgradoff at the very least would be necessary. But I am French, French from father to son. Please allow me therefore my very French termination 'bourg.' If the government should decide to change the name of Cherbourg to Chergrad, I will go so far in my admiration of Russia as to remove from the Boulevard of the Tour-Maugrad to that of Grad-la-Reine. Many thanks from

Yours sincerely,
RAOUL GUNSBOURG."

THIBAUD NOT COMING.

In a letter which Loudon Charlton has received from Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist states that he has gone to the front, and therefore will be unable to fulfill his engagements in America this season. The letter, which was written under date of November 11, is as follows:

Alas! very dear sir, I must definitely abandon the hope of filling my engagements in America this season. France, still unhappy by the presence of the Germans, has need of all those who are able to serve her. I remain by orders, and by duty in the army of my country, and beg to be excused by all who counted upon me this winter. I am on the staff of General Galieni, and have had the honor of going in my automobile twenty or more times to the extreme front of the gigantic battle which has been raging daily for nearly three months. I have seen great, noble and sad things. I will never be able to tell you how the sympathy of your compatriots has touched French hearts.

Here, your people are wonders of marvelous courage and devotion. One sees them give of their best in the hospitals with an untiring ardor. Men and women are working with all the nobility of your wonderful people. But the war will be long, alas!

I had read that my dear friend, Fritz Kreisler, had been killed. My sincere regard and admiration for him made me suffer much. I now know it was a false rumor, and I am profoundly glad of it.

My desire and hope was to do my duty toward my country and to fulfil my engagements in the United States at the appointed time, but this plan I must now renounce. Tell all those who had invited me to play for them that I hope not to be killed, and that I further hope to make a long and successful tournée in America next year. I will send news from time to time.

Au revoir, dear Mr. Charlton. Believe in my sincere regrets and make my excuses to every one.

BARCELONA "SHOULD WORRY."

One of the places which does not seem to be musically harmed by the war is Barcelona in Spain, where the opera season is being carried on at present on a large scale at the Gran Teatro del Liceo. Among the conductors are Pietro Cimini, A. Guarnieri, while the German operas ("Meistersinger," "Siegfried," "Tannhäuser" and "Parsifal" in Italian) are being conducted by Franz Beidler, whose wife, Isolde, figured in the recent suit to establish her legitimacy as a daughter of Wagner. The repertoire includes many of the standard Italian works, outside of Puccini's operas, and that seldom given composition, Bizet's "Pearl Fishers." The young American singer, Meta Reddish, is in the company.

YSAYE FOR NEW YORK?

Many inquiries have reached the MUSICAL COURIER regarding the present whereabouts of Eugen Ysaye, who was reported by the daily newspapers to have escaped from Ostend to England after suffering severe hardships in his own country. At this moment Ysaye is living at Tunbridge Wells, and can be reached there in care of Mrs. H. Van den Berg, Broadwater Court. Some of his influential New York friends have cabled to Ysaye, offering him a home and work in this city.

A QUESTION OF NATIONALITY.

So many false reports and wild rumors are printed in the newspapers nowadays that it is often difficult to distinguish the true landscape from the cloud drawn mirage.

We have therefore (even though we have published the rumor and commented upon it at the time) not the slightest chance at present of verifying the statement that Saint-Saëns has asked French audiences not to listen to the music of Wagner. Wagner is reported to have made some uncomplimentary remarks about the French in 1870. For the life of us, we cannot understand why two great men should descend to a war of words. France's ancient and hereditary enemy, the once "perfidious Albion" and the present "dear England" of the newly hatched friendship, cherishes no ill feeling against the German Wagner, however unpopular the Kaiser may be in the tight little island.

The program for a concert given by the Queen's Hall Symphony Orchestra in London, conducted by the Englishman, Sir Henry J. Wood, contained the "Parsifal" prelude, "Albumblatt," Senta's ballad from "The Flying Dutchman," overture and Venusberg music, and the march from "Tannhäuser," "Entrance of the Gods" from "Rheingold," funeral march from "Götterdämmerung," Telramund's address from "Lohengrin," and the overture to "Meistersinger." A second concert contained works by Humperdinck and Richard Strauss. On another night a concerto by the Germanized Britisher, d'Albert, and a song by the Anglicized German, Henschel, were given.

A later program was as international as the most ardent champion of peace and brotherly love could wish. The names on the program came in this order: Wagner, Berlioz, Saint-Saëns, Järnefelt, Liszt, César Franck, Grieg, Massenet, Liszt, Ponchielli, Dvorák. Native English and neutral American composers had nothing to do with that Continental conglomeration.

Whatever praise or blame England is to get for her share in the war, it is certain that the English are not allowing their political prejudices to narrow their musical judgment. In their orchestral tastes they are frankly German, and unless Kitchener can show them some strategic gain in renouncing German music, they will probably stick with their proverbial tenacity to their favorites.

Yet Saint-Saëns' warning to the French has a good deal of common sense in it. French music is not robust like the art and architecture of France. It is a delicate flower with an aroma of its own. Too much of the strong, exhilarating music of Germany is not good for the individuality of the gentler muse of France.

But in France, however, as in England, the composers have very little, if anything, to do with the programs offered to the public. Throughout the world all programs are selected with the object of pleasing the great public. If it so happens that English and French audiences will pay more to hear German music than they will lay out to encourage native composers, then the native art must suffer in two ways.

First, the composers lack the needed stimulant of public encouragement; and, secondly, the taste of the public is being formed for exotic art and turned against the productions of native artists. All the composers of England and France can do—and let us add American composers—is to write either in the national idiom for a small, half hearted public, or become second rate imitators of the foreign music which the great public extols.

If Saint-Saëns' reported opposition to Wagner is the result of the war we cannot agree with him; although we perhaps understand why a highly strung and sensitive composer should feel so keen-to [illegible] his native land that he includes among his enemies a great composer thirty years dead.

But if Saint-Saëns means that France is losing its native musical speech and is learning to lisp with a foreign accent we are heartily in sympathy with him. Nothing is more musically ridiculous than a composer with a French or Italian temperament attempting to write music in the German style, unless it be a ponderous and guttural speeched German essaying the part of an actor in a sparkling comedy by Molière.

As for the English, let them keep to their international programs. There is an English style, without a doubt; but since the age of Charles II England has fallen behind in the musical race. Perhaps Arthur Sullivan alone has won an international name as an English composer, and then only as a writer of the lightest musical comedies. His works are more English in style than French or German, or Russian or Italian, and he had a genuine gift of melody and genuine vitality. He had the ear of the British public as no native composer had since the days of Purcell. Nevertheless, when it was proposed to put a bust of Sullivan in one of London's music schools a storm of protest was raised by the conventional and academic composers of England, who maintained that Sullivan was not a representative English composer. He certainly was not representative of that great body of English composers, who, though highly trained and intelligent, are emotionally torpid and whose well written and often ingenious works are so monotonously placid. If a long and a strong dose of international programs and a difficult and costly war will give the gentlemanly and comfortable composers of England a good emotional shaking up the future musical historian may have cause to bless the year 1914.

Even as it is, it looks as if the war was getting on the nerves of sundry British musicians and causing them to talk fustian and act foolishly. We refer to the report that Sir Frederic Cowen and Sir Edward Elgar, among others, have formed a committee to boycott Germans who earn their living by music in Great Britain.

Of course to us Americans such an action seems childish because we cannot feel what the emotional tension is in a land engaged in a destructive war. We have pointed out, at the beginning of this article, what Sir Henry J. Wood is doing for German and other foreign music in England at present. Incidentally we may add that Sir Henry plays foreign music because the British public wants to hear it, and, by inference, does not care very much about concerts devoted to Elgar, Cowen and other boycotters of Teutonic art.

Saint-Saëns, so it appears, wants Wagner ostracized. And what did Wagner himself do, a few years ago? He begged the women of Germany to boycott Parisian dresses and styles and wear the national costume of the German Hausfrau. Truly, these great composers are excitable people. Some of them get excited without being great—as, for example, the boycott committee in England. Beethoven in his day had a touch of nationalism. He decided for a time to boycott the Italian language and actually published a sonata for the Hammerclavier, which many persons think must have been some new kind of instrument. The Hammerclavier was only a German name for the same piano for which Beethoven had been writing since childhood.

But this boycott of German musicians living and working in England is the climax of foolishness. We presume these German musicians are giving services worthy of the money they receive. If they work for less pay than the Britishers, why do not the British musicians form a union with a standard wage? We have a high regard for the rank and file of British orchestral players. They are intelligent, skillful, equipped with high grade instruments, and are unusually good sight readers. We very much doubt if they have anything to do with this movement of the disgruntled composers who cannot hold their own in competition with the great German, French and Russian composers. We are really sorry to record these abberations of musicians. It is a thousand pities that the wrangling of the battlefield should be permitted in the temple of the muses. We have a kind of vague suspicion, however, that the Briton is more brilliant on the warpath than in the creation of music. But when we remember Wagner—who was assuredly a creator of great music—we confess our inability to diagnose the nervous disorders of composers during war time.

Perhaps old Dr. Johnston was right when he checked Boswell's enthusiastic praise of music with the remark: "Sir, I should never hear it if it made me such a fool!"

Ulk, of Berlin, calls the above caricature "Bordeaux S'Amuse" and writes: "Wagner's music is to be banished in France. As a substitute the newly padded Sarah Bernhardt will dance in the Russian Grail."

ZECKWER WINS PRIZE.

A Cleveland, Ohio, $100 prize contest for a composition for mixed voices and piano accompaniment (to Gilder's "The New Day") was won by Camille Zeckwer, of Philadelphia. The judges were Wilson G. Smith, Johann H. Beck, and James H. Rogers. Wilson G. Smith's letter of notification to the director of the Mendelssohn Club (of Cleveland), which gave the prize, reads as follows:

Cleveland, Ohio, November 25, 1914.

My Dear Mr. Sapp—In making our adjudication of the prize offered by the Mendelssohn Club we were guided in our choice by these points which we regarded as essentials in such an adjudication. First, originality; second, musicianship displayed; third, the fitness of the musical setting as complementing the sentiment of the verbal text, and lastly the adaptability of the composition to the requirements of the Mendelssohn Club, of which you are director.

The setting of Mr. Camille W. Zeckwer seemed in our judgment to realize the most fully these essentials. It is, therefore, with much pleasure that we submit herewith our report in the matter.

It might be well to add that several of the other compositions examined fulfilled the requirements of one or more of the points stated, but Mr. Zeckwer seemed to meet them all the most fully.

Very truly yours,
(Signed) Wilson G. Smith,
for the Committee.

Fourteen Saturday night performances at popular prices are to be given at the Metropolitan beginning January 23 and ending April 24. The prices are to range from seventy-five cents to three dollars.

On National Hymns.

[From the New York Evening Post.]

It is rather surprising that two of the world's greatest national anthems were created by prominent composers of their countries. Haydn wrote the Austrian "Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser," while the Russian hymn, the most majestic and inspiring of all patriotic tunes, was composed by Alexis Lvoff; and what is more astonishing still, was composed to order. The story of how it happened is told in detail by Lvoff in his memoirs, and is quoted in English by Mr. Montgu-Nathan's recently published "History of Russian Music" (Charles Scribner's Sons). In 1833 this composer accompanied the Emperor Nicholas on his journeys to Prussia and Austria. On their return he was informed by Count Benkerdorf that the Czar had expressed a regret that the Russians possessed no national hymn, and that, being tired of the English tune which had been used as a stop-gap for a long time, he wished him to attempt to write a Russian anthem. "This momentous duty," Lvoff continues, "seemed likely to prove difficult of accomplishment. In recalling the British anthem, 'God Save the King,' which is so imposing; the French song, so full of originality, and the Austrian hymn, of which the music is so touching, I felt and fully appreciated the necessity of accomplishing something which would be robust, stately, stirring, national in character, something worthy to reverberate either in a church, through the soldiers' ranks, or among a crowd of people, something which would appeal alike to the lettered and the ignorant. This consideration absorbed me, and I was perplexed by the problem of fulfilling all these needs."

One night, on returning to his quarters at a late hour, he conceived and wrote out the tune of the hymn on the spur of the moment. The next day he went to Joukovsky (who had suggested the subject of the most popular of all Russian operas, Glinka's "A Life for the Czar"), and asked him to write the words to go with the tune. When at last all was ready, the choir of the Court Chapel was assembled and, supported by two orchestras, sang the hymn. The Emperor was so delighted that he had it repeated several times. "It is really superb," he said in French to the composer, and the Minister of War was promptly informed that the new hymn was adopted for the army. The composer received a gold snuff box adorned with diamonds, and the Emperor also ordered that the words "God Protect the Czar" should be added to the armorial bearings of the Lvoff family.

On August 24, 1856, the Gazette Musicale contained this notice: "Lvoff's popular Russian anthem will be sung in three different ways on the occasion of the Emperor's coronation during the display of a firework set-piece which will represent in chronological order the portraits of the Czar's Peter the Great, Nicholas, and Alexander II. The first time the hymn will be rendered by a chorus of a thousand voices; the second time by the whole chorus and the military bands, and the third time to the accompaniment of cannons, which will be discharged by electricity."

Gounod wrote a fantasia for piano and orchestra on this Russian hymn. Rubinstein harmonized it grandly; but the most effective use of it is made in Tschaikowsky's stirring overture "1812," in which the noble theme is heard battling, as it were, with the inspired "Marseillaise."

No Prussian Composers.

[From the Yorkshire (England) Post.]

Most people, I suppose, realize that the warlike ambitions of the German Empire are concentrated in the Kingdom of Prussia, and that in this, as in other matters, there is far from being sympathy between the northern and southern states, in most of which a Prussian is hardly a persona grata. But I doubt if it is generally realized how marked the distinction is when we come to consider the music of Germany. As a matter of fact, not one of the great German composers was a Prussian. Bach, Handel, Wagner, and Schumann were Saxons (Bach was born in the little state of Saxe-Weimar); Mendelssohn and Brahms were born in the free Hanseatic city of Hamburg; Beethoven, of Dutch extraction, was born at Bonn, on the Rhine, which did not become Prussian till many years after he had left it for Vienna; Weber, born at Eutin, in the Duchy of Oldenburg, was of an Austrian family; Gluck and Richard Strauss belong to Bavaria; Haydn, Mozart and Schubert were Austrians (the first being strictly a Croatian); Spohr was born in the Duchy of Brunswick. Berlin can, indeed, boast of one successful composer in Meyerbeer, but without going so far as to adopt the description of this musician as "a Jew banker to whom it occurred to compose operas," or the strongly adverse judgments of Schumann, Mendelssohn and others who anticipated the general verdict of musicians, it cannot be said that Prussia has much reason to be regarded as a centre of musical culture on the strength of this one very doubtful name.

The Jury at Odds.

In a recent number of the famous Hale program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, friend Philip quotes a number of ancient opinions on the subject of Beethoven's piano playing. Needless to state—for art changes but the times do not—the opinions were at variance. "Some years ago in Boston," Philip Hale reminds his readers, "Mr. Busoni was praised by certain persons for his delicacy; by others he was reproached for his violence. And which opinion was the true one?" The Hale remarks continue: "Today you often hear a pianist reproached for his interpretation of Beethoven's music, 'No, his performance was not in the spirit of Beethoven.' If Beethoven should play his sonatas to us now in Boston, would not some one complain of his lack of temperament? and might not some one say, from force of habit: 'He is an interesting pianist, but he should not attempt to play Beethoven; he had better stick to Chopin or Liszt?'"

Of course, one can understand differences of opinion when they concern matters of taste or relative questions in music. But how about such a positive subject as whether a singer is in good voice or bad voice? Take, as an example, the criticisms in the New York daily newspapers recently (December 1, to be exact) about the performance of Geraldine Farrar as Madame Butterfly at the Metropolitan the evening before. Here are excerpts from them set down without the changing of a word:

Evening World.

Geraldine Farrar made her first entrance, climbing the hill, from behind the scenes, singing on the key, a rare thing for her to do.

Herald.

Miss Farrar has seldom sung the music better, barring the trying entrance aria, which seemed to cause her some difficulty.

Press.

The popular American soprano was not in good voice, her high tones, in particular, sounding peculiarly harsh and grating.

Herald.

Miss Farrar has seldom sung the music better.

Sun.

When she did essay to push her tones a little they were not good.

Tribune.

Last night she was in excellent voice and sang discreetly.

Mail.

One is inclined to wish that the music of "Butterfly" did not move so constantly among the higher tones, particularly after having heard Miss Farrar's satisfying mezzo-soprano in the lower range of Carmen. Yesterday she wisely omitted several of the highest notes altogether.

Staats Zeitung.

Miss Farrar was exceptionally well disposed vocally.

Times.

Miss Farrar was not in her best voice in the first act, and in certain passages, notably in the long duet with Pinkerton, it had not all the beauty of tone that is hers.

Evening Post.

Throughout the evening her singing combined vocal beauty with emotional sensibility of the most subtle kind.

One feels inclined to echo Philip Hale and say: "Which opinion is the true one?" You pays your money for the newspapers and takes your choice.

The World Disasters.

Mary Garden announces that she will not sing for a year, and also that no great musical work will be written while the war lasts. It is proper that Mary should place the greater calamity first.

"La Bohème."

Beau Broadway, in the Morning Telegraph, has some new definitions of Bohemianism which should interest the fraternity which wears its hair long for the same reason that it wears its shoes long. The Beau says: "I have read poems celebrating Bohemia, but my mother, when I was quite a child, put me off Bohemianism, whatever it was, by saying that a Bohemian was one who wore his nightshirt in the daytime. A friend of mine once said a Bohemian was one who was listening to Beethoven's symphony when he should be paying the gas bill. A combination of the two should not be impossible. Beethoven always paid his gas and electric light bills."

"The Nosary?"

From a recent article by Ernest Newman: "To me a song like 'The Rosary' is merely the snivel of a distempered puppy; but I can well believe that to the man in the street, or the maiden in the picture house, it opens such glimpses of paradise as are given me by things like Bach's aria for the G string or the adagio of the ninth symphony." The Voice of the West.

Omaha is enjoying a short season of grand opera at popular prices, and this is the way it is full page advertising:

"Five of the most popular operas ever written. Opera for the masses. Not a conglomeration of recitatives, uninteresting discords and tiresome dialogs, half sung, half spoken sounding decidedly like a couple of fat foreigners sassing each other for half hours at a stretch, understood only by the professional musician.

"These carefully chosen operas embody real music—music loved by everybody except the morbid few, who cannot enjoy any music that is tuneful. Operas that enthrall, that hold the interest to the last second. Music that you are familiar with, wonderful solos, sung by artists, who have been made famous by their exquisite rendition. Beautiful duets sung as only the world's greatest singers can sing them. Tuneful quartets, interweaving melodies that will haunt you for days. Sextets that will live as long as music is played or sung, and choruses that will inspire to lofty ideals and compel encore after encore. The kind of opera enjoyed by the 'Tired Business Man.'"

Prize Contest.

We are fervidly in favor of program annotations at concerts, and to show their usefulness, we intend to reprint some of them from time to time, and let readers guess the names of the compositions to which the annotations refer. The one who guesses the largest number of correct titles will receive a chaste and handsome prize at the end of the contest. We start this week with a symphony, a very well known symphony. The description is taken from the program of one of the American symphony orchestras. Here it is:

"There is no introduction to the first movement, which commences quietly but determinedly with its principal theme, given out by the first and second violins in octaves in conjunction with soaring arpeggios for the violas and violoncellos—all over a harmonic background supplied by the basses, horns and woodwinds. The immediate development of this theme is quite brief, leading straightway to the appearance of the following motive in some of the horns and woodwinds (musical example), the opening figure of which figures prominently throughout the remainder of the movement. This soon leads into the second subject, begun in the woodwinds and continued in the strings. (Musical example.)

"Some free developments follow of the opening measures of quotation No. 2 and other subsidiary materials, which fill out the remainder of the first part of the movement.

"The free-fantasia (the first part of the movement is not repeated) starts with some suggestions of the first theme in the woodwinds, quickly resolving into a partial repetition of the theme itself, as it appeared in the beginning. This soon veers off, however, into a prolonged and exceedingly elaborate development, which may be described briefly as running mainly on figures from the first theme and quotation No. 2, and finally coming to an end with some sustained chords for the wind instruments, offset by undulating arpeggios in the strings. Then begins the recapitulation with the orthodox restatement of the principal theme, in the violins, as at the commencement. The other materials already pointed out follow in regular order, the whole leading to a fine coda, which brings the movement to a powerful and effective climax.

"The second movement opens in the horns with a motive from which its leading theme is evolved; the woodwinds enter and then the clarinet announces the theme proper, over a pizzicato accompanied from the strings (musical example), embellished by a counter melody in the violas and bassoon, and running counterpoint in the first violins. These melodies the composer has developed and combined into a composition of great romantic beauty, which finally concludes softly with a short coda founded on the first one.

"The third movement opens with the following theme in the full orchestra, fortissimo. (Musical example.)

"As it reappears now and again, this theme is subjected to extensive modifications, the intervals between the several repetitions being filled out with contrasting episodical materials, chief among which is the following, the second theme proper. (Musical example.)

"The theme from which the composer developed the finale is given out directly by the wind instruments in harmony, the theme proper being the melody to be perceived in the upper voice of the following illustration. (Musical example.)"

Which symphony is the foregoing? Send in your answers early. The only person barred from the contest is the writer of the annotations in question.

Shrinking Violet.

A Western music teacher, whose pupils gave a recital recently not a thousand miles from Pueblo, Col., announces in his program that one of the participants at the concert "is the only girl violinist in the West playing Sarasate's 'Zapateado,' that another is "the only girl who can play a violin and piano number on the same program and with equal success," and that a certain Master ——— is "the world's greatest boy pianist. If anywhere in this world there is this boy's equal, I would like to hear him. I stake my reputation as teacher and pianist against the possibility. Just because he is a Pueblo boy, Pueblo trained, is no sign that he is not the world's greatest. Anyway, I will say he is the world's greatest until I hear—did you read that—hear some one of his age that can play better than he can. If you cannot produce, boost—don't knock."

Our Intrepid Column.

Well, we finally managed to secure from George Hamlin the story of what Mrs. Richard Strauss said about the war, as nearly reported in this column some two weeks ago. The Strausses were summering at Garmisch, in the Tyrol, at the time the war broke out. Mrs. Strauss was in a café when she received the news. "Isn't it dreadful," exclaimed the wife of the composer who was just then receiving large royalties for his "Joseph" from London and Paris; "I do hope that no harm will come to our dear friends, the English and the French." According to the version related to Mr. Hamlin, Mrs. Strauss' loudly uttered pious wish was overheard by the cafe guests, who promptly hissed the lady in such fortissimo fashion that she beat a hasty retreat from the place.

Did She Play "The Rosary"?

"There was little Josephine with her violin. When she cuddled the fiddle up under her little fair head and tickled the strings with an unerring bow—then eye and ear, and heart, of every auditor was filled to surfeit, and the weary cark and care of all your days was forgotten. How does she play? Well, you hunt up the fairest painted picture of St. Cecelia that you ever saw; then close your eyes and picture the sort of music, in your imagination, that would fit the picture. Then you will understand how little Josephine Kryl plays the violin—almost."—Pittsburgh Gazette-Times.

Managerial Idiosyncrasies.

Among the most interested of the listeners at the Metropolitan performances is Giulio Gatti-Casazza, who mingles unostentatiously with the standees. Heinrich Conried used to make speeches in the press room and pass around questionable cigars. Maurice Grau sat in the box office and counted the receipts.

Concert Clash.

To Kreisler or to Zeisler next Saturday afternoon—that is the question. LEONARD LIEBLING.

Alice Verlet's American Debut.

Immediate and impressive was the success of Alice Verlet, the Belgian coloratura soprano, when she faced the first of her American audiences at Columbus, Ohio, on December 4. When seen after the concert, the gracious little lady said: "I could not have had a better debut, a better and more sympathetic audience than the great gathering at Memorial Hall, a better and more obliging local manager than Kate M. Lacey, who strikes me as a genius in her domain of art. The audience looked to me like a sea of faces, and I have faced a good many large ones, their applause sounded like the peal of cannon, which alas, I heard so often before I left my poor little Brussels to sing in this glorious land, which is helping my poor starving countrymen and women. If only I could afford to sing without fee, if I were not myself so impoverished, as one of my houses and my farm near Brussels are destroyed, and my 'little money' is locked up in Brussels banks, I should like to sing up and down and from East to West, to the people of the United States, to the poor and rich, to the villagers, who never hear music, in hospitals and jails, to express my gratitude to the saviors and succorers of my country.

"Helas! I need the money so badly—so I cannot do this my heart's desire; but I shall sing for benefits for the needy and suffering ones in this country wherever I can and whenever called upon."

Her success is shown in the following notice written by the composer and critic, Oley Speaks, in the Ohio State Journal, Columbus, December 5:

"Despite the very inclement weather and a strong charity attraction at the Hartman Theatre, a good-sized audience was in attendance upon the third attraction in Miss Lacey's series of concerts in Memorial Hall last night. Alice Verlat, soprano of the Paris opera, and Albert Spalding, the young American violinist, presented the program.

"Mlle. Verlet was heard in 'Caro Nome,' from Verdi's 'Rigoletto,' the 'Shadow Dance,' from Meyerbeer's 'Dinorah,' the familiar waltz song from Gounod's 'Romeo and Juliet,' and a group of modern French songs. Coloratura singers of Mlle. Verlet's type are a rarity in these days and it was good to hear these old arias sung in such excellent fashion as they were last night.

Mlle. Verlet is a fine exponent of this difficult style of vocal art, her voice is of particularly fresh quality and her command of the vocal pyrotechnics necessary to the delineation of this music is uncommonly good. She has been schooled in this particular style of vocal art and it is, of course, her very best asset. Few singers on the concert stage today could give as good a rendition of the 'Shadow Song' as Mlle. Verlet gave; her scale work and staccato singing were accomplished with ease and clarity. The singer added as extra numbers to the program Landon Ronald's lovely song, 'Down in the Forest,' and Delibes' 'Les Filles de Cadix.' The latter was especially well sung."

GRAND OPERA IN NEW YORK.

"Tristan and Isolde" Receives Brilliant First Performance of Season—"Lohengrin" Is the Brooklyn Offering of the Week—Metropolitan Opera Company's High Standards Adhered to in Each Production.

"Madame Butterfly" November 30.

Strange to relate, the standees were not many at the latest performance of Puccini's sob opera. Is its effect lessening, or does the cast need Caruso to insure the attendance of a vast crowd? As a matter of fact, Martinelli enacted the role of Pinkerton and did it exceedingly well, singing with art and yet with freedom, and acting resourcefully and convincingly. Geraldine Farrar repeated her former success as the little Japanese lady who did not know the tradition about a sailor and his lady love in every port. Rita Fornia has made the part of Suzuki her very own and by innumerable touches of finished histrionism enables it to stand out in striking relief. Scotti was the Consul, as usual, and Toscanini conducted.

"Rosenkavalier," December 2.

"Der Rosenkavalier" was presented before a large audience, and given a performance excellent in most respects. Especially noteworthy was the fine representation of the role allotted to Frieda Hempel, that of the Feldmarschallin. Not only her singing, but also her entire conception of the role, bespoke the intelligent and accomplished artist. Margarete Ober as Octavian acted with finish, and sang as commendably as on former occasions. Hermann Weil, in the role of Herr von Faninal, has not very much opportunity, but in the short singing part he again displayed the refined quality of his baritone voice. Otto Gorlitz was Baron Ochs, as usual. What there is of his voice he uses with care. The many other roles were in capable hands.

It must be said that there are many tiring moments in the score of "Der Rosenkavalier." The first act is much too long and the last act suffers from the same fault. The most interesting act is the second, which was given with splendid effect last Wednesday. All in all, "Der Rosenkavalier" is not the greatest of the works of Richard Strauss. What a charming opera could have been written by Johann Strauss with such a libretto—but then that is another thing. Alfred Hertz conducted.

"Tristan and Isolde," December 3.

A notable performance of Wagner's fervid love epic in tone was led by Arturo Toscanini with remarkable elasticity and elan. It is always a pleasure to listen to his luminous readings and incisive baton mastery. Johanna Gadski was magnificent as Isolde, and revealed the varying phases of that character in a manner to move the fancy and stir the emotions deeply. She makes a very human character of Isolde and avoids the exaggerated poses and super-exalted demeanor which most of the other German interpreters of the role employ in the mistaken notion that such methods make them "heroic." Mme. Gadski's singing was an undiluted joy. Her high tones rang clear, true and full. In the second act she enriched her music with lovely tone color and all the most convincing accents of passion as expressed in vocalism. Jacques Urlus, a dashing and truly romantic Tristan, sang superbly and proved to be a worthy partner for the remarkable Isolde.

Margarete Matzenauer's Brangaene is a splendidly conceived study, full of significant histrionic detail, and sung with infinite resource and eloquent effect. Carl Braun, as King Marke, preserved the best traditions of that role as to dignity and nobility of bearing, and sympathetic resonance in vocal utterance. Hermann Weil was an understanding, well balanced, and finely phrased Kurwenal.

"Tosca," December 4.

Puccini's gory musical melodrama continues to exert a hold on that portion of the public which likes its opera mixed with dramatic sensationalism. It is a form of composition in which Puccini excels, and it must be admitted that it has a certain theatrical fascination, especially for those who retain a large degree of naivété in their operatic tastes. While the gruesome second and third acts of "Tosca" have lost their grip on the regular Metropolitan visitors, there always are enough newcomers to be awesomely impressed and frantically moved. Tenor Martinelli was an admirably brave Mario, who sang with intense feeling and very agreeable tone production. The Martinelli art is improving daily and now has reached noteworthy proportions. Geraldine Farrar was the Tosca, and gave a vivid portrayal of the role. Arturo Toscanini, at the conductor's desk, oftentimes injected into the music nuances which made Puccini's score sound like a far better thing than it is in reality.

Double Bill: December 5 (Matinee).

A vast throng heard Caruso do his imperishably brilliant Canio interpretation in "Pagliacci," to Lucrezia Bori's appealing and sweetly voiced Nedda. The pair roused the audience to wild demonstrations of approval. With Pasquale Amato as Tonio, the effectiveness of the cast was complete. The baritone gave of his best and scored honors fully on a par with those gained by his colleagues. His voice never sounded more polished or more vibrant.

In "Cavalleria Rusticana" the new tenor, Luca Botta, pleased his hearers mightily. Freed from his earlier nervousness, Botta now shows himself to be an experienced and highly artistic singer and an actor possessed of sure and satisfactory routine. He won an exceptional measure of success. Riccardo Tegani, the Alfio, did not make a very good impression. His voice is unsteady and not large. Emmy Destinn, the Santuzza, gave her usual powerful and profoundly effective delivery of the part. Maria Duchene was the Lola and Marie Mattfeld sang Lucia ably. Giorgio Polacco, that spirited conductor, put passion into his work and yet was the exponent of every musical refinement called for in the two hot-blooded scores.

Sunday Metropolitan Concert.

Anna Case, the popular and brilliantly gifted young American singer, who has not yet made her season's operatic debut at the Metropolitan, effected her initial appearance at the Sunday concerts this week, and in the "Lucia" mad scene, and several song examples exhibited that she not only retains her coloratura efficiency of formerly, but also has gained immeasurably as an exponent of the more subtle and artistic phases of song. Her admirable performances were applauded with unusual vim.

The new Sembach sang the "Spring Song," from "Walküre," and the prize song from "Meistersinger," in both of which he confirmed the impression created at his "Parsifal" debut, that he has a sonorous as well as a finely timbred German lyrical tenor voice and the ability to project both dramatic and romantic vocal moods.

Raymonde Delaunois, a Belgian mezzo-soprano, delivered a "Mignon" aria sympathetically.

Efrem Zimbalist, in his own "Polish" and "Hebrew" dances and in Mendelssohn's violin concerto, pleased the audience.

The orchestra played numbers by Berlioz, Liszt, and Delibes.

BROOKLYN ACADEMY.

"Lohengrin," December 5,

"Lohengrin" was given an excellent performance by the Metropolitan Opera Company at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Saturday evening, December 5. The cast included Basil Ruysdael as Heinrich, Jacques Urlus as Lohengrin, Johanna Gadski as Elsa, Otto Goritz as Frederich and Arthur Middleton as the Herald. Margaret Ober, who was to have sung the role of Ortrud, was indisposed, and her place was taken by Margarete Matzenauer. The opera was conducted by Alfred Hertz.

A large and appreciative audience was in attendance, and followed with interest the lovely music and impressive scenes abounding in Wagner's popular opera. This was the third visit of the Metropolitan Opera Company to Brooklyn this season, and the occasion was a notable one, as usual.

The Music of the English Soldiers.

[By John F. Runciman, in The London Saturday Review.]

The thin red line of the English exists no more; no more does the British square blaze in scarlet. The shining cuirasses of the French are shrouded in straw, rags, what not; the brilliance of the steel helmets is dulled. Man, taking at last a hint from the insect and dumb animal creation, has learned to make himself as little as possible distinguishable from the woods and fields amid which he strides or rides. The pomp and circumstance of war are departed. The bandsmen and trumpet majors and drum majors of past days no longer play on the road to battle; their trumpets, bugles, fifes and drums no longer o'ercrow the roar of the cannon. An authority tells me that the band led the army into action until "the advent of arms of precision." Then they allowed themselves to be pushed out of the way—not to speak disparagingly of them, for from their ranks stepped forth some of the bravest of the brave—to the background.

In modern warfare this was inevitable. Apart from the evident folly of placing a small squad of bandsmen where the enemy could shoot them down, war has become a scientific game in which secrecy is one of the chief factors. I remember reading that at Waterloo the trumpets of Blucher's host were heard for more than an hour before it came up. Nowadays our Wellingtons will receive a telephone message, and the enemy will get no hint that it is time to move; he may therefore stay a little longer and get more decisively cut up. Bandmasters and bandsmen have not witnessed the change without scorn and fears for the future. But they may take heart. The picturesque, the theatrical, element has gone out of fighting; yet the band has as large a share in the real business of war, the fundamental, effective business, as ever it had—on the whole, I think, a larger share.

The altered position of the band corresponds to the altered conception of what an army should be when it goes out to give battle. At one time, when men had been taught to march in step, to handle a musket, a sword, or a pick, or a lance, and to understand and obey the word of command, it was considered they were sufficiently fit to take the field. In those days the band was a rudimentary concern. When Napoleon threatened our shores and every citizen hastened to join the train bands, a few marrow bones, each with a few holes dexterously drilled in them, formed the "wind" section of the band, which, for the rest, was made up of drums, big or little—anything the musicians could lay hands on. Their duty was to cheer our men on the march. Previous to that, at Oudenarde and Fontenoy, our generals had perceived the value of really musical bands playing popular national songs, dances and marches; and despite the opposition of what corresponded to the War Office of yesterday, bands were gradually built up in this country. Aristocratic officers of the seventeenth and eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries paid out of their own pockets for the music which successive governments denied them. The Royal Artillery led the way. By a long series of happy chances one powerful colonel after another happened to love music, and besides enjoying it for its own sake, perceived its practical usefulness. Kneller Hall was state property, having been acquired by the Government in 1840 to serve as a training school for the masters of elementary schools. It became a music school and was supported by contributions from officers and the bands of various regiments from 1857, and it was not fully taken over by the state until 1875. Long before this date the Royal Artillery band was celebrated not only in England, but throughout Europe, its fame reaching even America; and those who heard its performances at Queen's Hall a few years ago will cordially acknowledge the fine results achieved by a line of highly competent conductors—notably, Mackenzie, Collins, Smyth and Zavertal. Without the enthusiastic support, the practical, financial help, of the successive commanders, and indeed all the officers, these results could not have been attained. The bandsmen handle with equal mastery the military instruments and those of the ordinary concert orchestra; and for nigh a hundred years the foremost musicians of each generation have paid due tribute of praise to the unvarying excellence of their performances. I do not wish to exalt this band at the expense of others; simply I select the Royal Artillery as an example or specimen or sample of what is being done in the army, and I have in mind a book I read not long ago, H. G. Farmer's most interesting "Memoirs of the Royal Artillery Band," which I recommend to every one.

How well the army bands play is known to every one who is not above listening to them in London's parks and gardens. I have often paid a penny in Embankment Gardens and enjoyed Mozart, Beethoven, Haydn and Wagner. Only a few days ago I heard Lieutenant Hans—in spite of his name an Englishman if there is one alive—and his gallant men go brilliantly through an admirable program—and this again I mention simply as a sample. It may be asked what this sort of thing and concerts in Queen's Hall have to do with the music of real war. Well, we know the tag, "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war." This may quite rightly be taken to mean that the victories of war are largely won in times of peace. And the drill sergeant knows how music keeps up the soldier's spirits and reconciles him to the hours and days of military training; he will give his heart to his work if it is relieved by the display days when he marches through the streets with banners flying and accompanied by his band. Not being versed in Wellington literature, I do not know what he thought of music; but I fancy that the commander who wrote a long letter—addressed to a general, too—concerning the relative merits of tin and iron camp kettles, must have observed that his forces marched better and longer with a band to cheer them up than without a band. I feel certain Lord Kitchener knows it. Our men went through France singing "It's a Long Way to Tipperary," and I am told that those who could not sing whistled, and those who had an instrument played it. The early warriors used their bands to hearten themselves and scare the enemy. But I fear this help to success in arms has gone out. On the battle ground only half a dozen bugle or trumpet calls linger—"Commence" or "Continue firing," "Stand fast" or "Cease fire," "Execute orders received," "Charge" (which, my authority says, is rarely used), and the "Alarm." These are infantry calls, and the cavalry possess a larger number. Police whistles are used by company officers to regulate the firing in certain circumstances.

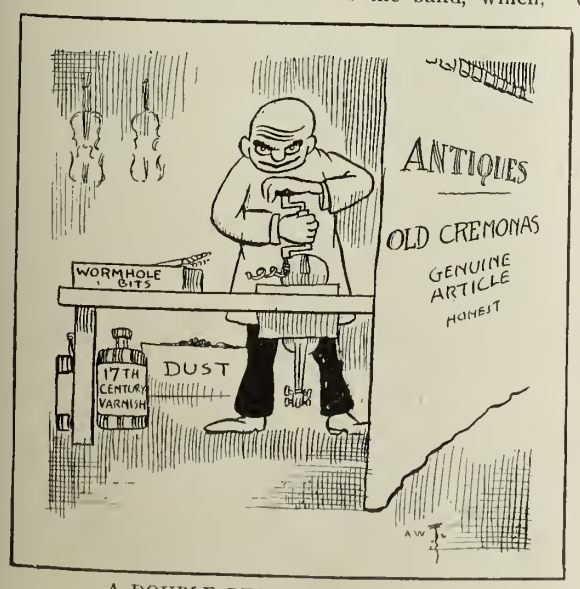
The shades of the brave men who died at Waterloo may frown contemptuously, thinking our elaborate bands of trumpets, flutes, oboes, clarinets, horns, bassoons, euphoniums and drums far beneath those who marched to death to the music of drum and fife; but as a matter of fact it was these old drummers and fifers who were there for show, and it is our perfectly equipped modern bands which exist for real use. Not only do they beguile wearying marches on the route and make a brave display in the towns, but the concerts they give in peace time afford officers and men alike a source of recreation healthier by far than the amusements of a bygone age. Wellington's braves passed their off duty hours in drinking mainly, and in dicing, cards, prize fighting and cock fighting. What would a colonel of 1800 say to a colonel of 1900 who in his leisure sits down with his officers and hears the piano part in a Brahms trio? Effeminate? I doubt it—or rather I have no doubts about the matter, for I know that as brave deeds have been done in our time, and will be done in the present war, as any we can read of in the history books and accounts of former wars.

About Kneller Hall there remains to say a good deal, which must be left over for my next article. The splendid work done by the officials there, and especially by Major Stretton, ought to be recognized; and, incidentally, I shall have to criticise all the Ministers who have held office since 1857 for the shameful way the bands have been starved. But, leaving this for the moment, let me remind readers that, besides theatres there are concerts and opera to be supported. The Promenades are in full and glorious swing, and the Carl Rosa company is coming to London if there is any prospect of its paying its way.

States That Lag in Music for Schools.

[Newark, N. J., Star.]

Introducing to the country the first national report on music in the public schools, which Will Earhart, director of music in the Pittsburgh schools, has prepared, P. P. Claxton, United States Commissioner of education, under whose direction the report was compiled, says:



"That music plays an important part in the system of education in any State or nation has been understood for three thousand years. Among a practical, industrial, commercial people like ourselves, good music is necessary not only for enjoyment and recreation, but also for salvation from death in the din and dust of trade; and this music should be democratic in the truest and best sense. This it can never be until it becomes an integral part of the education given in the public schools of all grades, as in the schools of some other countries."

Gathering data for the report in all States of the union, Alaska and the Philippines, Hawaii and Porto Rico, Mr. Earhart struck an oddity in finding the best systems for applying music in the public schools in the island possessions, where school systems were practically unknown before the American occupation. In his report he distinguishes, however, between the best system and the best results, pointing out that many American cities are far ahead in results obtained, often from a poor system.

Returns from most States, Mr. Earhart found, show State laws as a rule notably incomplete in providing for special instruction in music, art and the like. In Kansas, for instance, applicants for a license to teach are required to pass examination in everything except music.

Music is a required study in schools in ten States and is not required in thirty-seven. The ten States are California, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Maryland, Nevada, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Utah and Washington.

While these ten States have better regulations for instilling music in the people through the public schools than in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico and the Philippines, Mr. Earhart said he found the islands "in harmony with the spirit of the people who are fond of music and, among the better classes, acquainted with its literature."

ELEONORA DE CISNEROS' BRILLIANT CAREER IN OPERA AND CONCERT.

Popular Artist Has Achieved Fame on Two Continents—Her Presence in America Is a Welcome Addition to Our Musical Life This Season.

Eleonora de Cisneros, mezzo-soprano-contralto, who is now in America under the management of Antonia Sawyer, has undoubtedly had one of the most remarkably meteoric careers of any artist now before the public. Her debut was made only a comparatively short time ago, her success was immediate and her acceptance by the managers as an artist of worth followed as a matter of course. Mme. de Cisneros has made several extended concert tours and has been busy year after year as a member of various opera companies in Europe and America without any intermission except those required for rest and recuperation. It is fair to say that her successes in the leading opera establishments of the world constitute a record. This list was published recently in the columns of the MUSICAL COURIER, and showed her appearance in twenty-four opera houses in the principal cities of Europe and America, in many cases during a number of consecutive seasons at the same house. She was booked this season for the operas of Berlin, Madrid, Barcelona, Chicago, etc., but canceled the European dates on account of the war. She was in Paris engaged in Red Cross work when Mrs. Sawyer completed arrangements with her, already reported in these columns.

Mme. de Cisneros is unusually well fitted for recital work as, in addition to her vast operatic repertoire, she is conversant with the entire standard literature of the songs of France, Italy, Germany, Spain and Russia, and sings also the best works by English and American composers. Her most recent successes have been achieved with the Boston Covent Garden Company during its recent Paris season; at Barcelona last spring, and at Parma during the Verdi festival.

Mme. de Cisneros is tall and regal in appearance and possesses, above all things, a personality which breathes both sympathy and strength. It is perhaps due, at least to some extent, to the magnetism of her personality that her success has been so rapid and so complete. But no amount of magnetism could make up for any deficiency in art, and the triumphant career of Mme. de Cisneros is sufficient proof of the fact that her art shows no such deficiency. Press notices which she has received during her frequent appearance in many different cities throughout the world all echo the same unstinted praise for the beauty of her voice, the perfection of her emission, enunciation and interpretation, and her perfect musicianship.

Beyond a doubt Mme. de Cisneros is one of the world's best artists and her presence in this country is a welcome addition to the musical life of America.

Emma Loeffler Is Busy.

Emma Loeffler, the soprano, is having a busy season. On November 15 she was heard with the Schubert Männerchor, New York, where she achieved a great success, and she also appeared as soloist at the faculty concert of the New York College of Music, given in Carnegie Hall, November 20. The first day of December marked the opening of her new studio at 308 West Eighty-eighth street, New York, at which there were nearly a hundred invited guests, who listened to a delightful program presented by artist friends, and who attended the reception which followed the musical half of the evening.

During January and February Miss Loeffler plans to give a series of "musical character teas," when interesting places will be presented in an instructive as well as entertaining fashion. Details of these "teas" will be announced later in these columns. Miss Loeffler has been engaged to sing during the course of lectures at the Educational Institute to be held at Washington, Pa., from December 14 to December 18 inclusive. Of especial interest will be the explanatory remarks with which she will preface each of her selections, thus adding greatly to the enjoyment of those who are not thoroughly educated in all that pertains to music and its history.

She will return to New York in time to appear at a concert to be held in the Seventy-first Regiment Armory, at which she will sing two arias, accompanied by orchestra.

A Zoellner Quartet Tribute.

From the president of the Ladies' Morning Musical Club, Quebec, Canada, comes the following communication apropos of the Zoellner Quartet:

Quebec, Canada, November 28, 1914.

DEAR SIR: We, the Ladies' Morning Musical Club of Quebec, organized a grand concert this week for the relief of the Belgians, and the Zoellner Quartet played at this concert before a crowded house. All those present thought the quartet a wonderfully artistic association. Their program was a very varied one and in all the different numbers the Zoellners showed originality, delicacy and an exceptional comprehension of Beethoven. One feels such perfection in the interpretation of masters cannot be praised too much.

Yours truly,
(Signed) ANGELINA ROUTHIER.

ERIE IS MUSICALLY ALIVE.

Erie, Pa., December 3, 1914.

The concert of the Erie Symphony Orchestra, Franz Kohler, conductor, which was given on Sunday afternoon, November 22, is reviewed in another portion of this issue.

A number of Erie's musicians journeyed to Edinboro, Saturday, November 28, to attend the Riheldaffer-Skibinsky concert at the Edinboro Normal School. Mme. Riheldaffer is well known in Erie, where she has appeared in the past. Her contributions to the program consisted of three operatic arias and two groups of songs which were given with rare art and sincerity. Clarence Velie, accompanist, who also gave one solo number, Liszt's eight Hungarian rhapsodie, supplied particularly sympathetic accompaniments. Mr. Skibinsky was heard in three interesting violin numbers.

The Apollo Club, under the baton of Morris Gabriel Williams, opened its season, Thursday, October 29, presenting as assisting artist Anna Case, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Case was, without an exception, one of the most delightful sopranos who have appeared in Erie in past years, the ease of her singing, splendid stage presence, cultivated as a result of her operatic work, and her charming manner, won her audience at once. For her share in the program she gave two groups of songs and arias from "Traviata" and "Sonnambula." Her exquisite coloratura work in the latter caused rounds of applause at its conclusion. The Apollo Club, under Mr. Williams' baton, shows steady advancement, as only a chorus of men can under such a competent director as Mr. Williams has proved himself to be. The singers gave Sullivan's "The Beleaguered" and De Koven's arrangement of Kipling's "Recessional" for their big numbers, and both were done with splendid volume and dramatic intensity. They also gave Burleigh's "Mother o' Mine," Metcalfe's "Absent," Cadman's "From the Land of the Sky Blue Water," and a group of lighter numbers.

Charles Hooper, tenor, has been reengaged for the Park Presbyterian Quartet. Mr. Hooper has been out of church work for the past few years, but was prevailed upon to resume his work at the Park, where he formerly held the tenor position for a number of years. Mrs. C. W. McKean, soprano, has charge of the music at the Park, the balance of the choir consisting of Ann Henratta, contralto; Wilson Bushnell, baritone, and Burham Hulbert, organist.

Victor Vaughn Lytle, recently engaged as organist at the First Presbyterian Church, was heard in a musicianly program, given entirely without notes, Tuesday evening, October 27. Mr. Lytle is a member of the Kohler-Williams School of Music, and is a valuable addition to Erie music circles, as he proved at this opening recital given on the mammoth organ in the First Church auditorium. Wilson Bushnell, baritone, has been engaged for the Jewish Temple Quartet.

Georgie French Brevellier recently returned from a season of study with her teacher, Eleanor McClellan, of New York City. Mrs. Brevellier spends some time each winter studying with this well known vocal authority of New York. While there she was a soloist on a number of programs. Will Carroll filled Mrs. Brevellier's position at the First Church of Christ, Scientist, while she was away. Mrs. C. W. McKean is another local vocal teacher who coaches each winter with Miss McCellan. Mrs. McKean expects to spend some time in New York after the first of the year.

WILSON ROOT BUSHNELL.

Washington College of Music Growing.

The Washington College of Music, Washington, D. C., has been growing steadily under the guidance of its president, Samuel M. Fabian. The other officers are Frank Norris Jones, vice-president, and W. W. Delano, secretary and treasurer. The examining board consists of Edgar Paul, Anton Kaspar, Wilberfoss G. Owst, and the president and vice-president. A resume of the work and aims of this institution includes a short biographical sketch of the members of the faculty, which, in addition to the examining board, includes Ethel Holtzclaw Gawlor, John G. Klein, Isabel Jarvis Primm, Beulah L. Harper, Marcia Lettie Merrill, James W. Cheney, Jr., Daisy Fickenscher, Estelle Smith-Pope, Henry Jaeger, Andrea Coda, Dore Wolfsteiner, Guy G. Gaugler, C. G. Rivot, Signora R. S. Chiaventoni, Edythe Marmion Brosius, Effie K. Baker, Julia Huggins, Maria Lee Goodwin and others. Under the intelligent direction of Mr. Fabian the thoroughness of this institution is becoming widely recognized, while its charming atmosphere and its many enjoyable social affairs make it an excellent home school for the student of music.

NEW YORK PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA IN BALTIMORE.

Famous Organization Performs Tschaikowsky and Wagner Program—Florestan Club Manuscript Evening—Notes

213 Prospect Avenue,
Baltimore, Md., December 4, 1914.

Monday, November 23, witnessed the opening of the season of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Josef Stransky, conductor—an occasion which can only be described as brilliant. A capacity audience was attracted by the beautiful program, which consisted of Tschaikowsky's "Pathétique" symphony, with excerpts from Wagner's operas for the shorter numbers. Mme. Gadski sang wonderfully, arousing her hearers to such a pitch of enthusiasm that the concert could scarcely proceed.

A BUSY PIANIST.

Marguerite Wilson Maas, pianist, is receiving many deserved encomiums for her work in the concert field this season. Her debut recital called forth most favorable notices in the newspapers, as well as enthusiastic applause from the audience. Since then she has made numerous appearances in local concerts, the most recent being a recital at the Woman's Club of Roland Park, where she was assisted by Clara Paine Gault, soprano. Miss Maas has a fine technical equipment as a foundation on which to build her poetic structures. Her florid work discloses a strength one would not expect from her slight frame. That she has intellect as well as agile fingers is proved by her compositions, of which several have been presented this season, notably a "Theme and Variations" for piano. She will play at the Arundel Club in December.

RUSSIAN VIOLINIST IN RECITAL.

On the evening of November 21, a concert was given at the Vernon Methodist Church, at which Henri de Pavloff, violinist, made a successful appearance, his first public concert in this city. He was assisted by a string quartet and by Mrs. Frank Addison, contralto.

PAVLOWA AT THE LYRIC.

Pavlowa and her company appeared at the Lyric on Saturday. The orchestra, under Theodore Stier, was exceptionally good in a program, which included numbers by Saint-Saëns, Grieg, Brahms, Moussorgsky and Glazounoff.

FIELD NIGHT AT THE FLORESTAN CLUB.

Tuesday night of last week at the Florestan Club was the first of this season's manuscript evenings. Novelties by Gustav Strube, Alfred Fuerthmaier, Howard Thatcher, W. G. Owst, George F. Boyle and Theodore Hemberger were presented. Last Tuesday's entertainment consisted of a song recital by John Phelps, baritone, accompanied by Harwood Knight.

NOTES.

A new feature has been introduced into the rehearsals of the Oratorio Society by Director Josef Pache, in the form of short recitals, to be given midway in the evening's work. At Monday's rehearsal, Katharine Kemp, soprano, sang a Handel aria and the "Spirit Flower," by Campbell-Tipton.

Eleanor Spencer's New York Tributes.

Eleanor Spencer, who played with the Philharmonic Society of New York on the afternoon of November 27, may well be proud of her success. The entire daily press of New York showed itself to be strictly in her favor and with the high standard of New York musical taste and the immense competition, the critics are naturally fastidious and difficult to please. The New York Press speaks of Miss Spencer as an artist of whom her compatriots may well be proud, and says that her playing would receive recognition in any musical community of the civilized world. The Herald says that her interpretation was sympathetic and broad, and the American calls her an artist of much ability and charm, and says that she played with inspiration and musicianship. The World says that her performance was distinguished by a clear and fluent technic, well balanced nuance, and much musical intelligence. The Tribune, Sun, Post, etc., accord her the same high praise.

Spooner Goes West Again.

Philip Spooner, tenor, left New York on Saturday, December 5, for the West, where he opens his second Western tour this season today, December 9, at Oshkosh, Wis. His appearances also include Milwaukee, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Chicago and other cities.

New York Oratorio Concert This Evening.

Sir Edward Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" will be presented this evening, December 9, by the New York Oratorio Society, Louis Koemmenich, conductor, for the sixth time in its history, at Carnegie Hall, New York.

MINNEAPOLIS EVENTS.

Symphony Orchestra Entertains Young People and Gives a Popular Concert—A Trio Program.

Minneapolis, Minn., December 1, 1914.

Emil Oberhoffer told the sweetest fairy tales of them all at the third Young People's Orchestra Concert, on November 27, at the Auditorium. These were "Hänsel and Gretel," "Königskinder," "Schneewitchen" and "Kikimore." It is so interesting to hear the verbal explanations that one local reporter suggests that we always have program notes spoken. It is not a bad idea, either. All four of these operas were beautifully played by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. The writer has gone into such details about the wonderful work being done here for the children that there is no need of further comment, except just to say that it was another of those instructive and interesting afternoons.

MINNEAPOLIS TRIO.

The Minneapolis Trio has again established itself in the hearts of the Minneapolis music lovers. Any body of men or women who come together and work hard for the love of art pure and simple will win gratitude, but these artists are the recipients of the most humble thanks for bringing all this lovely chamber music. The novelty on the program, November 25, was the trio by Korngold. This is on a strictly classic pattern and shows great merit—the first movement being the least interesting. The middle part is a delightful change, though it has a little stamp of Brahms. The larghetto has much rare beauty—in the last movement all the "imps of eccentricity" are let loose and it is sprightly and humorous. The closing is on six-four time, which gives very much the impression of a Viennese waltz. The three executants played the whole work with marvelous skill and great tonal beauty. Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata, for violin and piano, and the Brahms trio, in C minor, op. 101, were the other numbers on the program. Mr. Scheurer, the violinist of this organization, played the "Kreutzer" sonata with conscientious correctness. Mr. Fabbrini is always an elegant pianist, and in this number was heard with delight. He adds finesse to an almost faultless technic. The Brahms trio was a splendid finale for this program and in this work the splendid tone of Mr. van Vliet, the cellist, was a joy to hear. His tone is insistent and carrying, his pianissimos are wonderfully contrasted with any forte passage that he plays, and his interpretation is always smooth and finished. The next trio concert will be on January 21 at the same place, the Unitarian Church.

ORCHESTRAL "POP" CONCERT.

The sixth concert of the first series of the popular concerts given by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra took place at the Auditorium, November 29, at 3.30 p. m. The program contained Weber's overture "Oberon," Mendelssohn's notturno and scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream," Sibelius' "Valse Trieste" and tone poem from "Finlandia," Bizet's "Egyptian Dance" from "Djamileh," and three excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust." Edna Gunnar Peterson, pianist, was the soloist. She chose "Capriccio Brillante," by Mendelssohn, and the "Hungarian Fantasie," by Liszt. Her technic is clear, her playing is brilliant, and it appealed to the audience, for she received tremendous applause, and responded to one encore.

RUTH ANDERSON.

Maximilian Pilzer's Violin Recital.

Maximilian Pilzer's violin recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on Sunday evening, December 6, attracted a large audience, composed mainly of professional and amateur violinists, whose stamp of approval was manifest throughout the entire program by bestowing liberal applause.

Mr. Pilzer, who has long been recognized as one of America's foremost violinists, selected a program, as follows, of great interest, which gave him opportunity to display his versatility:

Concerto, E major ..... Bach
Humoresque, No. 1 ..... Victor Kolar
Humoresque, No. 3 ..... Victor Kolar
Mazurka ..... Zarzycki
Grand concerto, D minor ..... Vieuxtemps
Berceuse ..... Miximilian Pilzer
Orientale ..... Maximilian Pilzer
Sérenade Mélancolique ..... Tschaikowsky
Zapateado ..... Sarasate

Whether he plays the classics or works of the modern or virtuoso school, his artistic and finished performance invariably appeals to his listeners. The artist demonstrated again that his reputation is founded on a solid basis. He captivated his audience by his manly tone, even, reliable technic and musicianly interpretation. His rendition of the Bach E major concerto was a marvel of musicianship. He played like one inspired and received much deserved applause. All his other numbers were artistically rendered, particularly Vieuxtemps' D minor concerto, in which the artist displayed great technical skill. The last number, Sarasate's "Zapateado," brought forth deafening applause, bordering on an ovation. Mr. Pilzer responded with three encores.

Mozart Society Second Musicale.

Members of the New York Mozart Society, Mrs. Noble McConnell, president, who were unable to hear Frances Alda in her Carnegie Hall, New York, recital, last week, were fortunate in being able to hear the Metropolitan Opera soprano in many of the same songs, in the more intimate circle of the society at the Hotel Astor, New York, Saturday afternoon, December 5, and those who had heard her already in recital were doubly fortunate.

There were a few changes, as will be seen from a comparison of the following Mozart Society programs and Mme. Alda's program given with a review of the above mentioned recital: "M'ha preso alla sua ragna," Paradies; "Polly Willis," "The Plague of Love," "The Lass With the Delicate Air," Dr. Arne; "Im Kahne," Grieg; "Spinnlied," Moniuszko; "J'ai pleure en rêve," Hüe; "Fleur j'etée," Fauré; "Ouvre tes yeux bleus," Massenet; "My Lovely Celia," Munroe; "A des Oiseaux," Hüe; "I Came With a Song," "In Pride of May," Frank la Forge; "An Open Secret," Woodman, and "Un Bel di," from "Madama Butterfly," Puccini.

Frank la Forge, the composer-pianist, Mme. Alda's accompanist, furnished four particularly pleasing numbers: Triana, "Suburb of Seville," Albenez; "Scherzo," D'Albert; "Romance," La Forge; "Etincelles," Moszkowski.

Mme. Alda appeared before this society last spring and was at that time warmly received by the Mozartians. On Saturday afternoon she was in especially good voice and happy mood, and again proved her popularity with the members of the society.

Mr. La Forge was likewise warmly received.

Mrs. McConnell announced a marked increase in membership, and also that the club was never in so prosperous a condition.

The large numbers in attendance at these Saturday afternoon musicales are indeed an obvious indication of the active interest of each member in the program and the society.

Cincinnati Orchestra Concert.

Cincinnati, Ohio, December 4, 1914.

The fifth concert of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra today in Emery Auditorium was devoted to the works of two great composers, Schumann and Beethoven. Dr. Ernst Kunwald had built up a program that was bright and happy, with the single exception of the tragic overture "Coriolan," which, however sad the theme that inspired it, reflects all the charm and beauty of Beethoven.

The concert opened with the overture to Schumann's "Genoveva." Melodious and colorful, it was given a very fine reading by Dr. Kunwald, who made the most of its dramatic possibilities. The piano concerto by the same composer introduced Eleanor Spencer as soloist. This was Miss Spencer's first appearance in Cincinnati and her success with the audience was instantaneous. The work itself is so lovely that one can hardly think of a pianist who would not be moved by its many beauties to unusual efforts, inspirational flights, as it were. Miss Spencer's poetic and imaginative nature were revealed in her splendid interpretation of this masterpiece. A facile technic and a gracious personality are among the attributes Miss Spencer may justly claim, and certainly no work she could have chosen would have fitted her talents better than the Schumann concerto.

The symphony of the afternoon was Beethoven's No. 1, in C major, an example of the master's earlier purely sunny days. The technical excellence of the orchestra was fully demonstrated in the tempo set by Dr. Kunwald, in the final movement, which was taken with wonderful swing and joyousness.

JESSIE PARTLON TYREE.

Margaret Shirley in Three Cities.

Margaret Shirley gave a program of French, English, German and Italian songs, at the Immaculata Seminary, Washington, D. C., before an enthusiastic audience of representative society people, foreign ministers, diplomats and university professors, November 24. She was complimented especially on the delivery of her German songs by one of the German professors present.

On November 28 she sang at Chickering Hall, New York.

December 17, she is to be the soloist at a musical affair given by the Co-educational Club of Chicago, and December 19, for the Catholic Woman's League at the Auditorium Hotel, Chicago.

Music in the Public Library.

It will probably be welcome news to music lovers in this community that the circulating music department of the Chicago Public Library is now so advanced that the collection will be ready for the purposes for which it was installed by the middle of next month, says Felix Borowski in the Chicago Herald of September 22, 1914.

Owing to the European war it is scarcely likely that the library will be able to provide its readers at once with all the music which originally was ordered for its shelves. A large part of that music is published in Germany, and there is not much art finding its way to America from the Kaiser's realm. Nevertheless, the music department of the library has not been crippled in its endeavors to represent Teutonic composition as completely as possible, for many works already were in the storage rooms of American music dealers when the war broke out, and a considerable amount of it which had been ordered from abroad just before the fighting began found its way safely to this country. It is estimated by Mr. Legler, chief director of the library's operations, that about three-quarters of the total amount of music ordered will be in possession of his institution by the time the department is thrown open to the public.

An important branch of the collection will be that devoted to chamber music. Owing to the great expense of instrumental ensemble compositions there has been in this country much less opportunity for the playing of chamber music than there is in Europe, where music is cheaper and tariff tolls are not imposed upon it. While this department of the library's activities probably will be hit hardest by the paralysis of export business in Germany, there is plenty of chamber music to satisfy the needs of admirers of this form of art.

The new division of the library will offer an admirable list of piano music—a list which will include, in addition to the names and the works of European writers, those of American composers. There will be available, too, a comprehensive collection of songs, and many of these will be the product of native writers. A large proportion of those which have been the creation of foreign masters are provided with English translations as well as with the text of the language in which originally they were composed.

Considering the prevailing enthusiasm for dramatic music, it is evident that the library authorities have been well advised to stock their shelves with operas. They are already possessed of all the standard works of the classical stage, but there are, in addition, quite a number of operas which, even if they have not yet joined the goodly company of the immortals, are of no little fascination and artistic worth. Singers who have a fancy for bits of dramatic compositions rather than for the complete works themselves, have been considered, for a large number of arias have been included in the department of songs.

To the music student one of the most useful features of the new division of Mr. Legler's institution will be the collection of full orchestral scores. For the sake of convenience, most of the literature that thus far has been accumulated has consisted of that admirable edition of scores in pocket size, issued by Payne, of Leipsic. A vast amount of chamber music also has been purchased in this form. There are something like 130 miniature scores in that department and miniature orchestral scores number about 63 symphonies, 100 overtures, 40 concertos, and of miscellaneous pieces—symphonic poems, marches, variations and the like—some 100 examples.

Choral music has not been forgotten in making up the new music catalogue. All the works of this class that are of importance have been included, and most of them are provided with English texts. While this collection of choral music is made up for the most part of oratorios and cantatas, church music has not been given a place, for it would serve but little useful purpose in a circulating library.

It will be interesting to watch the outcome of the library's new departure. That it must exercise a most beneficial influence upon artistic culture there can be scarcely any question. The music that is to be offered will be of the best; the trashy song and the inferior dance will not be there to vitiate the taste of the readers. Nor can it be doubted that a circulating music department will stimulate the business of music selling and music teaching.

Elsie T. Cowen, Accompanist.

Elsie T. Cowen's earnest efforts as an accompanist and coach are being crowned with merited praise. Of her work at the recent recital given by Marie Morrisey, contralto, at Aeolian Hall, New York, the New York World declared "She may be commended for her serviceable assistance at the piano," while the Brooklyn Daily Eagle spoke of her as a "skillful accompanist." On December 13, Miss Cowen will accompany Mrs. Morrisey at a recital to be given in Waterbury, Conn.

CENTURY OPERA COMPANY PERFORMING IN CHICAGO.

Second Week of Opera in English Strengthens Good Opinion Formulated—Twenty-Fifth Anniversary of Auditorium to Be Fittingly Celebrated—Amateur Musical Club Concert—Apollo Club to Sing "The Messiah"—Concerts and Notes.

Chicago, Ill., December 5, 1914.

The second week of grand opera in English by the Century Opera Company strengthened the good opinion formulated during the initial week. The repertoire was made up as follows: Monday and Wednesday evenings and Saturday matinee, "Madam Butterfly"; Tuesday, and Friday evenings, "William Tell"; Wednesday matinee and Saturday evening, "Trovatore."

The Century Opera Company's success during its forty-one weeks in New York had its raison d'etre, as each performance was adequate. "William Tell" was the first important novelty given since the opening of the season. This opera had not been heard in Chicago in a score of years, and it never was presented in English in this country until the Century organization gave it in the vernacular in New York this season. The cast on Tuesday included Louis Kreidler, who sang the title role; Orville Harrold, who was the Arnold; Henry Weldon, the Furst; Lois Ewell sang Matilda; Kathleen Howard, Hedwiga; and Jeannette Kann, Jemmy. The work of the orchestra and chorus all through the week was of the highest degree of excellence, and each one of the principals can well be associated in the big artistic success achieved by this company at the Auditorium. Whatever the financial success might be at the close of the season, the Century Opera Company will have done much toward bringing popularity to grand opera in Chicago.

Salaries Reduced.

The salaries of the principals of the Century Opera Company have been cut 25 per cent. This reduction was due to the fact that the company has been losing money on its Chicago performances and it was a case of reducing salaries or shortening the duration of the season. The artists volunteered to offer their services at a 25 per cent. reduction and they so informed Milton Aborn, though it is said the reduction was not asked either by the direction or the board of directors; but when the artists heard that the season might be cut short they wisely preferred a reduction in their salaries.

Auditorium Opening to be Celebrated.

Next Wednesday will be the twenty-fifth anniversary of the opening of the Auditorium, and the management of the Century Grand Opera Company has arranged for the celebration, a performance of "Romeo and Juliet." When the Auditorium was inaugurated the production was the same opera, with Patti in the leading role. President Wilson, Vice-President Marshall, John Wanamaker and Mayor Carter H. Harrison are among those invited by the management.

Alma Gluck's Recital.

Alma Gluck, who heretofore filled yearly the Illinois and Studebaker theatres, was secured for an appearance at Orchestra Hall last Sunday afternoon, November 29, and as a matter of record it might be said that the vast hall was completely sold out to greet one of America's most popular songstresses. Manager Neumann once more showed wisdom in bringing this singer to a hall exclusively reserved for artists having big drawing power, and, as ever, Mr. Neumann's judgment proved correct. In such environments the recitalist found herself in a most inspiring mood, and again her magnetism, charming personality and graceful manners were in evidence and won for her many new friends, beside strengthening the friendship of her former admirers, of which there are legions in this city.

To review separately each number is deemed unnecessary. Alma Gluck is a mistress in program making; a better balanced program has seldom been heard here. It was varied, interesting and gave opportunities to the recitalist to bring out her full vocal equipment and to show her versatility as an interpreter of the classics and also her efficiency as a linguist. She sang in French, German, Russian, Dutch and English. Her printed program contained some twenty-one selections. Many of them had to be repeated, and several extra numbers had to be added, and the songstress probably gave as many as thirty-two songs, three encores being sung at the end of the program to make the measure an even number. Madame Gluck's success was emphatic and deservedly so.

Walter Spry School Faculty Concert.

The first faculty concert of the Walter Spry Music School took place at the Fine Arts Theatre, on Sunday afternoon, November 29. The soloists were Minnie Fish-Griffin, soprano, who was heard in the Brahms "Von Waldumkrämzter Hohe" and "Geheimnis," both of which were well rendered by the soprano, even though her higher tones were forced and she sang at times off pitch. In the Tschaikowsky "Wär ich nicht ein Halm," and in two songs by Van Eycken, "Frage" and "Princessin," Mrs. Griffin came into her own and was heard to best advantage. The singer was beautifully supported at the piano by Walter Spry, who deserves credit for his most artistic accompaniments. Hugo Kortschak, formerly second concertmaster of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and now head of the violin department at the Spry School, played the Bach prelude in E major and the Mozart adagio in E major, in both of which he once more revealed himself a morbid interpreter of the classics.

James Whittaker, assistant to Mr. Spry in the piano department, won the success of the afternoon by a most interesting reading of the Grieg scenes from folk life, op. 19. Mr. Whittaker has much to recommend him to the musical public, as he is well equipped technically as well as temperamentally. His playing revealed a deep student and his interpretation was all that could be desired. He made a most favorable impression and should be heard again. Mr. Kortschak, Mrs. Griffin and Mr. Whittaker gave other selections which were not, however, heard by this reviewer.

Allen Spencer in Demand.

Allen Spencer is busy teaching over fifty pupils from twelve States. Besides this, he will give a two-piano recital with Glenn Dillard Gunn in December, and after the first of the year he will give his own piano recital in the Fine Arts Theatre. Through his manager, Fannie Warren, he has already been booked for the following dates, all at well known colleges: Alvra College, Alvra, Mich.; De Pauw University, Indiana; Heidelburg University, Tiffin, Ohio; Valparaiso College; Kemper Hall, Kenosha, Wis., and many other dates are pending which will be published in these columns later on.

Amateur Musical Club Concert.

The Amateur Musical Club program on Monday afternoon, November 30, gave opportunity for a large audience to hear Mrs. Torgerson, Amy Keith Jones and Emmeran Stoeber in two trios for harp, violin and cello. Mabel Sharp Herdien sang five selections, among them "I Tell You Over and Over" and "Requiescat," by Clough-Leiter, both well performed and not heard before on the Amateur programs. Celene Loveland, pianist, played with taste and virility three selections by Ganz, Schmitt and MacDowell. Both Mrs. Herdien and Miss Loveland were applauded by this discriminating audience and they richly deserved their success.

Bush Conservatory Recital.

On Friday evening, December 4, at the Bush Conservatory, a recital given by Joe Wynne, pianist, pupil of Harold von Mickwitz, and Julia Manierre, soprano, pupil of Charles W. Clark. Mr. Wynne played the Beethoven "Sonata Appassionata," first movement, the Liszt "Liebestraum" and concert study, the Poldini "Valse de L'Eventail" and "Octave Intermezzo" by Leschetizky. Miss Manierre sang the Mozart aria from "Idomeneus," the "Come Unto These Yellow Sands" by Frank la Forge, Sigurd Lie's "Soft-Footed Snow" and Charpentier's "Depuis le jour" from "Louise."

Apollo Club to Give "Messiah."

One thousand singers will sing Handel's "Messiah," on December 25 and 27, at the Auditorium Theatre, under the auspices of the Apollo Musical Club, Harrison M. Wild, conductor. This is the first time so large a chorus has been organized in Chicago to sing choral work, and memorable performances are anticipated. Mary Ann Kaufman, of Chicago, has been engaged to sing the soprano solo role.

Parelli Engaged by Bush Conservatory.

Kenneth M. Bradley, president of the Bush Conservatory, announces the engagement of Attelio Parelli as director of the School of Opera. It is the intention of the Bush Conservatory to conduct the school of opera along the most practical lines, and they are indeed fortunate in securing the services of Signor Parelli, for there are few so well equipped as he in this particular line of work. He was formerly associated with La Scala, Milan. His first American engagement was with the Manhattan Grand Opera Company, of New York, and since the organization of the Chicago Grand Opera Company he has been identified with that organization as conductor. Among Signor Parelli's compositions are the operas, "Lovers' Quarrel," "Hermes," "Fanfrilla." Among his songs are, "April Odors Were Sweet," "Innovation to Venus," "'Neath the Southern Moon," "Down the Vale," "Farewell," "One Happy Morning Waits," etc.

Second Popular Concert.

The second of the series of popular concerts given by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Frederick Stock, brought out a large audience to Orchestra Hall last Thursday evening, December 3. Mr. Stock arranged a program well suited to popularize symphonic music. The program consisted of the Goldmark overture "Sakuntala," two movements from symphony No. 4, F minor, by Tschaikowsky; "Scene Religieuse," from suite "Les Erinnyes," by Massenet, with cello obligato by B. Steindel; Grieg's suite "Peer Gynt," overture to "Donna Diana," by Reznicek; grand valse "Grand Pas de Fiances," from suite "Ruses d'Amour," by Glazounow; the Coleridge-Taylor rhapsodic negro dance, "The Bamboula," and the "Hungarian Rhapsody, by Liszt, No. 12. The next popular concert will take place on January 7.

Alice Zeppilli in Monte Carlo.

Word has been received from Monte Carlo, where, on Sunday afternoon, November 15, Alice Zeppilli appeared in a concert given at the Cercle des Etrangers for the benefit of the Red Cross. Among her hearers were the Princess of Monaco, the different consuls and the Diplomatic Corps.

Blackstone Musicale Postponed.

Owing to rearrangements with the Musical League of America, the concert scheduled for Monday morning, December 7, will be postponed and the next musicale will be given on Monday afternoon, December 21, at 3.30. In response to an insistent demand from many lovers of music whose Monday morning standing engagements precludes their attendance at eleven o'clock, the concerts have been changed to 3.30. A witty Chicago manager stated that Monday was wash day and a very poor day to give concerts in the morning. The same manager added that eleven o'clock was too early for many ladies to be up and about, more so to be downtown at such an early hour in the day, and probably the change of time will bring larger attendance than that registered since the inauguration of the Blackstone musicales this season.

The rearranged program for Monday afternoon will be furnished by Nicolai Sokoloff, violinist; Greta Torpadie (in costume), soprano, and Robert Gottschalk. The Blackstone Musicales management has announced that the surplus above expenses goes to the United Charities of Chicago.

Tiffin Musicale.

At the Tiffin musicale, which took place at the Congress Hotel last Monday morning, November 30, Cora Kempre substituted for Jeanne Gerville-Réache. The substitution was unfortunate. Albert Spalding, the other soloist, scored a huge and well deserved success.

Wendell Heighton in Chicago.

Wendell Heighton, the indefatigable manager of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, was again in Chicago during the week and was one of the visitors to the Chicago office. Mr. Heighton gave the information that this year the Minneapolis Orchestra's Chicago concert would take place on Sunday afternoon, February 28, at the Auditorium Theatre. Mr. Heighton was in the best of health and humor, as he had just closed a guarantee contract for the appearance of the Minneapolis Orchestra in St. Louis, also in Des Moines, Ia. The dates for the spring tour of the Minneapolis Orchestra will soon be published in the Musical Courier and will show once more how great the demand for the orchestra from the Northwest is all through the country, thus proving that good material, a genial conductor and an astute business manager are the rudiments necessary to make an orchestral association successful.

Chicago Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The first part of the concert this week, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 4 and 5, brought out the second "Leonore" overture, by Beethoven, the Mozart serenade, in B flat major, for woodwind instruments and horns, and the concerto for cello, by Haydn, its solo part being played by Emmeran Stoeber, second cellist of the orchestra. The soloist at this, his debut, left much to be desired as a cello virtuoso. Since the beginning of the season Mr. Stoeber's work at the first desk has been excellent and much was expected from him. It is therefore with regret that his unsuccessful appearance has to be registered. After the intermission the Tschaikowsky fifth symphony was superbly rendered by the orchestra. It may be added that the other symphonic numbers were beautifully given, and again Mr. Stock was the bright star of the concert.

Chicago Notes.

Clarence Stroupe, of the Bergey Chicago Opera School, presented his pupil, Leona Hay, pianist, assisted by George Simons, tenor (pupil of Mr. Bergey), in a recital at the Bergey studios last Friday evening.

Lucille Stevenson has just been engaged for two concerts in Winnipeg, Canada, January 4 and 5. On the first night she will sing in "The Messiah." Miss Stevenson will also be the soloist with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra at Winona, Minn., on February 16.

A musicale was given on Saturday evening, November 21, at the residence, in Wilmette, Ill., of Mae Middleton Colley, soprano. The hostess, who is a vocalist of no small attainment, furnished part of the program and was assisted by Carol Robinson, pianist, and Dr. Frederick Clark, baritone.

On Sunday evening, December 6, the fourth concert, third season, of the Sinai Orchestra, will be given at Sinai Temple, with Carol Robinson, pianist, as soloist. As usual, Arthur Dunham will both conduct the orchestra and play an organ solo.

The Bush Conservatory announces a recital by Violet Bourne, pupil of Julie Rive-King, assisted by Claire Hart, tenor, pupil of David Baxter, to take place at the Bush Conservatory Recital Hall, Friday evening, December 11.

Next Sunday afternoon, at 3 o'clock, Willard Flint, the oratorio singer, who is engaged for the tenth successive year with the Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston, will give a program of German and other selected concert numbers, assisted by Jessie M. Hamilton, soprano, who will offer a program consisting chiefly of works of modern French composers.

The Glenn Dillard Gunn interpretation class held last Saturday at the Gunn Studios, was one of the most interesting this year. The class has grown so that it has been divided into two sections, the ensemble class, which consists of a string quintet and the solo class. Agnes Leist Beebe was the soloist for the piano class, and gave a number of beautiful selections. One of the most interesting incidents of the afternoon was a try out of children soloists before a manager. Little Joseph Corey, the eleven-year-old pianist, though he learned only an hour before that he was to appear before a manager, played six solos with such artistry and finish that he secured an engagement at once. At the class next Saturday, there will be a group of piano selections played by Earnest Bacon, Jacob Fischer, Mildred Devine, and Ebbe Noer. Raoul S. Bonnano, baritone, late of the Paris Grand Opera, will give a group of songs, and the soprano, Jeanette L. Hoskins, will sing also. Glenn Dillard Gunn gave a lecture recital at Winona, Minnesota, Tuesday evening, December 2.

The School of Opera, Chicago Musical College, will give a performance December 12 in the Ziegfeld Theatre. Edoardo Sacerdote will have charge of the production, and the divertissement will enlist the services of four members of the College School of Ballet. The second acts from "Traviata" and "Carmen" will be given.

Carl Friedberg, pianist, will be heard for the first time in Chicago in a recital next Sunday afternoon, December 13, at the Illinois Theatre, under the direction of F. Wight Neumann.

Marcella Sembrich will make her only appearance in Chicago this season in song recital at Orchestra Hall, Sunday afternoon, January 3, under the direction of F. Wight Neumann. Mme. Sembrich did not come to America this year to make an extended tour, but to live quietly in New York City. She will, however, give one recital in Boston two in New York City, and one in Chicago, for which she has prepared a very attractive program. Frank LaForge again will be the accompanist.

On Thursday evening, December 3, Theodora Sturkow Ryder, pianist, was heard in recital at the Claypool Hotel Indianapolis, Ind., at one of the series of concerts given by Ora B. Talbot. Over eight hundred were present.

Last Saturday afternoon, at Kimball Hall, voice pupils of Karleton Hackett, violin pupils, of Adolf Weidig, and piano students of Silvio Scionti were heard in recital.

Celéne Loveland, pianist, is booked to appear next week in Dekalb, Ill.; Janesville, Wis., and Davenport, Ia.

Adolf Weidig gave the first of a series of three lectures on "The Development of Chamber Music," last Saturday, at Kimball Hall. The lecture, which was of extreme interest, was followed by a delightful program of musical illustrations embracing the earliest efforts in chamber music.

Herbert Butler's Ensemble Class will give a recital at Kimball Hall, Saturday afternoon, December 12.

Augusta Cottlow's Interrupted Tour.

Augusta Cottlow, the American pianist, whose European tour of last season won such pronounced favor for her, was heavily booked for this season, in the principal cities of Germany, Austria, Russia, Holland and Belgium, but on account of the war, a continuous tour was rendered impossible. Miss Cottlow was to play in England in the spring, and had many return dates in the cities where she had appeared last season, including several important orchestral engagements. Among the cities booked were Berlin, Leipsic, Hamburg, Düsseldorf, Nüremberg, Frankfurt, Munich, Vienna, Prague, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Warsaw, Riga, Brussels, Amsterdam and the Hague.

Another Endorsement of Rummel's Art.

Fritz Kreisler and Mrs. Kreisler were among the guests present at a musicale given by a prominent member of New York Society. Mr. Morse-Rummel, the young violinist, played the Bruch G minor concerto and several of Fritz Kreisler's adaptations of the old masters. Mr. Kreisler expressed his high approval of Mr. Rummel's art and thanked him several times for the pleasure he had given him.

Mr. Rummel leaves for an extended Southern tour in December.

Preyer Artist-Pupil in Baltimore.

Elizabeth Katzenstein, soprano, sang in a joint recital with George Castell, the Russian tenor, in Baltimore, on December 6. Mrs. Katzenstein made her New York debut at a musicale in the studio of her teacher, Caroll Badham Preyer, two weeks ago, and will sing again in New York on December 12 in a program of Russian songs.

Marie Morissey at Waterbury.

Marie Morissey, the contralto, who was so enthusiastically received at her recent recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, will sing on December 13, at Waterbury, Conn. Elsie Cowen will be her accompanist in an interesting program. Mrs. Morissey is a pupil of Dudley Buck, the New York vocal teacher.

Jerome Uhl's Recital.

Jerome Uhl, bass baritone, will give a recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, Tuesday afternoon, January 5.

Mr. Uhl studied abroad for many years and afterward sang in concert and opera in France, Germany and Italy.

There is an improvement in the soft pedal of the Kranich & Bach grands found in no other. In ordinary grands it is impossible to secure a uniform reduction of tone volume throughout the scale when pressing the soft pedal, because the shifting key-board effects no change in the extreme bass whatsoever, reduces the volume one-half in another, and one-third in the treble. The famous "ISO-TONIC" (soft) Pedal in Kranich & Bach grands affects every note in the scale IN EXACTLY THE SAME PROPORTION. Examine this wonderful departure and try the effects possible.

BOSTON CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

A Week of Considerable Musical Activity Is Recorded—Big Chorus of Colored People Sings Southern Melodies—Notes.

11 Boylston Road, Fenway,
Boston, Mass., December 4, 1914.

This week's local musical offerings were fittingly ushered in by John McCormack's concert on Sunday afternoon, November 29, at Symphony Hall. The audience on this occasion broke all previous McCormack records here and there was hardly one square foot of available space vacant in the hall. The seat sale was closed on the Saturday before the concert and standing room only was for sale on Sunday. As there were as many persons turned away as would have filled the hall a second time, Manager Charles L. Wagner has promised to bring the McCormack concert company back here for a two nights' engagement late in January. The program last Sunday represented Mascagni, Wolf, Reger, Schumann, Cadman, Schneider, Taylor and Bizet. The Irish songs had their hearing as usual and a goodly number of effective encores were granted. Donald McBeath, the young Australian violinist, played "Meditation," by Cottenet; "Schon Rosmarin," by Kreisler; an ariette by D'Ambrosio, an air on the G string by Bach, and a Mozart gavotte. Edwin Schneider very capably officiated at the piano.

Carl Friedberg's Piano Recital.

Monday afternoon brought to Boston Carl Friedberg, the pianist, for his first recital appearance in the city. Jordan Hall held a good sized audience that extended hearty greetings to this artist, about whom they had heard so much. One may as well state that apparently there was not a disappointed person in the audience at the conclusion of the recital. Carl Friedberg won a signal success and his reappearance in Boston will be welcomed. The program contained the E major "Sarabande," by Rameau; E major sonata, by Beethoven; Schumann's symphonic etudes, E flat intermezzo and E flat major rhapsody by Brahms, a Schubert impromptu, and a Chopin group.

Gabrilowitsch Assists Quartet.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, assisted the Kneisel Quartet at Steinert Hall on Tuesday evening, December 1. The program was as follows: Quartet, A major, for violin, viola, violoncello and piano, op. 7, Daniel Gregory Mason (first time); quartet, D minor, op. 34, Dvorák; quartet for violin, viola, violoncello and piano, op. 25, Brahms.

Colored Singers Heard.

There was an unusual entertainment at Symphony Hall last Sunday evening in the form of a Folksong Festival, in which two hundred colored singers took part. Mme. E. Azalia Hackley, director and manager of the Hackley Normal Vocal Institute in Chicago, was in charge of the affair and she deserves much credit for the splendid results she attained with the large chorus. The selections comprised many of the typical Southern melodies, and the effect was most pleasing. The ensemble was splendid and one was agreeably surprised at the richness of vocal quality in evidence throughout the performance. Nathaniel Dett, a pianist, and also a composer of some note, was heard in his own compositions. The young man is an accomplished player and possesses much talent for composition. His numbers were interesting and displayed much sympathy for the South land. Clarence White, violinist, played the "Gypsy Song," and an African dance, by Coleridge-Taylor, and a short berceuse of his own composition. Mme. Hackley is known throughout the United States for her interest in and devotion to the cause of musical education for the colored race. She believes that "the proper study of voice culture will help children spiritually, morally and physically, through control of the will power, the emotions and the muscles; that this study will also cause a general knowledge of other thoughtful refining studies. She believes that because the negro is vocally gifted that much of the time spent upon technical training could be spent in directing him toward the appreciation of the beautiful in nature, art, poetry, literature and the study of psychology and kindred subjects which would cultivate his observation, thought, taste, will power, etc." Mme. Hackley travels about the country and devotes her time and efforts to the free training of these large choral associations which she also forms herself.

Dalcroze Method in Boston.

The Jacques Dalcroze method for training in sense of rhythm for gymnastics, for the dance and for the general discipline of bodily and mental motion, has made its way into Boston recently. Miss Longy, daughter of the first oboe player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now teaching them here as a result of her studies with Jean Udine, who was a pupil of Dalcroze. On Saturday morning of this week, Mr. de Montoliu, a graduate of the Dalcroze school, which is located near Dresden, will give "demonstrations" of the method at Jordan hall.

Zoellner Quartet Concert.

The Zoellner Quartet was heard here on Thursday night, December 3, at Steinert Hall in a program containing two numbers that had never been played here before, the "Romantische Serenade," by Jan Brandts-Buys, and a quartet in D by Gustave Samazeuilh, the Parisian composer. A third number was the Beethoven quartet, op. 18, No. 2. The Zoellner Quartet is indeed a novel group of artists, as it is composed of father, daughter and two sons. It was a very exacting program that they chose for this Boston appearance, and much credit is due them for the success attained. The demand for the Zoellners is large. Since the starting of their present tour on September 30, over sixty-five engagements have been filled, and the present week has seen the fulfillment of five engagements and a final one is to come this Saturday night, when they play at Wellesley College as one of the concert series attractions which the school is conducting this season.

A Flute Recital.

Julie Petersen, flutist, gave a concert at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, December 3. Miss Petersen is a native of Copenhagen and has appeared with success in the principal European cities. Her Boston recital was a novel attraction, for not in many years has there been heard locally a concert of this type. She proved her virtuosity in amazing manner and many new feats in flute technic came to the ears of most of us who are not any too well acquainted with the innate possibilities of the instrument. Surprising, aside from the technical feature, was the real artistry the soloist displayed in her many interesting interpretations.

Boston Notes.

Julia Culp has postponed her recital announced for this Saturday afternoon in Jordan Hall, owing to a cold. The date is now fixed for Saturday, January 16.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch will be heard in recital, assisted by his wife, Clara Clemens Gabrilowitsch, contralto, on Saturday afternoon, December 12, in Jordan Hall.

Mme. Gerville-Réache is the attraction for the fourth Boston Music School Settlement concert, which will be given this Sunday afternoon at the Boston Theatre. Mme. Réache is well remembered here by her impersonation of La Navarraise in Massenet's opera at the Boston Theatre, and her superb Delilah at the Boston Opera House. The Hoffmann Quartet will assist.

Fritz Kreisler will be here for a recital in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, December 13. Victor Winton.

Boston Hails Tina Lerner as Heir to de Pachmann.

H. T. Parker, distinguished critic of the Boston Evening Transcript, paid an enthusiastic tribute to Tina Lerner's art on her Boston reappearance, November 22, as follows:

In more senses than one Tina Lerner seems the heir to De Pachmann. Scarcely another pianist, since Mr. de Pachmann left the stage, can summon a tone so slender and sweet, so gravely young and warm, so light and bright, so limpid, smooth and even, so sensitive to every modulation of the engraved page of the enkindled imagination, so transparent, yet so subtly shaded, so persuasively the voice of old elegance, of old bravura, and of the intimate lyric voice and the stirred lyric feeling that outlasts hulking and grubling Time. No wonder that the piano gives up the finer secrets of its tone to such caressing. (Advertisement.)

Von Ende School Announcements.

The Von Ende School of Music has issued cards of invitation embracing the following musical events of the next ten days: Friday evening, December 11, advanced students' recital; Friday evening, December 18; advanced students' recital; Saturday afternoon, December 19, children's matinee, 3 o'clock, 44 West Eighty-fifth street, New York City.

Evan Williams Sings in Sacramento.

Evan Williams appeared as soloist at the 368th recital of the Saturday Club, of Sacramento, Cal., on November 12, in the Clunie Theatre. He sang a varied program, including works by Handel, Schubert, Haydn, Cadman, Cowen, etc., and scored a tremendous success. He was accompanied by his son, Vernon Williams.

Dull Boston Symphony Concerts.

It is not the customary thing to speak of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts as being dull, but those of Thursday evening, December 3, and Saturday afternoon, December 5, at Carnegie Hall, were in every sense of the words monotonous and boresome.

The ordeal began on Thursday with Sibelius' fourth symphony, a work which because of its drab colors, lack of variety in orchestration, and dearth of melodic ideas, worked on the listener like a soporific. It dragged its wearisome and empty length with such fatal effect on the writer of these lines that he finally found it hard to keep awake, while the orchestra droned, and toiled, and heaved, and mumbled, and prolixed. A more thoroughly uninteresting work has not been heard here for many a season, and the conductor seemed to feel the lack of appreciation on the part of the audience, for long before the finish of the symphony his energy and responsiveness diminished perceptibly. Sibelius has done some notable writing for orchestra, but it is not to be found in his fourth symphony.

Von Recznicek's "Schlehmil," a "symphonic biography," depicting "the life of a modern man pursued by misfortune, who goes to destruction in the conflict between his ideal and his material existence," came after the Sibelius symphony, and far from clearing away the dissatisfaction left by that piece served only to intensify it. This "Schlehmil" is a composition written in that Straussian manner which has been recognized as being among his most crassly modern symphonic productions, and it bears such striking relationship to the "Sinfonia Domestica" at times that one is led to think of Von Recznicek as a musical satirist, anxious to show his renowned contemporary how easy it is to imitate him and even to go him one better in the way of harmonic incongruity, rhythmic license, and unbridled noise. There are moments of lyric beauty in "Schlehmil" consisting chiefly of diatonic oases in the desert of discord and at all times the work is orchestrated with virtuoso disregard of the conventions as we knew them before Strauss. Many clever touches spring up in the Von Recznicek score, but as a whole it lacks in directness of purpose, in logical sequence, and in purely musical stimulativeness. It is "interesting" music, but it does not warm the cockles of the heart, and coming after the Sibelius disaster, it sounded doubly uninspired and futile.

Theodore Spiering led Von Recznicek's "Der Sieger" at a Berlin concert a year ago and he speaks very highly of it. The work should be heard here, if for no other reason than to give the composer a chance to score the hit which he did not register with "Schlehmil." It is not necessary to go at length into the "program" of that opus. Charpentier used the same idea—too big a one for any art form except literature—in his oratorio-opera, "Julien." Scheinpflug's "Overture to a Comedy by Shakespeare" concluded lamely a program which for injudicious selection and unskillful arrangement hardly could have been outdone.

On Saturday afternoon, Strauss' "Aus Italien" did not start off matters much better, for it is an exceedingly long winded affair and while provided with fascinating episodes here and there is spun out so thinly as regards tunefulness and sincere musical expression that the fancy of the auditor is not held captive unintermittently and his emotions are stirred only for an instant or two. Strauss seemed to be groping in "Aus Italien" for that orchestral technic which he found fully in his later symphonic poems.

The Ropartz symphony, his fourth, was heard here recently at a Philharmonic concert, and it must be said that the Boston players last Saturday brought out no features of the music left unrevealed by our own organization. As the MUSICAL COURIER wrote then, Ropartz is an accomplished and facile writer who stands midway between the classical and the modern schools. The second hearing of his C major symphony confirms the impression that he is furthermore a sincere and high minded composer, not blessed with a large store of melody, but gifted with the faculty of scoring smoothly and lending all his measures distinction and interest. His symphony is in one movement, which makes it appear unduly long in view of its lack of characterization and grip.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was the one unassailable feature of the two programs. It sounded new when compared to the admitted novelties.

Boston Symphony Brooklyn Concert.

Brooklyn was treated to an unusually attractive program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, December 4. The first number was the symphonic fantasy, "From Italy," op. 16, by Richard Strauss, written at a time when this composer retained all of his youthful enthusiasm and still had a feeling for melody. It was wonderfully well played by Dr. Karl Muck and his men. The other orchestra number was the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, which Dr. Muck took at a surprisingly slow tempo.

The soloist of the evening was Harold Bauer, who played the Beethoven concerto in G major.

Philharmonic Sunday Offering.

An uncommonly attractive program was that presented at Carnegie Hall last Sunday afternoon, December 6, by the Philharmonic Society, with Carl Friedberg as the assisting soloist. The scheme comprised MacDowell's "Indian Suite," Schumann's piano concerto, Strauss' "Don Juan," Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," and Rubinstein's "Feramors" ballet music. It was the sort of program desired by Sunday concert goers and in consequence a very large audience crowded the spacious hall and showed exceptional responsiveness in the way of applause and favorable comment. "Occasionally this kind of a concert should be given by all the orchestras," remarked one listener near the MUSICAL COURIER man; "it makes ten new subscription converts to the cause of good music, whereas programs like those heard here from the Boston Symphony last week cause ten subscription recruits to orchestral courses to become renegades." The Sunday concerts of the Philharmonic now are to New York what the famous Tuesday popular concerts of the Berlin Philharmonic are to the German capital. It is a capital idea to separate the severely classical series of our local orchestra from the amiable course meant to be chiefly entertaining.

MacDowell's "Indian Suite" had an eloquent reading, full of poetry and color. Strauss' "Don Juan," that full blooded, joyously riotous score, reflected all the requisite tonal opulence and orchestral passion. In the "Italian Caprice" and the "Feramors," brilliancy and dash were the chief characteristics displayed by the virtuoso band, and needless to state, the reception accorded those pieces approached the frenetic. It was an afternoon of exhilarating orchestral enjoyment.

Carl Friedberg gave lovely voice to the Schumann concerto, projecting into it all the lyricism which the imaginative pages contain, sounding its melodies with a finely rounded mellow tone, and tracing its filigree passage work with delicate fingers accurately and fleetly driven. It was the interpretation and the technical performance of a thorough artist nature, and as such it made a deep impression on the hearers, who took Friedberg to their hearts in unmistakable fashion. It is to be hoped that he will give us much Schumann at his next New York recital, for this new pianist is a Schumann reader par excellence.

School of Music 388th Concert.

The 388th concert of the New York School of Music and Arts (Ralfe Leech Sterner, director), at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, New York, December 2, again showed the good work done at this institution in vocal, piano and violin teaching. Beginning promptly, a concert of twenty-one numbers, mostly vocal music, pupils of Mr. Sterner, was past within an hour and a half, serving to bring forward young people in solos, duets, etc., some of whom have been praised in the columns of the MUSICAL COURIER, following appearances at the Wanamaker Auditorium and other leading public halls. The ease of singing, breath control, distinct enunciation, the appropriate facial expression of the singers, their natural beauty of voice, the correct stage carriage, all this shows that Mr. Sterner and his capable aides go into the business of teaching in its manifold details, earnestly and with fine success.

The pianists, too, were players of unusual ability, combining advanced technic with clean-cut phrasing and understanding of the intellectual. Two violinists showed good tone and precocious talents, and a very attentive audience heard the various numbers with marked expressions of pleasure. The names of the participants follow: Marguerite Claghorn, Mildred van Zandt, Ramee Rivas, Belle McKinlay, Eleanor Fields, Harriette Gesas, Nellie Collins, Jenness Jones, Blanche Kelley, Florence Brusche, Elsie Schoenfeld, Marguerite Zacharias, Mildred Waite, Emma Hamilton, Rae H. Coelho, Frederic Maroc, Louis Ferraro and Andrew Martin.

Helen Wolverton played piano accompaniments with sympathy.

Christine Levin In West Virginia.

Christine Levin, contralto, gave a recital before a large audience at the Grand Opera House, Fairmont, W. Va., November 18. Her program showed much variety, including works by Schubert, Brahms, Bruncau, Massenet, Koemmenich, Carpenter, etc. Such artists and organizations as Francis Macmillen, Mischa Elman, the Zollner Quartet, Maud Powell, Grace Hall Riheldaffer and others of equal note have appeared there also. Miss Levin was presented by Aubrey Martin, musical director of the State Normal School, who left immediately after the concert to take up a similar position with the Normal College of Miami University, Oxford, Ohio.

The Fairmont Times says: "Miss Levin's program was divided into four parts, the first two parts consisting of French and German songs and arias, the third part being a group of old folksongs, including one number by a modern composer, and the fourth part being made up entirely of modern compositions.

"Miss Levin is the possessor of a voice of good quality, which she has under fine control. Her interpretations showed a perfect understanding of the various moods represented on her program. She was particularly effective in the folksongs and modern American songs.

". . . The accompaniments, played by Jessie Renshawe, deserve especial mention."

Sundelius Activities.

Among the more recent appearances booked for Marie Sundelius, the soprano, by Gertrude F. Cowen, are: Soloist with the Mendelssohn Club, Albany, N. Y., December 9, and an appearance with the Boston Cecilia Society, January 21. This, in addition to the comprehensive list of engagements already filled, and her creating of the soprano role in Bossi's "Joan of Arc," to be sung for the first time in America, at Carnegie Hall, by the Oratorio Society of New York, Louis Koemmenich, conductor, will keep this soprano busily engaged until the first week in July, following her long tour with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra from April until June, and her appearance as leading soprano at the Swedish Singing Festival in San Francisco, June 15 to 25.

Her bookings from September 1, 1914, to June 28, 1915, follow: September 1, Syracuse; October 18, Chicago, Apollo Musical Club; October 25, Chicago, joint recital; November 3, Cleveland, matinee appearance with the Fortnightly Club; November 5, Minneapolis; November 10, Kansas City, Fritschy Course; November 13 and 14, soloist, St. Louis Symphony Orchestra; November 23, soloist, Boston Symphony Orchestra; December 3, Dobbs Ferry, N. Y.; December 7, New Haven; December 9, Albany; December 11, Princeton; December 13, Tufts College, Massachusetts; December 17, Cambridge; January 11, private recital in Boston; January 13, Bridgeport, Conn., recital; January 20, Cambridge; January 26, Lowell Choral Society; March 9, soloist, Boston Symphony Orchestra; March 15, Brockton, Woman's Club; March 24, soloist, New York Oratorio Society (Louis Koemmenich, conductor), creating the soprano role in Bossi's "Joan of Arc," to be sung the first time in America in Carnegie Hall; April 11 to June 15, spring festival tour with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra; June 15 to 25, leading soprano at the Swedish Singing Festival to be held at San Francisco during the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

Mme. Sundelius' appearance at Lockport, N. Y., in joint recital with Pasquale Amato, will open the 1915-1916 concert series under Mr. van de Mark.

AN OPEN LETTER TO SINGERS.

By Magaretha Kirpal.

Margaretha Kirpal, the vocal teacher, of 124 West Thirty-fourth street, New York, and 140 Barclay street, Flushing, L. I., disagrees with a recent review of two books on the vocal art, which appeared in a daily newspaper. She writes:

As one who has had many years of experience as a teacher of singing, I feel it incumbent on me to say that these two books under review could only mislead a student. Why the everlasting cry about the downfall of "bel canto?" Bel canto, which means nothing more than good singing, still exists and always will exist among singers, trained in the right way. Anyone who has heard Mmes. Sembrich, Destinn, Hempel, Lehmann, Schumann-Heink, Sig. Caruso, Amato, Scotti and others, will testify to that. Poor singing teachers are usually the cause if pupils, endowed with fairly good material, do not learn to sing well. To one who knows how to point out every muscle activity employed to obtain the final result (the bel canto), the idea of a psychological method is, to say the least, ridiculous. There is something much more tangible. The author says, "Pay no attention to the action of the diaphragm in breathing, avoid all attempts to control the breathing." Contrary to this I say, pay all possible attention to the working of the diaphragm. Above all, learn to control your breathing. After that, have your voice placed, which means nothing more than to direct the breath so that the best possible use is made of all the resonance cavities. Then, and only then, when these things, together with other countless details, have become flesh and blood with the pupil, can he become conscious of the sensations of a good singer. Vocal poise cannot be spoken of until a pupil, through years of right training, has become an artist. Mr. ——— thinks that singing can be taught chiefly by example, and lays stress on the value of listening to good singing. In my opinion, a beginner gains absolutely no knowledge of voice production by listening to other singers. It is most important, however, that he should learn to listen to himself. He must also learn to feel whether the tone is right. A good teacher can impart all this. Naturalness of expression, beautiful sustained tones, and agility, coupled with greatest endurance, are the lasting results, if proper breath control is taught, and the muscles used in singing are trained to their utmost elasticity.

MARGARETHA KIRPAL,
Voice specialist.

A circular recently issued by Mrs. Kirpal says:

What deep breathing does for you: It makes new red blood; it makes muscle tissue; it builds up your body.

Facts speak louder than words. See what the deep breathing system has done for me. Give me ten minutes of your time daily and it will do the same for you. Three years ago I was sick and weak. Today I am strong and healthy.

Deep breathing is not only the underlying principle in the art of song, not only a great factor in correcting and improving your figure, it is, above all, the secret of giving you good health, which goes hand in hand with keeping young.

Let me help you, as I have helped myself.

Zoellner Quartet with Montreal Club.

In Montreal, Canada, November 26, the Zoellner Quartet gave a program before the Ladies' Morning Musical Club which called forth this comment from the secretary-treasurer of the club:

"So insistent was the applause after both the Ivanow and Brandt-Buys numbers—new to many of its hearers—that the club rule of 'no encores' had to be waived, and the quartet charmed its audience with Glinka's minuet and andante cantabile by Tschaikowsky."

The Zoellner Quartet was heard on this occasion in the Beethoven quartet, op. 18, No. 2; the Ivanow quartet, op. 13, and the Jan Brandt-Buys "Romanische' Serenade,"

The management of the Strand Theatre is unusually candid. It presents "Fradkin, the noted young Russian violinist. Third and last week by request."—New York Tribune.

Benefit Concert at Aeolian Hall.

A good sized and appreciative audience attended the concert for the benefit of the National Red Cross and Night Camp Auxiliaries of the New York Throat, Nose and Lung Hospital, on Tuesday afternoon, December 1, at Aeolian Hall, New York.

The artists who participated were Wilfrid Douthitt, baritone; Blanche Manley, soprano, and the Stanley Quartet, consisting of Louise MacMahan, soprano; Flora Hardie, contralto; Joseph Mathieu, tenor, and James Stanley, basso.

Eleanor Stanley presided at the piano. The proceeds were large and will materially aid this worthy cause. The concert was under the able management of Andreas Dippel, op. 25.

Pilzer-Hurwitt Recital in Brooklyn.

A joint recital by Maximilian Pilzer, violinist, and Henrietta Hurwitt, soprano, pupil of Anne Stevenson, was given Sunday evening, November 29, at the Brownsville Institute, Brooklyn.

Miss Hurwitt sang with glorious warmth of tone two groups of songs and an aria, "L'insana parola," from "Aida." For so young a singer Miss Hurwitt displays fine variety of expression and control.

Mr. Pilzer's playing was characterized by his usual musicianship and warmth of tone. Worthy of special mention were his own two compositions, berceuse and "Orientale," which received enthusiastic applause. Miss Pilzer and Frederic Dixon were at the piano.

"The Secret" Heard in Many Lands.

John Prindle Scott's song, "The Secret," has achieved an international fame. Orville Harrold sang it at Hammerstein's London Opera House; William Fullerton, a Scotch tenor, used it on tour in the English and Scotch Provinces; Martin Richardson sang it in the principal cities of Italy, and a program reached the composer recently showing that a soprano sang it in Honolulu, H. I. Among other prominent singers who are using this song are Lambert Murphy, George Harris, Jr., Joseph Matthieu, John Young, Harvey Hindermeyer.

After the blatant vulgarities and banal ineptitudes of musical comedy, it is indeed with a sigh as of relief that one takes a seat for Gilbert and Sullivan once more. Gilbert and Sullivan! Lamb and mint sauce were never more happily mated. Each dovetails into the other with such nice exactitude.—Australian Musical News.

A Mary Fisher Home Benefit Musicale.

"To provide a home for those who have labored in literature, art, music, education or any of the various professions and find themselves in old age either without funds or congenial surroundings" is the worthy object of the Mary Fisher Home Association. Mount Vernon, N. Y., is the location of the Mary Fisher Home—the Seabury Memorial—which has been carrying on its work, under the unostentatious administration of a board of fifteen trustees, for the past twenty-six years.

Mrs. G. Thurston Seabury, a well known patron of music and art, presented the new building to the association. This building is now nearly completed and is well adapted to the needs of twenty-six beneficiaries.

The officers of the Mary Fisher Home Association are: C. Arthur Speakman, president; H. C. Brinckerhoff, Mrs. R. T. Fowler, A. Hill Seabury, vice-presidents; Dr. W. Stuart Woodruff, secretary; F. Irving Hull, treasurer. Board of Trustees, class of 1914—J. H. Burton, Mrs. W. S. Duryea, Dr. W. S. Woodruff, A. H. Seabury, Mrs. A. C. Stoney; class of 1915—H. C. Brinckerhoff, H. B. Coho, M. D. Stiles, F. I. Hull, Mrs. R. T. Fowler; class of 1916—Rev. J. H. Hollister, Mrs. J. H. Burton, A. T. Sweet, C. A. Speakman. Superintendent, Mary Pease. Officers of the Woman's Auxiliary—Honorary president, Mrs. G. Thurston Seabury; president, Mrs. R. T. Fowler; first vice-president, Mrs. J. H. Burton; second vice-president, Mrs. A. Wilson; third vice-president, Mrs. H. C. Jones; recording secretary, Mrs. W. S. Woodruff; corresponding secretary, Mrs. A. C. Stoney; treasurer, Mrs. C. Remington.

A musicale was given for the benefit of the Mary Fisher Home at the home of Mrs. John Sands Howell, 49 West Eighty-ninth street, New York, Wednesday afternoon, December 2, which was very well attended.

This was the program:

"Nocturne Pyreneen" (Chaminade), George Devoll and Edwin Isham; piano soli, andante (Beethoven) and "Kamenoi-Ostrow" (Rubinstein), Marie Louise Todd; soprano soli, all dedicated to Mme. Buckhout, "Eternity" (Oley Speaks), "His Valentine" (Hallett Gilberte), and "You and I" (Ward Stephens), Mme. Buckhout; baritone soli, "Le Miroir" (Gustave Ferrari) and "The Birthday" (Cowen), Edwin Isham; piano soli, "Arabesque" (Schumann), "Nachtstücke" (Schumann) and "Valse Brillante" (Raff), Marie Louise Todd; tenor soli, "Memory" (A. Goring Thomas) and "How Delicious Is the Winning" (A. L.), George Devoll; soprano soli, all dedicated to Mme. Buckhout, "Die Glocke" (German, M. Blazejewicz), "Nieczczesliva" (Polish, M. Blazejewicz) and "Der Blommar Aster" (Norwegian, L. J. Munson), Mme. Buckhout; "A Sea Song" (Andre Messagere), George Devoll and Edwin Isham.

Especial mention should be made of the finished musicianship displayed in the numbers of Mary Louise Todd, the pianist-teacher, and of Lima O'Brien's sympathetic and skillful accompaniments.

An Active Pittsburgh Teacher.

William R. Gardner, the Pittsburgh vocal teacher, gives instruction at East Liverpool, Ohio, on Wednesdays and Saturdays, and at his home in Dormont, Pa., on Thursdays. The remainder of the week he is busily engaged at his studio in Pittsburgh. Mr. Gardner has accepted the position of choir director at the Homewood (Pa.) Presbyterian Church, and will enter upon his duties there January 1.

Franklin Cannon's Boston Tribute.

Appearing for the first time in Boston, Franklin Cannon, the young American pianist, met with instant favor from critics and public alike, when he gave his Jordan Hall recital there on Monday afternoon, November 23. Mr. Cannon is a disciple of the newer school, and the marked interest and enthusiasm he is creating in musical circles by his unique individuality as an artist and player is ample proof that here is real merit. The following group of press excerpts pertain to Mr. Cannon's recent Boston recital:

". . . Mr. Cannon has many excellent qualities. He has strength that is easily exerted without turning sound into noise, a sympathetic singing tone; his technic was amply sufficient; and his phrasing was clear and intelligently thought out."—Herald.

"First impressions were most favorable. He shows an appreciation of the piano and of his composers that is altogether too rare."—Traveller.

"Mr. Cannon is a sincere, serious, well poised young pianist, with a strongly emphasized poetic bent.

"There are strength and control in his fingers, his staccato being even and uniform and his legato smooth and well sustained. His thoughtful regard of [illegible] whole, his balance of phrasing, and his excellent pedaling marked each number on the program."—Monitor.

"Mr. Cannon's playing displayed commendable taste, clean technic and revealed his individuality. Feeling is well guarded by intelligence against exaggeration. . . .

"This basic principle of repose is an estimable thing in Mr. Cannon as a pianist. He does not abuse his strength, but keeps his hearer's ear alert with more subtlety of shading."—Globe.

"Mr. Cannon has acquired the technical skill that the public of the pianists takes for granted nowadays. He plays with intelligence, as one who has seriously considered his music and his instrument and who would hold himself well in hand in his relation to both. His ear is sensitive to the quality of his tone and the significant shadings of it. His presence was ingratiating, and recalled for an instant the romantic youth of the 60's."—Transcript.

Music League Concert.

At the first subscription concert of the Music League of America, which took place in Aeolian Hall, New York, Tuesday evening, December 1, the following program was given, the most interesting numbers being those of Pietro Yon, organist; Nikolai Sokoloff, violinist, and Robert Gottschalk, tenor:

Giordano as Don Jose.

The New York Grand Opera Company . . . was heard again in "Carmen." While the company is comparatively small, it has a corps of capable singers and actors. . . .

Chevalier Salvatore Giordano, as Don Jose, is of striking mold and manly. His tenor voice is of excellent quality, with an appeal in it that awakens one to enthusiasm, and numbers of his solos were rewarded with a storm of handclapping. He sang the role of the soldier lover, Don Jose.—Indianapolis (Ind.) News. (Advertisement.)

Beatrice Gjertsen's Song Recital.

A song recital was given at Aeolian Hall, New York, on Thursday evening, December 3, by Beatrice Gjertsen, an American dramatic soprano who has made a striking success during her five years with the Grand Ducal Court Opera at Weimar, and who, as a reward for her services in that opera house, has been given the honorary title of Kammersaengerin. Miss Gjertsen was assisted by Harrison Wall Johnson, who, like her, comes to New York from the West. Miss Gjertsen's part of the program consisted of "Dich Theure Halle," from "Tannhäuser," a set of five songs by Schumann, Wolf, Brahms and Wagner, numbers by Grieg, Burleigh, Beach, Campbell-Tipton and Kjerulf, and Minneleide's farewell from Hans Pfitzner's "Die Rose vom Liebesgarten," a role which Miss Gjertsen created in Weimar.

Mr. Johnson played a number of compositions selected from the works of Chopin and the modern composers and proved himself to be a pianist of skill and a fine interpreter. He scored a great success with the public.

Miss Gjertsen showed herself to be the possessor of a magnificent stage presence and immense emotional and dramatic power. Her voice is of fine quality and she controls it so as to make effective every range of dynamics from the most powerful fortissimo to the lightest pianissimo. Her interpretations of "Dich Theure Halle" and of Wagner's "Träume" were excellent in their fine dramatic intensity. She rendered the two Schumann songs with delicacy and charm and gave a delightful interpretation of "Verborgenheit," by Hugo Wolf. Her rendition of the Swedish folksong was replete with the instinct of the North, and Grieg's "Ich liebe dich," sung in the original, in which form it only has one verse, the second having been added in the translation, was strong and trenchant. She further charmed her audience with three American compositions, Burleigh's "Jean," Mrs. Beach's "Love but a Day," and the "Spirit Flower," by Campbell-Tipton.

Hans Pfitzner is a composer much talked of and the selection from "Die Rose von Liebesgarten" was looked forward to with interest. Miss Gjertsen sang this in costume, and although the music cannot be said to have fulfilled all expectations, no doubt losing by its divorce from the stage, her interpretation of it was powerfully dramatic and intensely emotional and was welcomed by the audience with such enthusiasm that an encore was necessary, when the singer gave a portion of Brünnhilde's call from "Die Walküre."

Miss Gjertsen will be heard in Chicago in recital, January 10.

Carri Pupils in Recital.

Artist pupils of the New York Institute for Violin Playing, Ferdinand Carri, director, gave the following program on Thursday evening, December 3, at the Sixty-first Street Methodist Episcopal Church, New York:

Soder-Hueck's Artist Pupils.

Ada Soder-Hueck's pupils all testify to her inspiring personality, and her reputation as a competent trainer of the voice increases with every new pupil who is turned out of her studio. Although herself a great contralto and formerly prima donna at the Vienna Opera, Mme. Soder-Hueck does not limit herself to teaching the contralto voice, but has pupils in every range from the high coloratura to the low bass. Mme. Soder-Hueck is producing some fine voices as the result of her thorough knowledge of voice placing and subsequent training.

Among her pupils, Elsie Lovell, an alto of exceptional sweetness and power, has been on tour filling engagements as far south as Savannah, meeting with success on all sides. Mary Ellerbrook, contralto, possesses a voice of great warmth and dramatic power. She is touring through the United States and Canada and will be on the road during the entire season. The Watertown Daily Times says that Miss Ellerbrook has a superb contralto voice, perhaps the best ever heard in that city, and adds that it is natural and round and though remarkably low pitched, is as clear as a bell with wonderful carrying power.

CINCINNATI HAS A BUSY MUSICAL WEEK.

Daily Concerts Given—Symphony Program Changed—Other Notes of Current Interest.

Cincinnati, Ohio, December 2, 1914.

With a concert every day this week, all of them presenting interesting material, Cincinnatians have had time for little else beside listening to the various exponents of the divine art. Beginning with the sonata evening at the College of Music on Monday night, there followed the Culp String Quartet at the Woman's Club on Tuesday night, Florence Hardeman's debut (since her European studies) Wednesday night at Memorial Hall, the Orpheus Club concert Thursday night, the symphony concert Friday afternoon, Pavlowa and the Russian ballet at Music Hall Saturday afternoon, and the symphony concert on Saturday night. Pavlowa and her company also appear on Sunday, rounding out an exceptionally full week.

DR. KUNWALD MAKES PROGRAM CHANGE.

Dr. Kunwald has made a slight change in the program of the symphony concerts of this week in the substitution of the "Coriolan" overture of Beethoven for that of the "Leonore," No. II, as first announced. The change will be a welcome one, as the "Leonore" overture has been played in Cincinnati a great many times, while the "Coriolan" is less familiar to the general public. There will be no distinct novelty on the program this week, although the Beethoven symphony, No. 1, may almost be looked upon in this light, as it has not been played by the Cincinnati Orchestra. The soloist of the series will be Eleanor Spencer, the young American pianist.

COLLEGE OF MUSIC CONCERT.

Frederick J. Hoffmann, pianist, and Johannes Miersch, violinist, were the artists presented by the College of Music in the subscription concert this week. Their evening of sonatas was enjoyed by a large audience on Monday evening at the Odeon. Mr. Hoffmann is one of the busiest pianists in Cincinnati, and does not appear in concert as often as one could wish to hear him. His playing in the Rubinstein sonata, G major, op. 13, was masterly, his clean cut technic and virile tone quality being much in evidence. Johannes Miersch, whose concert tours abroad have resulted in thick note books of clippings, lauding the "Miersch tone," was at his best, playing with wonderful insight and sympathy in all three sonatas, but with especial beauty in the Beethoven sonata, A minor, op. 23. The Busoni sonata in E minor, op. 29, is a grateful one, abounding in lovely passages, and Mr. Hoffmann and Mr. Miersch played it con amore. The concert was one of the most successful in the College of Music series.

CINCINNATI CONSERVATORY.

The Cincinnati Conservatory of Music has a number of concerts scheduled for December, in which will be presented some promising talent. Helen Portune, soprano, will be heard in a song recital tonight, December 2, and Leo Paalz gives a piano recital, December 3. The second orchestra concert, under P. A. Tirindelli, takes place December 17, in Conservatory Hall, the soloists to be drawn from the master classes. Chester A. Moffett, a pupil of John Hoffmann's, will give a song recital on December 15. Altogether the Conservatory forces are preparing for a buy time between this and Christmas week.

JESSIE PARTLON TYREE.

Verlet on Tour.

Alice Verlet, the Belgian soprano, now in America for her first tour, made her initial appearance at Columbus, Ohio, on December 4, singing among other numbers "Caro Nome," from "Rigoletto."; "Shadow Dance," from "Dinorah," and the valse from "Romeo and Juliet." On December 15, Mlle. Verlet sings in Chicago and later as soloist, with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. and Mrs. Rogers Entertain Mme. Sembrich.

Mr. and Mrs. Francis Rogers gave a small reception for Mme. Sembrich, Friday afternoon, December 4, at their residence, 115 East Fifty-third street, New York. The same evening Mr. Rogers left for Lynchburg, Va., where on the following day he gave a successful song recital with G. H. Wilson, of Washington, as accompanist.

Franklin Riker's Recital.

Franklin Riker, tenor, gave a program of songs in Aeolian Hall, New York, Friday evening, December 4.

In his program making, Mr. Riker departed somewhat from the conventional lines. Following the two introductory Italian arias "O del mio dolce ardor," Gluck, and "Non posso disperar," Mr. Riker sang a group by American composers: "Only of Thee and Me," Bauer; "To the Golden Rod," MacDowell; "Romance," F. Morris Class, and "Summer Time," Ward-Stephens.

Of these the MacDowell song won the most approval from the audience. Sidney Homer's "Banjo Song" was the encore for this group.

"Verre Ardent," de Fontenailles; "Chanson Grise," Amadei; "Le désir," Büsser, revealed the singer's familiarity with the French language and atmosphere.

"Der Atlas," Schubert; "Sonntag," Brahms; "Nachtgang," Strauss; "Zwei," Jürgens, gave additional evidence of his linguistic versatility and his understanding of German temperament. "Sonntag" pleased especially and had to be repeated.

Two songs by the tenor headed the concluding group, "Song of Love" (MS.) and "Prodigals of Power" well deserving the insistent demand for a repetition. Kramer's "Christmas Carol"; "Summer Night," an especially attractive and interesting number from the pen of the New York composer, Henry Holden Huss, and Stahlschmidt's "For Me the Jasmine Buds Untold" (MS.).

The good sized, responsive and representative audience present evidenced that Mr. Riker is no stranger to a large number of New York music lovers, who showed in no uncertain manner, that they liked his delivery of each number of the program.

In fact there is a charm about Mr. Riker's vocal production, which is bound to please. There are no jarring tones; ease, smoothness, purity, nice phrasing, good diction adapted with a fine sense of artistic values to a voice of excellent timbre, easily qualify him for a place among vocalists of high rank.

Concert Direction Annie Friedberg Artists.

Annie Friedberg is very much occupied not alone arranging dates for her leading artists, Carl Friedberg and Arrigo Serato, but also for her singers, for whom she has secured a large number of good engagements.

One of these, who is greatly in demand, is Adele Krueger, who appeared in over twenty concerts and recitals during the month of November. December and January will be equally busy months for her. Among her dates are a joint recital in Reading, Pa., with Leo Schulz, cellist; a concert in Brooklyn; one in Peekskill, and several in Pennsylvania towns. In nearly every place where she appears she immediately gets a return engagement.

Miss Friedberg furnished the quartet for "The Messiah" performance, December 29, at the Jamestown Choral Society under Professor Thorstenberg. These singers were Kate Lawler, Grace Renee Close, John W. Nichols and Alfred Ilma.

Umberto Sorrentino is on his way to America from Italy, where he appeared in opera, and in spite of the war disturbance has been extremely busy singing in Italy. He starts his American concerts in December with the Steinert series, in Portland, Providence and Worcester.

Margaret Shirley, the young lyric soprano, sang before a capacity house at Chickering Hall, New York, on a recent Saturday afternoon, and two days previously in Washington before the Catholic Society.

Music at Indiana, Pa.

Orley See, violinist, assisted by Leila Farlin, soprano, and Edna Allan Cogswell, accompanist, all members of the faculty of Normal Conservatory of Music, at Indiana, Pa., gave a concert recently in Normal Chapel. Mr. See played two concertos, a sonata, and three interesting numbers by living composers. The concertos were the Bruch in G minor and Mendelssohn in E minor, while the sonata was Handel's in E major. Among the three smaller compositions, one still in manuscript by Edna Allan Cogswell, "Sommer Abend," claimed particular interest and Kreisler's "Caprice Viennois" was much enjoyed.

Miss Farlin sang songs by La Forge, Henschel and Rummel, winning generous applause which was entirely merited. Miss Cogswell accompanied in a sympathetic fashion, adding much to the pleasure of the evening.

Inez Barbour's Engagements.

In addition to the many engagements which Inez Barbour, the soprano, has already filled in New York, Brooklyn and other cities, she will sing again in New York on January 14. On January 25, she will be heard in Washington, D. C. A number of other engagements will be announced later.

Herbert Fryer's Program.

Herbert Fryer, the English pianist, assisted by Robert Maitland, baritone, will give the following program at his first New York recital, which takes place in Aeolian Hall tonight, Wednesday, December 9:

Andante and variations in F minor.....Haydn
Sonata in A flat, op. 110.....Beethoven
An die Leyer.....Schubert
Die Krähe.....Schubert
Der Doppelgänger.....Schubert
Der Schiffer.....Schubert
Prometheus.....Schubert
Prelude, chorale and fugue.....César Franck
Sixteen waltzes, op. 39.....Brahms
Bois Epais.....Lully
L'heure exquise.....Reynaldo Hahn
Der Asra.....Rubinstein

Der Tambour.....Wolf
Prelude, op. 43.....Chopin
Nocturne, E major, op. 62.....Chopin
Allegro de concert, op. 46.....Chopin

Dufault's Farewell in Australia.

Adelaide lovers of vocal and musical art said a reluctant but demonstratively appreciative farewell to that great singer, Paul Dufault and his talented colleagues, Ernest Tov, Pauline Bindley and Harold Whittle, at the Town Hall on Monday afternoon. For two hours they had held the large audience captive by their gifts, and when Dufault himself closed the program, which had been nearly doubled by encores, with the dramatic beauties of "Invictus," its triumphant melody flooding the building, the people stood and clapped until their hands were tired, and then broke into cheering. The scene was memorable, and must have impressed this celebrity from the Canadian snows. Dufault contributed no fewer than sixteen songs. . . . There were only nine items originally on the list. The others were encores and encores of encores. Dufault's first appearance was in the bracket "Caro Mio Ben" and aria from "Pagliacci," the latter of which was given with a fervor that summoned applause almost before the last note had rung out. In smiling obedience to an imperative recall he presented Sinding's "Sylvelin," and, aroused by its enchantment, at least another story was demanded by clapping hands and busy throats. Dufault responded with "In a Garden" (C. B. Hawley). . . . Dufault's next trio, "A Spirit Flower" (Tipton), "Obstination" (Fontenailles), and Homer's "How's My Boy" was a further succession of triumpbs. Encore again, and Dufault gave "Charity" (McDermott) with moving zest of feeling. Still another encore, and he captured all hearts in "Mother o' Mine" (Tours), a model of emotional delineation. The final series of three songs . . . dictated their own encores, and Dufault positively set the enthusiasm aflame with "Inter Nos" (McFayden) and "Invictus."—The Register, Adelaide, Australia.

Franceska Lawson's Two Appearances.

A large and fashionable audience greeted Franceska Kasper Lawson at Stuart Hall Saturday night and listened with close attention to the program presented, which included arias and songs of classical and modern date demanding vocalism, artistry and poise of no ordinary sort.

. . . She at once wins the good will and reflex, smiling, attitude of those she stands before, and so gains a certain order of success before she sings a note.

Delightfully simple and natural, she enters into the spirit of her work and apparently forgets all else.

. . . Her quite unusual perfection of pianisimo control in the head voice stamped her as a singer of charm and of attainment.—Staunton (Va.) Daily News, November 18, 1914.

Franceska Kasper Lawson, soprano, gave one of the most delightful song recitals ever heard at Virginia College. . . . The large auditorium was filled with . . . music lovers from Roanoke.

Mrs. Lawson has a wonderful soprano voice which is of wide range with remarkable flexibility. In addition to her voice she possesses a most charming and attractive personality. . . . Mrs. Lawson was enthusiastically applauded after each song and at the conclusion of the program she was recalled a number of times.—Roanoke (Va.) Times. (Advertisement.)

Frances Alda's Annual Recital.

Frances Alda's annual New York recital in Carnegie Hall is an event which generally fills every seat in that spacious auditorium. Professional musicians and dilettantes are always present in large numbers, not only to enjoy the latest musical offering from this popular Metropolitan Opera Company soprano, but also to pay due respect to the wife of the Metropolitan Opera Company director. Mme. Gatti-Casazza is the matrimonial title which she enjoys in private life.

Each successive appearance of Mme. Alda as a recitalist in New York has disclosed additional touches of artistic finesse, both in her vocal delivery and in her interpretations, the natural result with a serious student who brings to bear all her talent, industry and intelligence upon a single purpose.

Her recent recital, Tuesday afternoon, December 1, was in no way an excep ion to Mme. Alda's rule of improvement. There seemed to be even more vocal poise than usual, additional depth of feeling, unwonted delicacy in the piano passages, and a well considered abandon which comes only from the broad experience that makes for confidence in one's power and establishes the proper relation between performer and audience.

English songs, that is, songs in the English language, opened and closed the program, the former by English, the latter by American composers.

"My Lovely Celia," Munroe; "The Plague of Love" and "Polly Willis," Dr. Arne, three quaint selections, naïvely delivered, followed by Paisiello's "Nel Cor Più," with its lovely legato, and Parodies' "M'ha preso alla sua Ragna," sung in Italian, constituted the first group.

"Liebeslied," Dvorák; "Tausend Sterne," Blech; "Schlaflied," Moszkowski; "Spinnlied," Moniuszko; each in its own way emphasized Mme. Alda's versatility to infuse the correct spirit into the lied. "Tausend Sterne" proved to be the most popular of the group.

In the French songs, introduced by Debussy's "Les Cloches" and followed by a " Mélodie Arabe" (first time), by Borodine, which was well worth its place on the program because of its strong dramatic effects; the two Hüe numbers, "A des Oiseaux" and "J'ai pleuré en rêve," and "Fleur j'etée," Fauré, Mme. Alda gave striking evidence of her right to be called a recitalist of the most finished kind. She brought to these songs an extraordinarily fine touch of shading, delicate delivery and a deep dramatic note. "J'ai pleuré en rêve," with its rich coloring and impressive chromatic climax, made such a decided impression that a repetition of the number became necessary.

Two interesting songs by Sibella, "O Bocca Dolorosa," "Impressione"; two from the pen of that much admired American composer-pianist, Frank la Forge, Mme. Alda's reliable and expert accompanist, "I Came with a Song," "In Pride of May," examples of musical excellence and well deserving of the continued applause which they received; and Woodman's "An Open Secret," made up the fourth group on the program.

As usual, the soprano was forced to respond to numerous encores and signs of spontaneous enthusiasm were apparent all afternoon. Chrysanthemums and roses showered upon the singer in fragrant tribute.

Jan Sickesz's New York Program.

Jan Sickesz, pianist, will give the following program at Aeolian Hall, New York, Thursday afternoon, December 17, at 3 o'clock:

Moonlight Sonata.....Beethoven
Phantasy, op. 17.....Schumann
Intermezzo, B flat minor.....Brahms
Intermezzo, A major.....Brahms
Capriccio, B minor.....Brahms
Rhapsody, E flat major.....Brahms
Prelude, B major.....Rachmaninow
Prelude, G minor.....Rachmaninow
Sonetto del Petrarco.....Liszt
Rhapsody Hongroise, No. 6.....Liszt

Ida H. Helms' Violin Recital.

Ida H. Helms, a talented pupil of Alois Trnka, delighted a large and friendly audience at her violin recital given on Friday evening, December 4, in Memorial Hall, Brooklyn, N. Y. She played Bruch's G minor concerto; Saint-Saëns' "Rondo Capriccioso"; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Hungarian Dance," No. 2, Brahms-Joachim, and "Scherzo Tarantelle," Wieniawski. She was accompanied by Elsa D. Miller, who also contributed as a solo number Liszt's "Rigoletto" paraphrase.

created a sensation by her recital two years ago, will make her second public appearance in Chicago.

Violet Bourne is the pupil of Julie Rive-King. She is to be assisted by Claire Hart, a pupil of David Baxter. Mr. Hart is from Louisville, Ky. Critics who have heard him claim that he will be one of the tenors of the future.

Among the patronesses for this recital are Mrs. J. Ogden Armour, Mrs. Archibald Freer, Mrs. J. J. Glessner, Mrs. W. W. Kimball, Mrs. S. McEntee and Mrs. George M. Pullman.

Harrison in Buffalo and Pittsburgh.

Buffalo, N. Y., December 1, 1914.

Mr. M. H. Hanson, Manager Theodore Harrison, Knabe Building, New York City:

DEAR SIR—I am very pleased to advise you of Mr. Harrison's unqualified success at last evening's Orpheus concert. Coming as he did, comparatively an unknown singer, he made a deeply favorable impression. He has a fine voice, splendid interpretation, and as an artist he was received with enthusiasm both by the audience and chorus. Very truly yours,

(Signed) R. H. HENSSLER,
Chairman of Music Committee.

THEODORE HARRISON.

The soloist of the evening was Theodore Harrison, baritone, a singer of superb vocal gifts. His voice is of beautiful timbre, and he sings with the authority of the artist who has enjoyed the best of training. In his rendition of the "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade," by Massenet, sung with the orchestra, his fine dramatic sense, beautiful legato and admirable French diction were all features that contributed to the enjoyment of this selection.

His ability as a lieder singer was brilliantly displayed in "Der Neugierige," by Schubert, which he sang with exquisite tone and delicacy of feeling.—Buffalo Courier.

Mr. Harrison has developed his natural talents to the fullest extent. He understands the voice and how to manipulate it, so as to secure the finest results. And he knows how to fashion a program such as will give variety and enable him to demonstrate that variety in a most potent manner. His program on this occasion was sufficiently diversified to hold the audience throughout, and he was rewarded sufficient applause to warrant his responding with several encores. . . .—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

Mr. Harrison's best work was heard in the modern Italian song by Carlo Gallone, the old Italian arias by Scarlatti and Legrenzi and in Schumann's "Fruehlingsnacht," the last of which was given as an encore.—Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph.

Mr. Harrison's . . . conscientiousness is a valuable quality. His best work was heard in the modern Italian song by Carlo Gallone, the old Italian arias by Scarlatti and Legrenzi, and in Schumann's "Fruehlingsnacht," given as an encore. Besides these he presented . . . Schubert's "Der Neugierige," Hugo Wolf's "Biterolf" and the "Am Sonntag Morgen" . . . and "Botschaft" of Brahms.—Pittsburgh Gazette Times.

Mr. Harrison's voice has good resonant quality, and bears evidence of conscientious effort. His program comprised groups of Italian, German and English songs.—Pittsburgh Press.

Wolle Gives Inaugural Recital.

Thursday evening, December 3, Dr. J. Fred Wolle gave the inaugural organ recital on the instrument recently placed in the new St. Peter's Lutheran Church at Rittersville, Pa. Anna Estes, soprano, and Howard J. Wiegner, baritone, assisted.

Malkin Music School.

December 1, Manfred Malkin pianist, was soloist at the Tuesday Salon (Sherry's, New York), performing works by Chopin and Liszt. Mr. Malkin's playing is distinguished by a compelling technic and beautiful tonal quality, combined with splendid interpretation.

December 4, Joseph Malkin, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, instituted examinations at the Malkin Music School, where he will teach; the class has already begun.

December 6, there was a joint recital by Sophie Traubman and Maurice Kaufman, members of the faculty of this school. A program of much variety, including eighteenth century violin compositions and modern works for voice and violin were performed by the two artists. The usual large audience attended.

LATER ST. LOUIS NOTES.

St. Louis, Mo., December 2, 1914.

The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth popular concert of the season, Sunday afternoon, November 29, which was historical in character, the orchestra responding to many encores. Two of the numbers were heard for the first time in St. Louis. The "Rondo all' Ongarese," by Haydn, was so enjoyable that after being applauded to the echo it was repeated. Hugo Olk, concertmaster, was the soloist of the afternoon, playing romanza in F, by Beethoven. He was recalled many times.

Hattie B. Gooding presented Alma Gluck and Efrem Zimbalist at the Odeon, November 28. These artists appeared to a capacity audience, each being recalled to the stage again and again. The St. Louis Pageant Choral Society and St. Louis Symphony Orchestra presented its first concert in the Odeon, November 30, the first of a series of three concerts. The program included many of the numbers sung at the St. Louis Pageant and Masque. Stella de Mette, mezzo-soprano, was the only soloist. She possesses a voice of ample volume. "The March of the Pioneers," a Pageant composition, by E. R. Kroeger, of St. Louis, was one of the numbers played by the orchestra and it was greeted with hearty applause. Frederick Fischer was the conductor. Charles Allan Cale presided at the organ. Caholsia's lines were sung by Raymond Koch.

Webster Arion Club gave its opening concert, Thursday night, November 26. The club was assisted by Myrna Sharlow, the young and beautiful soprano, who captivated her audience.

Two hundred and fifty St. Louis musicians played under John Philip Sousa, Tuesday evening, December 1, at the Coliseum, for the benefit of the old age pension fund of the Musicians' Mutual Benefit Association. There was a record attendance. Sousa's encore numbers included some of his most popular marches and selections from favorite operas. The soloists were Mrs. A. I. Epstein, vocalist, and Herbert L. Clarke, cornet soloist of Sousa's Band.

The School of Expressional Arts gave a recital on Monday evening at the Knights of Columbus Hall. Three one-act plays and a musical program of vocal, violin and flute solos and the mozart concerto completed the program.

Baron von Kleydorff, baritone, known as Franz Egenieff, will reside in this city with his wife and her mother, Anna Busch, at 2 Busch place. The singer and his wife were obliged to leave Germany on account of the war. Egenieff made his American debut with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra last season.

The Liederkranz Club gave an enjoyable concerts to a large and enthusiastic audience, Saturday night, November 28. The club has both a male and female chorus. The two choruses contributed numbers, sometimes together and sometimes singly, under the direction of Richard Stemp. Agnes Berry, a dramatic operatic soprano, gave fine renditions of her numbers, and Edna Stoessel, who has just returned from her studies abroad, contributed beautiful piano selections.

The Kirkwood Piano Club began its fourteenth open season with a recital of chamber music at Choral Hall, Tuesday evening, December 1.

The Cecilia Choral Club held an open meeting at Cabanne Branch Library, Monday afternoon, December 2.

MAY BIRDIE DITZLER.

GITTELSON

VIOLINIST

"He proved himself a well rounded artist by his interpretation of the Bach Chaconne. The infinite variety and sincere beauty of his tone was well brought out in this composition and the three dances were very charmingly played with rare grace and finish."

—K. C. B. in Boston Daily Advertiser, Nov. 7, 1914.

Bernard Steinberg's Boston Notice.

Some Jewish cantors on the concert platform have been a disappointment. Bernhard Steinberg was not. Regardless of whether or not he observes strictly the Temple traditions in his singing, his voice is a delight to hear, for it is strong, mellow, moving and satisfying. Influenced by his Temple position he certainly is, for the methods of Temple singing have become a part of his equipment, but, bound by them, he is not.

This enabled him to bring to the singing of "It Is Enough," from "Elijah," not only the clarity and definiteness of tone and phrasing that a singer without the benefit of Mr. Steinberg's Temple training would possess, but in addition to add to the dramatic intensity by a device of whispered enunciation of a few phrases which no singer not trained as Mr. Steinberg has been would likely employ. And yet, the dramatic feeling was made subordinate to the song impulse which the singer's artistic conception of the aria demanded should be uppermost.

So while Mr. Steinberg has been trained to bring out the dramatic expression of his voice, it still remains essentially a lyric voice, capable of giving great pleasure in the field of pure song. Out of deference possibly to the greater part of his audience, Mr. Steinberg sang as extra numbers only Temple music. In all his singing, though, the appeal was first of all through the beauty of voice with the dramatic instinct subordinated. Hence, a recital of song not confined to the music of the synagogue would please because of the inherent qualities of Mr. Steinberg's voice, which has

Press Opinions of Ida Gardner.

Miss Gardner was heard in four groups of songs rendered in as many different languages, and it would be difficult to point at any one group and say that she excelled in that, for she was equally as well in all.—Schenectady Gazette, October 7, 1914.

Her voice is splendidly developed, her technic is that of an artist and she has plenty of feeling for the music which her excellent equipment allows her to express to her hearers. A pleasing and dignified stage presence adds to the attractiveness of her concert work.—Schenectady Union-Star, October 7, 1914.

Miss Gardner in this varied program showed herself to be an exceptional artist in that she possesses an enormous range, wonderful dramatic ability and absolute control and command of her heavy contralto voice, whether singing dramatic arias as "Stride la Vampa" and the wonderful "Dalilah" aria, which she handled in a masterly way, or the soft, delicate work in "Im Kahne." Truly remarkable was Miss Gardner's pianissimo, which she used with wonderful effect.—Morning Sentinel, Amsterdam, October 10, 1914.

PLAN COMPETITION FOR LOCAL FESTIVAL SOLOIST.

Contest for Young Girl Singer to Be Held in February—Novel Plan of Judging—Jersey City Chorus Holds First Rehearsal—Two New Soloists Selected—Music Notes.

Newark, N. J., December 7, 1914.

At a meeting of the advisory committee of the Newark Music Festival Association, held last Friday afternoon in Lauter Hall, the question of a local soloist for the three day music festival, which is to be held in the First Regiment Armory on May 4, 5 and 6 next, was brought before the members, twenty-five of whom were present.

As a result of the discussion it was finally decided that the local soloist this year shall be a girl or young woman under twenty-five years of age who has resided in Essex or West Hudson counties for at least one year. The members of the Newark advisory committee are to be the judges of the competition.

It was also decided to hold the contest in the Central High School on the first chorus rehearsal night in February, the applicants to appear before the choral body. Each contestant will sing one number with her own accompanist at the piano. All will be numbered and the judges will be seated behind a screen, so that they cannot see the competitors. Voice alone will count, and the "number" receiving the majority of judicial votes will be pronounced the winner.

The successful contestant is to appear on "Concert Night," May 6, in the First Regiment Armory, on the same program with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, and Frieda Hempel, coloratura soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. Singers who desire to enter the contest must send full name, address, age and length of residence to the office of the Newark Music Festival Association, 593 Broad street.

The Newark advisory committee is composed of the following members: Louise Westwood, chairman; Charles Grant Shaffer, vice-chairman; J. E. Joyner, secretary; C. Wenham Smith, Howard Cann, Alexander Russell, Earnest Temme, Irving Cobb, Tom Daniel, Mr. and Mrs. George E. Clauder, James Sauvage, Diana Cobb, James Philipson, Mrs. Spaulding Frazer, Mrs. Wallace M. Scudder, Eleanor Hendrickson, William Spader Willis, John Lederer, Sidney A. Baldwin, John Pearsall, J. H. Huntington, Jr., Alexander Berne, A. K. Towers, Charles Tamme, Claude W. Velsor, Katherine Young, Edward Gray, Jr., Daniel E. Hervey, Florence Bucklin Scott, F. Mershfelder, Ella A. Wrigley, Florence Mulford Hunt, George Downing, Frank C. Mindnich, J. Louis Minier, Mr. and Mrs. Otto K. Schill, Edwin Wickenhoefer, Mrs. E. A. Baumann, Mr. and Mrs. Mandel Svet, R. A. L. Smith, William Silbereysen, Walter J. Flannigan, Mrs. Jay Ten Eyck, William W. Canon, Mildred S. Allen, Mrs. George Kirwan, George Kuhn, Ernest Genung, C. Le Massena, Laura A. Clarke, John J. Krietler, and Thornton W. Allen.

A Record Rehearsal.

Last Wednesday evening the Newark Chorus held the best rehearsal it has had since the choral body was organized. There was a record attendance, and not merely that, but the singing showed a remarkable improvement. Over forty new singers joined that evening.

The next weekly rehearsal will be held Wednesday evening, December 9, in the Central High School.

Jersey City Chorus Holds Initial Rehearsal.

The Jersey City Festival Chorus held its first rehearsal last Thursday evening in the Lincoln High School, that city, over two hundred singers being present. On this same page will be found a detailed account of this initial meeting.

Two More Soloists Engaged.

The engagement of Mary Jordan, of the Century Opera Company, and Regina Hassler-Fox, both contraltos well known to Newark audiences, leaves but one vacancy in the long list of noted soloists to appear at the May festival. Miss Jordan, who sang with the Orpheus Club last year, achieved a notable success at that time, and it is believed her appearance in Newark this year will aid materially in the success of the festival concerts. Miss Fox has many friends in Newark, where she has been heard on numerous occasions with excellent results. Miss Jordan will sing on "Opera Night," May 5, together with Pasquale Amato, baritone; Anna Case, soprano, and Paul Althouse, tenor. Miss Fox will appear with Mme. Gadski and Herbert Witherspoon on "Wagner Night."

Music Notes.

The first concert this season of the Arion Society will be held tonight in Krueger Auditorium. Katherine Eyman, pianist, and Paul Petri, tenor, will be the soloists. A detailed account of this concert will appear in next week's issue of the Musical Courier.

Tonight, December 7, Dora Becker Shaffer will give a violin lecture recital in the South Side High School. She will play and explain three groups of selections illustrating the classic period, the intermediate period and the modern period. Mrs. Shaffer's lecture-recitals have proven very popular, not only in Newark but also out of town. They are both entertaining and instructive and well deserving of success.

On December 8, Miss Miriam Arndt-Ardini will give a song recital in Wallace Hall.

The gigantic pageant and ball, for which great preparations have been made by the various committees of the Guild of the Babies' Hospital and the New Jersey subcommittee of the vacation committee of the metropolitan section for New York and New Jersey of the woman's department of the National Civic Federation, is to be held Wednesday evening, December 9, in the First Regiment Armory. Nahan Franko's Orchestra and Voss' Military Band will furnish the music. A full account will appear in next week's issue of the Musical Courier.

The Orpheus Club will give its first concert of the season in Wallace Hall on December 10.

The second artist concert in the Eliot Street School will be given on December 11.

On Friday evening, December 11, a concert which promises to be well attended is to be given in the parlors of the South Park Church. The soloists on this occasion will be Ethel C. Smith, violinist; Catherine Bryce, soprano; Mary Potter, contralto; Margaret C. Drake, elocutionist, and Mildred Steele Allen, pianist.

Fanning Wins More Praise.

Cecil Fanning, the American baritone, has just completed his twenty-fourth engagement so far this season. Both Mr. Fanning and his accompanist, Mr. Turpin, spent two days in New York this past week in order to give a presentation of their musical sketch, "Irish Love," in Newark, N. J., on Thursday evening, December 3.

During the past week he opened season courses for the Women's Musical Clubs of Fort Wayne, Ind., and Portsmouth, Ohio, where he was enthusiastically received. Some of the press criticisms follow:

When the enthusiasm of an audience will bring back a musician after the last number on the program and then an encore, there is something out of the ordinary in the ability of the singer to make the hunger for more of his songs insatiable.

This is the story of Cecil Fanning and his singing last night on his first appearance in Portsmouth.

Cecil Fanning, the great Ohio baritone, sang in an ideal recital, covering the broad scope of song that displayed his remarkable versatility as a singer and as a dramatist, because many, yes, all of his numbers have more or less of dramatic action accompanying the singing. His accompanist, Harry B. Turpin, is the only instructor Mr. Fanning ever had, and this partnership of accompanist and vocalist is resultant in unusual confidence, noticeable in the singer; knowing, as he does know, that the accompanist has the fate of the singer more at heart than even the most painstaking accompanist would have under other circumstances. . . . This was the end of the program, but Mr. Fanning came back to tell the audience that he could not respond to the request for Irish songs, because he did not have them with him, but would recite an Irish poem, which promise he fulfilled by telling the story of "The Bend in the Road," in a speaking voice in which the music is ineffably resonant. . . . Mr. Turpin added much to the intelligibility of the numbers by his brief but enlightening explanations of the history and meaning of the songs.—Portsmouth Morning Star.

The Morning Musical Society presented Cecil Fanning, baritone, last evening at the Elks' Temple. He was most enthusiastically received by a large, fashionable, music loving audience. His voice is full and rich and his personality most pleasing. He is versatile as he sings equally well in English, Scotch dialect, Italian, French and German. He sings well dramatic songs, intense love songs, ballads and lullabies. He is a master of languages and sings ballads of Germany and charming, quaint French folksongs with exceptional ease and good musical interpretation. He was frequently recalled and very gracious in granting encores.

Mr. Fanning has great dramatic ability and perfect enunciation. He sings with dignity and passion. He completely delighted his audience last evening and gave real pleasure to his hearers. H. B. Turpin, at the piano, played perfect accompaniments and often told interesting incidents in connection with the songs. The program was most varied and interesting. Probably the most charming moments of the evening were the times when the young singer rendered two French folksongs. A song of Harriet Ware's, called "Mammy's Song," was delightful. Many other songs were clever and entertaining; some were intensely dramatic while others were sweetly melodious. He expressed in different songs all the emotions of rage, hate, fear, passion, love and tenderness. He also expressed humor—an expression rarely found in an artist. The Morning Musical Society is to be congratulated upon presenting such a fine singer, who not only possesses a splendid voice, but has an engaging personality.—Fort Wayne Journal Gazette. Friedberg's Second Recital.

Carl Friedberg's second piano recital will be given at Aeolian Hall, New York, Monday evening, January 11. The arrangement for this recital was made because of numerous requests from many people to hear this artist who were unable to attend his first concert.

Mr. Friedberg will give a new and interesting program, the numbers of which will be announced soon.

JERSEY CITY CHORUS HOLDS FIRST REHEARSAL.

Over Two-Hundred Singers Meet in Preparation for Newark's May Festival—Great Enthusiasm Displayed.

Jersey City, N. J., December 6, 1914.

The Jersey City Festival Chorus, which was established recently as a part of the gigantic choral body now being organized for the Tri-City Festival to take place next year, and which next May will cooperate with the Newark chorus at the three day music festival there, held its first rehearsal in the Lincoln High School last Thursday evening, December 3. Over two hundred members were present and when one considers the fact that nearly all of the church choirs and choral clubs are especially busy just at this time rehearsing Christmas music, this number can well be called an excellent one. That all were most enthusiastic was evident from the outset, and the spirit of cooperation shown at this time was most gratifying to all of those behind the present movement.

The music that is being studied is by no means easy and yet the manner in which the members sang it showed clearly that most of them at least were well trained readers. It being the first rehearsal, considerable time was spent in telling the members of the plans of the association and in giving necessary instructions. C. Mortimer Wiske, the conductor of both the Newark and Paterson choruses, was present and directed the rehearsal. Mrs. Wiske was at the piano.

Plans are rapidly being completed for the Tri-City Festival which is being organized for next season. Paterson, Jersey City and Newark, each with a chorus of from 700 to 1,000 voices, are to be joined in giving this series of concerts. It is planned to give three concerts in Paterson, the Newark and Jersey City choruses all going there for that event; also three concerts in Newark, the Jersey City and Paterson choruses commuting to Newark those three days, and also to give three concerts in Jersey City, the three choruses combining for this event also. In this way a united chorus of probably three thousand voices will be established which will have no equal in the entire country, and which in addition to an orchestra of one hundred or more musicians and world renowned soloists, will help to make New Jersey one of the most important of music centers.

The next rehearsal of the chorus will be held Thursday evening, December 10, in the Lincoln High School, at 8 o'clock. A much larger attendance is expected at that time.

Jacques Kasner, Violinist, Pleases.

"Finland: Its Music and Dances," was the subject of an interesting musicale given by the music department of the Woman's Club of Orange, N. J., on Wednesday, December 2. At this affair an attractive feature was the playing of Jacques Kasner, violinist, who gave the romance in C by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. This composition, replete with the atmosphere of the North, was played with fine delicacy by Mr. Kasner. The audience, which was large and enthusiastic, insisted upon an encore, when Mr. Kasner played a composition by another living composer, "Liebesfreud," by Kreisler.

On December 1 Mr. Kasner played at an after dinner concert given at the home of Mrs. Metcalfe, in Orange, N. J., where he met with his usual appreciation.

Charles Harrison's Engagements.

Charles Harrison, the tenor, has a number of important engagements booked for December and January. Among them may be mentioned the following: December 10, Glen Ridge, N. J.; December 22, in "The Messiah," with the New York University Chorus, Reinald Werrenrath conductor; December 27, Newark, N. J.; December 28, in "The Messiah" at Worcester, Mass.; December 29, in "The Messiah" at Montclair, N. J.; December 30, in "The Messiah" at Trenton, N. J.; January 8, with the Women's Choral Union, of Jersey City, N. J.; January 14, New York City; January 17, Boston, Mass.; January 20, in "The Elijah" at Haverhill, Mass.

Fortnight Tour of Buck Pupil.

Robert Gottschalk, tenor, has been booked for a two weeks' tour, which will include appearances at Pittsburgh, Chicago, Baltimore and Philadelphia. Following these engagements, Mr. Gottschalk will sing in "The Messiah," which is to be given at Bound Brook, N. J. Mr. Gottschalk is a pupil of Dudley Buck, the vocal teacher of New York.

PHILADELPHIA NOTES.

Philadelphia, Pa., December 5, 1914.

Lack of a symphony concert this week on account of the absence of the Philadelphia Orchestra on its Western tour, was largely retrieved by several recitals of unusual interest and an excellent performance of "Gioconda" by the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. The recitals were by Louise Homer, Paul Draper, the English tenor, John McCormack and the Kneisel Quartet.

John McCormack was at the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening. He was greeted by a large audience, which showed pronounced appreciation of both his Irish songs and those from Wolf, Cadman, Rachmaninoff and Sinding. He was assisted by Donald McBeath, violinist, and Edwin Schneider, pianist.

Paul Draper, at Witherspoon Hall, on Thursday afternoon, under the management of Robert Patterson Strine, gave an interesting offering in four songs by Karol Szymanowski. A lyric voice of pure and limpid quality was shown by Mr. Draper.

The Sternberg School of Music revealed a pianist of quite unusual merits in its presentation of Edward Goldberg in recital at Griffith Hall last Friday evening. MacDowell's "Keltic" sonata was the principal number played by the pianist. He reflected the somewhat varying moods of the composition with great charm, and what is more, compelling strength. Evidence of the versatility of his work and the breadth of his training was given in his performance.

Ellis Clark Hammann was at the piano and Edna Harwood Baugher, soprano; Nicholas Douty, tenor, and Herman Sandby, cello, were the soloists at a concert in the ballroom of the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel last Friday evening.

S. Wesley Sears will be in charge of the thirty-first public service of the Pennsylvania Chapter of the American Guild of Organists in the Church of the Advocate next Wednesday evening.

The Philadelphia Orchestra will resume its regular weekly concerts at the Academy of Music next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with a program in which Leonard Borwick, the English pianist, will be the soloist.

H. P. QUICKSALL.

Fremstad in Brooklyn.

Olive Fremstad's Brooklyn recital last Friday, December 4, was spoken of as follows by the Daily Eagle, of that city:

"Mme. Fremstad's song singing is at the opposite pole from her work in opera, and she proved herself one of the few great operatic singers who has been able to make the transfer with fine artistic results. Everything from first to last was art, of the most refined, restrained, delicate sort. For her first number she sang four unfamiliar songs of Schumann, of which only one had the universal appeal of a lovely, clearly marked melody. The changes in tone color of these were exquisite and no doubt expressed to the last shade the meaning of the text.

In Wolf's songs the imaginative quality was so potent that it captured the audience completely. An atmosphere of supernal beauty was evoked with the simple old twelfth century 'Nightingale' and an Algerian song, and then came the Scotch 'Hush a Bye Darling,' in the melting tenderness of which the audience got a complete realization of the wealth of beauty and art which the singer had been pouring into her German and Norwegian songs.

"The Sibelius song requires not merely interpretation but voice. In the few bars at its climax we got a fleeting return of the glorious Fremstad of Isolde and Brünnhilde. And the voice was as perfect in its beauty in this big passage as it had been in the caressing tenderness so often employed earlier. That any woman with that power to thrill in reserve had for an evening subordinated herself so absolutely to the composers she was interpreting bespeaks a high ideal of artistic devotion.

A Küzdö Story.

Apropos of Leopold Auer's presence of mind and ready wit, Victor Küzdö relates the following: "One day last July, while Professor Auer was giving a lesson in his studio at Loschwitz, a terrible thunder storm came up. It was just about noon, when it grew pitch dark and the rain began to fall in sheets, accompanied by incessant thunder and lightning. A young student was playing the Viotti concerto for the master and did not seem in the least frightened by the storm. At the professor's request, I sat at the piano playing the accompaniment. Suddenly a terrific crash was heard, the lightning having struck the conducting rod of the Auer villa. It ran down through the studio chandelier, then shot across the room, striking me on the right shoulder. I fortunately escaped injury—the shock being slight—experiencing only a pricking sensation for an instant. With one accord we all rushed into the foyer, when Auer with perfect composure, turning to the others present said: 'Now no one can ever say that Küzdö does not possess the "divine spark," for we all saw it pass into him.'"

Elloda Kemmerer in Piano Recital.

H. Rawlins Baker issued invitations for a piano recital given by his pupil, Elloda Kemmerer, December 3, at the American Institute studios, New York. Miss Kemmerer played the following program:

Italian concerto (Presto)	Bach
Intermezzo	Brahms
Prelude	Rubinstein
Gondoliera	Liszt
Elfenspiel	Heyman
Prelude	Chopin
Etude de concert	MacDowell
Reverie Poetique	Mason
Impromptu	Blumenfeld
Etude	Moszkowski

The fair pianist has a lovely touch and physical strength quite disproportionate to her appearance. Liszt's "Gondoliera" and Mason's "Reverie" particularly showed this touch. The Chopin prelude might be described as a rush of clear cut figures, as interpreted by Miss Kemmerer. She reached the climax of her efforts in MacDowell's concert study, which was most effective. Miss Kemmerer is full of the artistic instinct, needing only time to perfect herself. An attentive audience heard and applauded all she did.

ELLODA KEMMERER,
Pianist.

Russian Symphony Announcement.

The programs for the three concerts of the Russian Symphony Orchestra to be given on Saturday nights, January 23, February 13 and March 6, 1915, at Carnegie Hall, New York, will include besides Modest Altschuler's arrangement of "Boris Godunow," by Moussorgsky, and excerpts from Borodine's opera, "Prince Igor," a new composition by Scriabine called "Prometheus," a symphonic tone poem, introduction to the second act of Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovanschina" (first performance in America), and "Armenian Suite," by Koreschenko, also first time here, and a new symphony by Vasilenko.

Subscriptions and other information for these concerts can be obtained at the office of Sutorius & Company, 1 West Thirty-fourth street, Room 712.

Sidney Stein's Violin Solos Win Favor.

Among the many professional pupils of Victor Küzdö, the American exponent of the Auer system of violin playing, special mention should be made of Sidney Stein, of Cleveland. Master Stein appeared during November in a concert in Brooklyn, and at two fashionable musicales in New York, at the Hotel Plaza and the Hotel McAlpin, where he created a decidedly favorable impression among his auditors. His fine style and appealing tone were commented upon particularly. Master Stein intends to give a violin recital in Cleveland, his home town, after the holidays.

Charles Bowes' Studio Recital.

The third recital of the season was given at the New York studio of Charles Bowes, on Tuesday, December 1. Ethel Chambers, a former De Reszké student, now studying with Mr. Bowes, assisted by singing compositions by Schumann, Bemberg and Haydn. Mr. Bowes again was heard and was in excellent voice, and demonstrated very clearly that the bass voice when properly taught can produce a smooth legato tone.

STOCKHOLM MUSIC NOTES.

Stockholm, November 22, 1914.

On account of the war and the general trouble all over the world, the opera of Stockholm did not open until September 1 with "Tannhäuser." It was not at all certain that we would have an opera season this year, because the board of directors thought it problematical whether the public would attend in sufficient numbers to cover the great expenses of the house. It was finally decided to undertake the regular season of performances.

The first premiere of the season took place October 10, with "La dame Blanche." The success was that of the singers, especially Mrs. Oscar (Jenny) and Mr. Stockman (Edward). At the "Trovatore" revival October 16, Rosa Grünberg scored as Leonora. She has made progress both in acting and singing.

Martin Oscàr was a Don Giovanni new to us. He sang with taste, and his fine stage presence and spirited acting helped him to win much favor.

Matilda Jungstedt Reutersvard celebrated her fiftieth birthday by singing in "Carmen" at the opera on October 13.

Christine Nilsson (Countess de Casa Miranda) will spend the winter in Sweden. She is often at the opera as a listener.

A new Carmen is to be heard here soon, when Marguerite Gauntier Wennergren essays the role for the first time at Stockholm.

Musical Sweden was glad to hear that Julia Claussen, the contralto, and Gustav Bergman, the tenor, are safe in America.

L. UPLING.

Manitowoc's Musical Club.

Manitowoc, Wis., has an active fifteen year old musical organization, called the Monday Music Club, with a membership of fifty.

Tuesday, October 27, Charles W. Clark, baritone, gave an interesting program before the club members. It contained songs and arias by Franz, Leoncavallo, Sinding, Bungert, Hollaender, Massenet, Homer, Mendelssohn, Debussy, Rogers, Schindler, Campbell-Tipton, Downing, Wyman and Busch.

Friday, November 27, Baroness Irmgard von Rottenthal, the Viennese interpretative dancer, assisted by Helen Mayer, violinist; Bertha Josephine Hecker, cellist; Muriel Hecker, pianist, and Marie Ludwig, harpist, furnished the program.

Three other numbers, to be given in January, February and March, will complete the Artists' Course of the club.

S. Constantino Yon's Pupil Praised.

At a performance of a musical comedy given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Tuesday, December 1, Olive Carey Owens, a pupil of S. Constantino Yon, Carnegie Hall, New York, with her beautiful voice and fine stage presence, was one of the successes of the evening.

Last year Miss Owens sang in Italy and the Italian papers spoke appreciatively of her singing.

The Brooklyn Daily Eagle said of her recent portrayal of the wealthy widow in the musical comedy:

"Miss Owens portrayed a carefully expensively arrayed lady of fashion, and her singing was one of the features of the night."

In the Brooklyn Daily Times appeared:

"There was Olive Carey Owens as the wealthy widow, who delighted every one with her splendid singing."

Earnest's Many Engagements.

Walter C. Earnest, the tenor, who resides in Pittsburgh, sang at McKeesport, Pa., on December 3, with such success that he was engaged to appear again on December 9. Mr. Earnest demonstrated that his popularity with the music lovers of those cities where he has appeared (and especially those of Pittsburgh) is steadily increasing, by the large and enthusiastic audience which greeted him at the concert which he gave in his home town on November 18. On November 27, he appeared before a Pittsburgh audience, and on November 25 he was heard at New Kensington, Pa. He gave a recital at Jeannette, Pa., on December 6, and on December 13 will appear as soloist in "The Messiah" at Wooster, Ohio. December 15, he will sing at Franklin, Pa., and on December 18 he will appear in recital at Dayton, Ohio.

Rudolph Ganz's Engagements.

Rudolph Ganz has been appearing in Bismarck and Fargo, N. Dak., on his way back from a satisfactory tour of the Pacific Coast. In San Francisco and Los Angeles, Mr. Ganz was heralded as one of the really great pianists.

Next week he will fill three dates in New England and will give another New York concert later; he will then rest until after Christmas, when he is to go West again.

Mr. Ganz will remain in New York all the season.

Cincinnati Orchestra Tour.

To the splendid reviews published in last week's MUSICAL COURIER, referring to the brilliant November tour of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, there should be added these exceptionally flattering press tributes:

Beethoven in all of the thoughtful serenity, the emotional complexity and the technical elegance of his third symphony was presented in an extraordinarily sympathetic way by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Ernst Kunwald, less rarely heard than some of the others.

There is no question but that Dr. Kunwald gave this symphony an inspired rendering. Supporting him is a splendid body of musicians—one of the finest in the United States, we must admit—nearly all of whom were with him last year, testimony to his musicianship and leadership and the financial solidarity of the organization. Added then on his part perhaps a special inspiration to the reading of an "Eroica," produced by these troublous times, and we have the foundation for a great performance.

It is idle here to point out how Dr. Kunwald attained the interpretation of the work in a supreme degree. We have previously had occasion to remark that he knows Beethoven. With such a meaningful performance as that last night we may gratefully add, he helps us to know Beethoven better. The striving against fate, the wonderful purple gloom and succeeding joyousness of the hero's panegyric, were presented to us in its full splendor of tonal imagery and thematic elaboration.

The audience was large. This was a testimonial to Music Club enterprise, as well as to the way that the Columbus public has been educated in the appreciation of symphony and in admiration of this particular body of interpreters.—Columbus (Ohio) Dispatch, November 18, 1914.

Fears had been entertained some months ago that Dr. Kunwald would not be able to lead this celebrated band of musicians this year, but good fortune smiled and the artist returned, and as a result Dayton is to be edified and entertained by this magnificent orchestra during the season just opening.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, perfectly trained by Dr. Kunwald, was never heard to better advantage than on Tuesday. His complete mastery is apparent the moment Dr. Kunwald takes his position as director. In presenting this opening program of the symphony season to Dayton, A. R. Thiele has assured local musical folk of a very successful happy winter.—Dayton (Ohio) News, November 29, 1914.

The orchestra was in particularly fine fettle last night; it has been heard here on numerous occasions in the past few years, but never before has its playing aroused more admiration than in the work it put forward in this concert. Each succeeding concert under Dr. Kunwald's direction has shown a marked advancement in all that goes to make for orchestra playing it its highest estate.

The orchestra has achieved a tonal balance that is well nigh perfect, its work is clean cut, the attacks are wrought with precision, and its playing, on the whole, is accomplished with a virtuosity that speaks in no uncertain tones of the great musicianship of Dr. Kunwald.

It is good to note the artistic advance of this fine organization, and its visits will always be welcome to this city.—Columbus (Ohio) State Journal, November 18, 1914.

The concert by the Cincinnati Orchestra, Friday night, was a source of solid delight to the vast audience which nearly filled the Coliseum. There was a subtle current of satisfaction and enjoyment in the very air which makes us sure that we are safe in saying that everyone there came away feeling refreshed and uplifted by the splendid feast of music which the program afforded.

The Beethoven symphony was splendidly played. Mr. Kunwald made the most of the contrasts; he was delightfully free and effective in his variations of tempo; he lost none of the beauty of the tender and delicate passages, his accents and sudden pianissimi were exceedingly well managed—in short, he gave a manly, a forceful, a human reading of the great work.

The trouble with such an evening of delight is this; that it reminds us how insufferably long will be the time until another similar evening comes.—Toledo (Ohio) Blade, November 21, 1914.

Grays' Armory was packed with music lovers last night to hear the first concert of the season by the Cincinnati Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Ernst Kunwald. It was the best audience of the year thus far for a musical entertainment, proving that even if the theatres (when they offer certain attractions) seem to be hard hit by the effects of the war scare, there is still a mighty local clientele for what is best in music.

And last night's audience was impressed with the fact that it received much of this quality upon the program offered.

Kunwald is a man of authority and this authority seems to radiate from him. The players feel the virility of his beat, also the intelligence and refinement of musical conception that lies behind it. Much improvement in this orchestra seems apparent with each new appearance. Dr. Kunwald is bringing it to a ranking point high above its past attainments.—Cleveland (Ohio) Leader, November 20, 1914. Malkin School Cello Classes.

Joseph Malkin instituted examinations at the Malkin Music School for students desiring to study the violoncello, December 4, and was surprised at the number of applicants who appeared. Of the applicants, two were selected for free scholarships, namely Emil Borodny and Maximillian Spielman. The school feels conscious of a superior department under the eminent cellist, Joseph Malkin, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and believes it will soon show such superiority through the work of its students.

Baroness Von Elsner's Musicale.

Baroness Litta von Elsner, vocal teacher, gave an interesting musicale at her studio, 570 Madison avenue, New York, on Sunday evening, December 6, before a large and fashionable audience. The participants were Myrtle Antonides, Dorothea Hermanson, Florence Haggerty, Alice Kenny, Katherine Murray, Hilda Meyer, Rosalie O'Brien, Elsie Oberg, Alys Pierson and Anna Wheaton, all pupils of the Baroness.

New York Symphony Concert.

At Aeolian Hall, New York, on Friday afternoon, December 4, the New York Symphony Society played Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Percy Grainger's "British Folksong and Dances," and Florent Schmitt's "Reflets d'Allemagne."

This last-named work, "Reflections on Germany," consists of three movements entitled "Nuremberg," "Dresden," and "Munich." They are three waltzes from a collection of eight, all of which are named after German cities. Three of them are amply sufficient, for they are mild and complacent without any distinguishing characteristics.

Percy Grainger's compositions, on the other hand, were bright, vivacious and entertaining. The composer has written three movements in which the spirit and characteristics of British folksongs and dances are well in evidence, and has named his pieces: "Molly on the Shore," "Irish Tune" and "Shepherds, Hey." There is no display of learning and no attempt at deep emotional utterance. But the music is clear and melodious, and the orchestration is effective.

Alma Gluck, who was well received and loudly applauded by her many admirers, sang an air from Mozart's "Die Entführung aus dem Seraglio," and three songs by Charpentier with orchestral accompaniment: "Les cloches felées," "Prière," "Chevaux de bois." As usual, Mme. Gluck displayed a beautiful voice, fine sense of style, and exquisite vocal technic.

Lund Returns to Buffalo.

Buffalo newspapers contain reports of the triumph achieved by John Lund, who has been musical director for Fritzi Scheff for a decade past, and who has returned to Buffalo as director of the Orpheus (German male chorus) Singing Society. In this capacity he led the Orpheus to victory at the Baltimore Saengerfest, conducted all the concerts for a decade, and was active in other branches of Buffalo musical life. Of him the Buffalo News of December 1 said: "The reception given Mr. Lund was overwhelming in its enthusiasm and spontaneity; the chorus rose to its feet and stood to welcome its new director, while the applause of the audience continued for several minutes. . . . A repetition of the final chorus of 'Ein Sonntag auf der Alm' was demanded before the gifted conductor was allowed to leave the stage."

Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler's Program.

Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler's program, which she will play in Aeolian Hall, New York, Saturday afternoon, December 12, is as follows:

Moment Musical ..... Schubert
Menuet, G major ..... Beethoven
Sonata, Appassionata, op. 57 ..... Beethoven
Mazurka, op. 7, No. 1 (by request) ..... Chopin
Etude, op. 19, No. 7 (by request) ..... Chopin
Etude, op. 10, No. 12 (by request) ..... Chopin
Valse, op. 64, No. 2 ..... Chopin
Ballade, op. 52 ..... Chopin
Theme varié, A major ..... Paderewski
Etude de Concert, op. 1, No. 1 ..... Schloezer
Arabesque on themes of the waltz, On the Beautiful Blue Danube (arranged by Schulz-Evler) ..... Strauss

Florence Larrabee Is Touring America.

Florence Larrabee, the pianist, played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra even before she went to Europe for the completion of her studies. Since that time Miss Larrabee has completed her virtuoso training under Teresa Carreño and has appeared upon frequent occasions with pronounced success both abroad and at home. She has now returned to America and is touring this country.

Westminster College Active in Music.

A thriving and active institution, especially in musical matters, is Westminster College, which is situated at New Wilmington, Pa. Under the direction of William Wilson Campbell, the department of music is becoming widely recognized as one of the leading institutions for the study of musical art.

Serato to Play with New Haven Symphony.

Arrigo Serato, the Italian violinist, who is enjoying a profitable Western tour, has just been engaged by Professor Parker, of Yale, to appear with the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, January 12, 1915, when he will play the Beethoven concerto.

Liederkranz Society's Opening Concert.

Season 1914-1915 of the German Liederkranz opened brilliantly with a concert Sunday evening, December 6, at Liederkranz Hall, New York.

Carl Friedberg, the German pianist, gave interpretations of the Chopin nocturne in F sharp and ballade in A flat, which those who were privileged to hear him will not soon forget because of their deeply poetical and at the same time virile delivery by this master of the keyboard. The Rameau-Godowsky "Sarabande" and the "Moonlight" sonata served to introduce the artist. Numerous recalls followed both his groups.

Carl Jörn, the Metropolitan Opera Company tenor, was heard in the "Tannhäuser" narrative to orchestral accompaniment and in a group of songs with piano accompaniment; "Der Sieger," Kaun; "Cecilie," Strauss; Assad's aria from "Queen of Sheba," Goldmark (repeated), and the Henschel "Morning Hymn." Of course the tenor was compelled to respond to encores. He sang wonderfully well, displaying fervor, poetry and vocal finish.

Orchestral numbers, furnished by members of the New York Philharmonic Society, were: "Jubel" overture Weber; "Valse Melancolique" and "Allegro de bravura," from "Ziguener" suite, German, capitally executed numbers which caught the fancy of the listener.

The Liederkranz's men's and women's chorus figured also on this program. Otto A. Graff was the director and Carl Hahn the piano accompanist. Claasen's "Singt mir ein Lieb," "Gebt mir vom Becher nur dem Schaum," Meyer-Olbersleben; "Wenn zwei sich gut sind," Kremser; "Am Ammersee," Langer; "Old Lowland Folksongs," with Carl Jörn and W. Hagenmeyer, baritone, as soloists, were the selections through which the men's chorus showed that it had lost nothing in volume, balance of tone and understanding of ensemble singing since last season. This was especially notable in the concluding number.

The "Mondfee," Meyer-Olbersleben, arranged for string orchestra by Otto Graf, and "Spinnlied," Beer, constituted the women's chorus numbers.

Liederkranz Hall was completely filled on this occasion by the members of the society.

Mendelssohn Glee Club Concert.

The first private concert of the forty-ninth season of the Mendelssohn Glee Club was given at the Hotel Astor, New York, on Tuesday evening, December 1, under the directorship of its conductor, Louis Koemmenich. The hall was crowded to its capacity by an enthusiastic audience. The assisting artist was May Mukle, cellist. Charles A Baker was the accompanist. The program follows:

The Song of the Grail Seekers ..... Mabel Wood Hill
Ave Maria ..... Victor E. Nessler
Mother o' Mine ..... H. T. Burleigh
Sonata in F ..... Valentini
May Mukle.
To the Dead of the Lltis ..... Fränz Curti
Before the Dawn ..... W. Franke Harling
When the Cherries Bloomed ..... Otto Barblan
Yonder! Yonder! ..... H. Plumhof
Where Fliest Thou? ..... H. Plumhof
Air ..... Purcell
Idyll ..... Ethel Barns
May Mukle.
Land Sighting ..... Edward Grieg

Louis Koemmenich's work, as conductor, has brought forth excellent results in the training of this body of male voices. The "Song of the Grail-Seekers," by Mabel Wood Hill, which was composed for the Mendelssohn Glee Club, and sung for the first time at this concert, opened the program in heroic style. The number entitled "Before the Dawn," by W. Franke Harling, was probably the most interesting item on the program. In this the tenor solo was capably sung by Bechtel Alcock.

Jules Falk at Keyser, W. Va.

On Friday evening, November 20, the young violinist, Jules Falk, gave a recital at Keyser, W. Va. Mr. Falk was ably assisted by Elsie R. Hoffman, pianist. The opening number was the sonata for violin and piano by Dvorák. The second movement, larghetto ("Indian Lament"), was especially well played. Mr. Falk's second group was made up of compositions by Martini, Von Dittersdorf, Porpora and Francœur, while the third number was the concerto in E minor by Mendelssohn. His final group consisted of Toraulin's "Cradle Song," Dvorák's "Humoresque" (by request), and Sarasate's "Gypsy Aria." The audience was most enthusiastic and the papers spoke of Falk as being "an artist indeed."

Los Angeles Orchestra Program.

A program of unusual worth opened the season of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, November 20 and 21. Under Adolf Tandler's direction, the orchestra played the "Sakuntala" overture, two tone poems by Delius, Liszt's "Preludes," and Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. There was a large and enthusiastic audience.

NEWS FROM VARIOUS CITIES

Portland, Oregon.

445 Sherlock Building,
Portland, Ore., November 20, 1914.

On Sunday afternoon, November 8, Evan Williams sang in the Heilig Theatre and established himself as one of the best tenors ever heard in Oregon. His program included "Ah, Love but a Day" (Protheroe), "Sound an Alarm" (Handel), "Wandering" (Schubert), "If with All Your Hearts" (Mendelssohn) and a group of Welsh songs. Among his many extra numbers were "A Perfect Day" (Bond) and "Open the Gates of the Temple" (Knapp). The large audience was very enthusiastic. This concert was one of the Steers-Coman series.

William H. Boyer, director of music in the local high schools, has announced a series of concerts for the various high schools, beginning today. Each school will furnish its program, which will be made up of vocal and instrumental solos and chorus and orchestral selections by the students. An admission fee of ten cents will be charged.

◈ ◈ ◈

Last week the Portland Oratorio Society, Joseph A. Finley, director, was heard at the Manufacturers' and Land Products Show and its work proved gratifying to all present. The chorus offered compositions by Handel, Sullivan, Molloy and Gounod.

The Monday Musical Club, Mrs. G. J. Frankel, president, has done much to establish a high musical standard here. Programs are given twice a month. This organization has been a member of the General Federation of Musical Clubs since 1906.

◈ ◈ ◈

Ethel Edick, a local pianist, has composed a new song, entitled "O Come to the Panama Fair." It has been sung with success by Hartridge Whipp, a gifted baritone. Miss Edick is a pupil of E. R. Kroeger, of St. Louis, Mo.

◈ ◈ ◈

These soloists appeared here recently and each made a fine impression: Andrew B. Caughey, baritone; Rose Coursen-Reed, contralto, and Dagmar Inez Kelly, contralto, all of this city.

The writer is in receipt of a photograph of Helen Ware, the violinist.

JOHN R. OATMAN.

Denver.

2735 E. Colfax Ave.,
Denver, Col., November 24, 1914.

Several thousand people heard the first concert of the course given by the Reverend Father Burke, at the Auditorium on Friday evening, November 13, when Frances Ingram, contralto, and Helen Read, soprano, of Chicago, with Florence Lamont Abramowitz, accompanist of this city, gave a varied program of songs. It was a very pleasing concert and both artists were roundly applauded.

Much interest centered around the appearance here on Tuesday evening, November 17, of Charles Wakefield Cadman, with Princess Tsianina Redfeather, Indian mezzo-soprano, in an American Indian music talk. A capacity audience greeted them and there was no lack of enthusiasm.

Owing to the serious illness of Director Cavallo, of the Cavallo Symphony Orchestra, the program for the third concert of the series was changed. Maud Powell, who was engaged as soloist, gave the entire program, with the assistance of her accompanist and pianist, Francis Moore. The audience was larger than at any previous concert and the program was one of marked beauty. Mme. Powell created great enthusiasm and granted several encores.

The American Music and Art Society held its first meeting of the year at the Metropole Hotel on Friday evening, November 20. Dr. Lindsay B. Longacre, the new president, addressed the society and there was an informal discussion of plans for the coming year. The board of directors are: Dr. L. B. Longacre, president; Mrs. E. J. Yetter, vice-president; Mrs. E. E. Fairchild, second vice-president; Harold Orth, secretary-treasurer; Marie Bren-Kaus, Blanche Dingley Mathews, Edith Jones and Paul Stauffer. A program was given by Theresa R. Eells, Royden S. Massey, Mrs. Harold Orth, Richard Bourke and Helen Harvat. About one hundred members were present.

DOLORES REEDY MAXWELL.

Buffalo.

Buffalo, N. Y., November 28, 1914.

Thanksgiving week was made memorable by the visits of two great artists to our city. On Monday evening, November 23, in Elmwood Music Hall, Mme. Schumann-Heink sang before an audience that completely filled the great auditorium, and on Thanksgiving night the hall was again filled to hear John McCormack, the Irish tenor. Mme. Schumann-Heink was in splendid voice and aroused her hearers by the dramatic fervor of her performance. She was recalled again and again. She was assisted by Edward J. McNamara, baritone. Katharine Hoffman rendered delightful accompaniments.

John McCormack was the soloist at the second subscription concert under the management of Mai Davis Smith. Elmwood Music Hall was none too large to accommodate the vast holiday throng which gathered to hear the tenor. Mr. McBeath, violinist, who participated on the program, was cordially received. For both artists, Edwin Schneider acted as accompanist.

◈ ◈ ◈

Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Kellogg, of Delaware avenue, opened their home on Monday afternoon, November 16, for a piano recital by Tina Lerner. The beautiful music room was taxed to its capacity, many finding seats upon the stairs. In all styles of composition Miss Lerner is a charming performer, but more especially in the Mozart, Bach, Chopin and Liszt numbers, where her poetic nature revels in the delicate passages.

◈ ◈ ◈

The Buffalo Musicians' Directory, published by Charles Kuhn, has just been issued, revised up to date. It contains, as far as could be procured, the names and addresses of all professional musicians in the city, together with other musical information of interest. The past two seasons have proved the usefulness of such a publication.

CORA J. TAYLOR.

Bay City.

Bay City, Mich., November 27, 1914.

Mrs. A. F. Mueller, teacher of piano in Bay City, has returned from a six months' trip abroad, having spent most of the time in Germany and Austria. She arrived in New York on the steamship Ryndam, November 11. Another passenger on this boat was Baron von Klydorff, baritone, whose stage name is Franz Egenieff. Mrs. Mueller attended a performance of "Tannhäuser" on October 4, which was given to a crowded house in the Royal Court Opera House. Also many concerts and musicales given by churches and others for the benefit of widows and orphans are well attended, wealthy people buying tickets and giving them to convalescent soldiers and others. Mrs. Mueller had absolutely no trouble throughout her trip home. She resumes teaching in about a week in her studio on North Sheridan street.

Charles U. White, teacher of piano in Bay City, gave an organ recital for the University Society in Ann Arbor on November 19.

◈ ◈ ◈

Grace Woodard Phillips, teacher of singing in Bay City, has, through the request of certain parents who realize that their children in singing as they are obliged to in the public schools without the knowledge of proper breath support are doing an injury to the voice, accepted children in classes of eight each, for the study of correct breathing, ear training and folksongs. The children are much interested and the results are satisfying to the parents.

GRACE WOODARD PHILLIPS.

Houston.

Houston, Tex., November 28, 1914.

The Houston Symphony Orchestra gave its premier concert on Thanksgiving afternoon at 5 o'clock to an audience that filled the Majestic Theatre. Few cities can boast of greater interest in music than was displayed on this occasion, for the reason that it was the third day of the heaviest downpour of rain of the season. Julian Paul Blitz is a brilliant director and under his energetic baton the orchestra shows a marked improvement over last year's work. "Three Dances from Henry VIII," by German, was the best number of the concert, and a close second was "Spanish Dances," by Moszkowski, a finale to a rather light but beautiful and effective program. "Ballet Music," from "Faust," by Gounod, and "Four Northern Dances," by Grieg, were vigorously applauded. The soloist of the occasion was Mme. McElroy Johnston, who gave the "Waltz Song," from "Romeo and Juliet," by Gounod, and for an encore, "The Last Rose of Summer."

The object of the symphony orchestra is to give to Houston the best possible in vocal as well as instrumental music and will recruit its artists from its midst for the present at least. Much of the success of the affair belongs to Business Manager Will Kendall. The next concert soloist will be Rosetta Hirsch, violinist.

EMMET LENNON.

Hartford.

Hartford, Conn., November 29, 1914.

The Hartford Philharmonic Orchestra gave its first concert of the season on November 19. As is usual, at the afternoon rehearsal, every seat was occupied, and in the evening a good sized audience was there to support this local organization. Conductor Robert H. Prutting is continuing the splendid work he has been carrying on in past years. Especially should the good work of the strings be commended. The program opened with the Bach-Brandenburg concerto, No. 3, for strings, followed by the andante from the "Surprise Symphony" of Haydn. Probably the popular taste was satisfied most by the Mozart symphony in E flat, of which the third and last movements were played. Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony in B minor was the next orchestral number. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," was the final selection. Mabel Garrison, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was the soloist. With the orchestra she sang the aria, "Ah, Fors e Lui," from "Traviata," and a group of songs with piano.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of three concerts at Parson's Theatre on November 23. Marie Sundelius, soprano, was the soloist. Hartford people should feel grateful to Gallup and Alfred & Co., who have brought the Boston organization here for years, and this season were able to secure three concerts instead of the two, as we had last year.

MUSICAL COURIER

VOL. LXIX.—NO. 24. NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1914. WHOLE NO. 1812.

KANSAS ADOPTS STANDARDIZATION OF MUSIC TEACHERS.

State Music Teachers' Association in Annual Convention at Wichita Puts New Scheme Into Action—Plan Recently Outlined in the Musical Courier Adopted with a Few Changes—Interesting Programs—Next Annual Meeting to Be Held at Hutchinson—Notes of Convention.

Wichita, Kan., December 5, 1914.

Standardization of music teachers for the State of Kansas was put into action by the Kansas State Music Teachers' Association at its annual convention, held here this week. Kansas takes the lead in being the first to realize this plan practically.

Wichita, through the local musicians, was the first city to adopt and work out a definite scheme for crediting high school and grade school pupils for music work outside the school. The MUSICAL COURIER gave recently the outlined plan of work toward crediting teachers.

At this meeting the main topic of discussion was, naturally, this credit system, both for the teachers and for the pupils. Wichita teachers informed those not already conversant with the scheme. The action of the executive committee was endorsed and the plan as outlined in the MUSICAL COURIER was adopted with a few changes. In accrediting teachers, local committees, members of which bodies will be appointed by the local high school principal, subjected to the acceptance of the executive committee of the Kansas State Music Teachers' Association, will pass on the eligibility of the local teachers. This does not give the executive committee full power to credit, but puts this work largely in the hands of the local committee, whose members must be licensed by the State association.

Meeting Lasts Three Days.

In the general discussion several pertinent and well taken questions were brought up, and some sharp discussions were the result, but the meeting, after lasting three days, closed in harmony with a banquet Friday evening, at which all in attendance were cemented into a general body of good fellowship.

The Opening Session.

The opening session of this auspicious meeting occurred on Wednesday, December 2, at the Central Christian Church of Wichita, and Charles S. Skilton, president of the association and dean of music in the State University, delivered the initial address, welcoming the teachers, some 300 strong, and at once giving voice to the principal movement already started relative to standardization. Previously a general reception and registration had been held, at which members were furnished tickets and tags of identification, and efforts were made to insure accommodations for all.

American Compositions Performed.

At 8.30 p. m. a program devoted to compositions of American composers was given. (Other musicians and State associations, please note.) Lucius Ades and his choir from St. Paul's M. E. Church gave Dudley Buck's festival "Te Deum" in B minor. Rafael Navas played two numbers by Arthur Farwell; Charles Davis Carter, three songs by Dichmont, Chadwick and Beach. The E. R. Kroeger sonata for violin and piano was presented by Wort Morse and Carl Preyer. William B. Downing sang four songs by Cadman, and the balance of the program was as follows:

Piano—
Concert etude.....MacDowell
Variations on Balkan Themes.....Beach
Nell Cave, Manhattan.

Aria, I List the Trill of Golden Throat.....Herbert
(From Opera Natoma.)
Mrs. Hattie L. Emerson, Chanute.

Trio, in C minor (piano, violin, violoncello).....Arthur Foote Wort S. Morse, William B. Dalton, Charles S. Skilton, Lawrence.

Songs—
Thy Beaming Eyes.....MacDowell
The Birth of Morn.....Leoni
Come to the Garden, Love.....Salter
Miss Husband, Emporia.

Piano—
The Night.....Holden Huss
La Fileuse.....Whiting
Scherzo in B flat minor.....Preyer
Carl A. Preyer, Lawrence.

Discussions and Conferences.

The round table discussions and conferences began on Thursday morning at 9 o'clock, and fifteen minute papers were read by the leading teachers of the State. Piano, voice and violin departments were conducted along these lines. Two full hours were allotted to the conferences. Many teachers took notes and vital topics relative to technic, as well as several private theories, were launched, and some were exploded.

Thursday Morning Program.

The Thursday morning program occurred at 11 o'clock, and the following teachers were heard on this occasion: D. A. Hirschler, Emporia; Myrtle Neel, Pratt; Edna M. Jones, Manhattan; Inez Dodds-Barbour, Wichita, and Arthur Uhl, Lindsborg.

Thursday Afternoon Meeting.

At the Thursday afternoon meeting, opening at 2, Charles S. Skilton presided. R. H. Brown, of Manhattan, told of the classwork scheme of teaching music in vogue at the Manhattan school, and of its questionable success as a scheme of teaching. D. A. Hirschler, of Emporia, treated the subject of private teaching of harmony and how it can be conducted in an interesting manner. Paul R. Utt, of Salina, spoke optimistically of the future of music teaching. Laszlo Schwartz, representing Helen Ware, violinist, was given an opportunity and read a pithy, logical and interesting paper on "Commercialism in Music," especially as it relates to exploiting an artist, and gave some excellent advice to some of the new teachers and public aspirants. At 3.30 o'clock, Jo Shipley Watson, of Emporia, gave an illustrated talk on "American Folk Music," which was excellent.

Kansas Composers Program.

Thursday afternoon a program of works by Kansas composers was heard. This is a step somewhat in advance of several other State organizations, and something which the final speaker of the convention stated as "not only a program of all Americans, but the first one of 'all State' composers ever to have been presented at a State music teachers' meeting." This was the program:

Chorus, When Dorothy Smiles.....Chas. Davis Carter
(Female voices, four parts.)
Fairmount College Women's Glee Club.

Piano—
Nocturne in A flat.....T. L. Krebs
Improvisation.....T. L. Krebs
T. L. Krebs, Wichita.

Songs—
Dew Drops at Dawn.....T. L. Krebs
Baby Dear.....Mrs. Ray Campbell
Lullaby.....Mrs. Ray Campbell
Mrs. C. C. Stanley, Mrs. Campbell, at piano, Wichita.

Violin, Fantasie for violin.....Theodore Lindberg
Lorentz Hansen.

Piano—
Consolation.....Carl A. Preyer
Ballet Dancer.....Carl A. Preyer
Combat.....Carl A. Preyer
Mazurka in D flat.....Carl A. Preyer
Carl A. Preyer, Lawrence.

Songs—
The River.....T. L. Krebs
Lullaby" (from Indian songs).....Thurlow Lieurance
My Silver Throated Fawn.....Thurlow Lieurance
Her Blanket (Chanute).....Thurlow Lieurance
Elsie Randall, Wichita.

Quintet in A major.....Otto L. Fischer
(For piano and string quartet.)
I. Adagio; II. Allegro. Otto L. Fischer at piano, Wichita.

Songs—
A Song to You.....Chas. Davis Carter
A Boat Song.....Chas. Davis Carter
Madame Carter, C. D. Carter at piano, Wichita.

Songs—
Evening Prayer.....Rev. Wm. Paul
Lullaby.....Rev. Wm. Paul
Rev. Paul at piano, Wichita.

Sonata in G minor, for violin and piano.....C. S. Skilton
I. Allegro maestoso; II. Adagio; III. Scherzo.
(Awarded first prize by the Music Teachers' National Association, New York.)
Wort Morse, Chas. S. Skilton, Lawrence.

Songs—
Last Night and This.....Mrs. J. F. Carpenter
If You Were Mine.....Mrs. J. F. Carpenter
Florence Cubbon.

Piano—
Prelude, nocturne, marche.....A. D. Schmutz
Gavotte in D.....(Newton) A. D. Schmutz
Rafael Navas, Wichita.

Program by Visiting Teachers.

Thursday evening a program by visiting teachers was given at Philharmony Hall, and the following were heard: Bernice Rice, pianist; Evaline Hartley, voice; Harry Murrison, baritone, and Joseph Kitchin, violinist, all of Emporia. Also Mrs. E. D. Clithero, pianist; Helen Phipps, violinist, both of Topeka; H. H. Loudenback, pianist, of Atchinson, and Harry Evans, bass baritone, of Wichita. The program opened with an eight part motet by P. Cornelius, presented under the direction of Harry Evans. It was sung by the Wichita College of Music Choral Club. The closing number was Weber's "Oberon" overture arranged for two pianos (eight hands) and string orchestra, conducted by Theodore Lindberg.

Executive Committee Meeting.

The executive committee met Thursday evening and issued credits, but the main business was deferred to Friday morning at the open business meeting. Previous to this business meeting a general discussion relative to music credits was held and Otto L. Fischer presided. A general resume of the work so far done by the executive committee was stated by President Skilton, and an excellent paper on the working plan as already in vogue in Wichita was given by Jessie Clark, supervisor of music in Wichita public schools. It was at this meeting that the local commitee plan was discussed. The local committee here in Wichita were already in operation. The executive committee of the State association were taking the entire plan out of any local committee's hands and Wichita resented it. The local committee, composed of representative musicians of the city, demanded recognition for their work so far done. This was the gist of the discussions, and was led by Frank A. Power, of Wichita, and Frank A. Beach, of Emporia. The discussions continued until 11 o'clock, when the regular business meeting was called to order by the president.

C. S. Skilton was re-elected president. E. B. Gordon, of Winfield; Paul R. Utt, of Salina, and Nell Cave, of Manhattan, were elected new members of the executive committee. Albert A. Anderson, of Hutchinson, received the heavy joint task of secretary and treasurer, and the prospects for this year with this plan started are for considerable work for him. Gordon, of Winfield, was elected vice-president of the organization.

Resolutions amending the constitution so that local committees would be empowered to act in the credit matter were introduced and passed. A committee to bring to the proper authorities this credit move in order properly to secure legislation was also arranged for. The State superintendent of instruction was voted into the organization as ex-officio member of the committee of this credit plan.

It will be seen from above the effective way in which this standardization plan is being put into operation. Without going into detail it may be said that so far the plan is well worked out, and that with proper legislation the credit system will be adopted by all the public schools of the State. This plan is applicable particularly to music study outside of the schools and is a plan to standardize those teachers who have students desiring credit in the school for this [illegible] is not a compulsory license unless the teacher [illegible] be able to give this credit.

An Organ Recital.

At 2 o'clock an organ recital by Horace Whitehouse, of Topeka, was given. In the later program of the afternoon, F. A. Beach, of Emporia, read a paper on "The Music Teacher a Factor in Community Life"; Mrs. Gaston Boyd, of Newton, talked on "Pedagogics, as Applied to the Teaching of Singing in the Public Schools"; Mary S. Thomas, of Waterville, delivered a paper on "Importance of Public School Music."

At 4.30 the guests from out of town were given a sight seeing tour of Wichita via the automobile route. They saw a real city.

Friday Evening Session.

The Friday evening session opened with the following program:

Rhapsodie .....Alfred Silven
Albert O. Anderson, Hutchinson.

Bass solos—
The Salutation of the Dawn.....Stevenson
Vision Fugitive (Herodiade).....Massenet
Ralph Young, Hutchinson.

Violin—
Air on G string.....Bach
Meditation .....Ole Bull
Perpetual Motion.....Reinhart
Arthur Uhl.

Tenor solos—
My Native Land.....Hugo Kaun
Morning, op. 4.....Rachmaninoff
Were I a Prince Egyptian.....Chadwick
Lucius Ades, Wichita.

Theme and variations.....Bossi
Albert O. Anderson, Hutchinson.

A banquet followed a lecture, music was furnished by a toy symphony orchestra of forty pieces, several stunts were features of the evening, and one of the most auspicious and most important State Music Teachers' Association meetings ever held was closed.

And what made it so important? This credit system. And where did it first start to operate on this basis? Wichita!

Notes and Comments.

Hutchinson, Kan., gets the next annual meeting. Chanute fought hard for it.

Laszlo Schwartz, manager for Helen Ware, violinist, was prominently in attendance at all meetings.

W. B. Kinnear, of Larned, delivered a paper on the National Educational Association and its progress.

The Eberhart-Hays music firm furnished an excellent concert grand Knabe for the programs.

Frank A. Power, of the Power-Myers Conservatory of Music, of Wichita, was the first to move practically and to start the credit system for Wichita schools. Wichita was the first city in the State to put it in practical operation. Therefore, to Frank A. Power belongs the credit for something. Principal Allen should share.

Here is some food for reflection brought out by the general discussion relative pro and con the accrediting plan for teachers as brought up by Wm. B. Kinnear, of Larned. These questions he read and by the applause he received it is easily discernible that this credit plan is not at all satisfactory already to a host of teachers who were in attendance. These questions bring up the big vital one—"Will the standardization plan of music teaching work out successfully? Successfully from the larger sense, that of advancing materially the music art?" Here are his questions:

1. Do association members who do not ask for credits return to their respective communities as discredited teachers?

2. Will accredited teachers do better work or non-accredited teachers do poorer work because of such condition or standing?

3. What will be the gain or loss to pupils and patrons in any case?

4. By what authority does a self appointed body like the Kansas State Music Teachers' Association presume to compel membership to be accredited?

5. Granting the reasonableness of some requirement and certification for teachers who receive pay from public funds (as example, public school music teachers), what authority is there for regulating the work of private teachers?

6. Are all first applicants accredited without question, and if so or if not, on what grounds or by what authority is applications approved or denied?

7. Is it the purpose of the association to unionize the profession?

It was stated in open meeting in substance that accredited teachers will have a higher standing because of being accredited. It puts non-accredited teachers at a disadvantage.

Question: Will the accredited teachers of Kansas, therefore, be of higher standing than the great teachers of New York and Chicago and other central points who are not accredited?

The above questions are food for reflection only, but are propounded for other States to reflect on.

Henry J. Allen, who made the speech at Chicago which practically launched the "Progressive party," lives at Wichita. Is there any significance in this, as related to the action of this meeting?

The theory of teaching was entirely exploded several times. Some do not believe in standards, standards proven by use for years, but are quick to vote on standardization.

H. S. Center, of Boston, Mass., was a visitor.

Arthur Uhe's Gagliano violin found its cousin, another Gagliano, owned in Wichita by Ralph Brokaw.

The Wichita Symphony Orchestra did not give the proposed concert. The standardized (unionized) musicians were unable to get together. RALPH BROKAW.

Ramon Blanchart's Reinhart.

During the brief period of Boston's recent Italian opera season at the Boston Theatre, Ramon Blanchart, the Spanish baritone, was, through popular demand, engaged by the organization for weekly appearances as guest artist. His high standing with Boston operatic audiences has long been established, this being due to the popularity attained when he was a member of the Boston Opera Company. Appended are a few of the Boston press comments on Mr. Blanchart's Reinhart, in Verdi's "Masked Ball," which was given a recent performance by the Boston Theatre Opera Company, the role of Reinhart being one of Mr. Blanchart's most successful accomplishments:

RAMON BLANCHART,
As Reinhart in "Masked Ball."

Mr. Blanchart, always an experienced artist, was in the picture as Reinhart.—Boston Journal.

Blanchart made a noble effort to carry the big baritone part of Reinhart, and succeeded so well that after his "Eri tu" aria in the last act the house broke into prolonged applause.—Boston American.

Mr. Blanchart's Renato is admirable in its composition, in diction and interpretation. His Renato was a genuinely dignified and tragic figure. Singing the famous air, "Eri tu," he made all that could be made of it, so far as interpretation was concerned, and by the most legitimate means. He did not resort to clap-trap or ranting. With skillful husbanding of his vocal resources, without extraneous gestures or mannerisms, he gave an astonishing measure of distinction to the old tune. It was instructive to observe in this particular connection the intelligence and the skill of so experienced an artist and what he could do at such a moment.—Boston Post.

But the most finished impersonation of the evening was Mr. Blanchart's Renato. In this part he excelled in dignity of bearing, in clearness of diction and dramatic interpretation, and he ennobled the passage, "Eri tu," by his treatment of it.—Boston Traveler.

The best work of the evening, however, was that of Mr. Blanchart as the secretary.—Boston Advertiser.

ANN ARBOR VISITED BY PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA.

Quaker City Organization Makes Profound Impression Before an Audience of Several Thousand—May Festival Announcement—University Symphony Orchestra to Give a Concert.

Ann Arbor, Mich., December 3, 1914.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, eighty-five strong, under its distinguished leader, Leopold Stokowski, invaded Ann Arbor for the second time Wednesday evening, December 2, and again made a profound impression before an audience of several thousand in Hill Auditorium.

While great credit is naturally due the members of such an organization for their proficiency and willingness to subserve their own individualities to the organization as a whole, too much credit cannot be given to its leader, who by his keen discernment and ability perfectly to combine, balance and direct, is able to produce from his band of excellent musicians the maximum of artistic efficiency.

Theodore Harrison, baritone, head of the vocal department of the University School of Music, appeared as soloist, and was enthusiastically received. Mr. Harrison proved himself to be an artist of first rank, and a master musician. He offered two arias, "Hai gia vinto la causa," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," by Mozart, and "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade," by Massenet, the latter of which he was obliged to sing with piano accompaniment, since inadvertently it was not discovered until the last moment that there had been a mistake made in regard to the orchestration.

Like Cincinnatus of old, Mrs. George B. Rhead, a member of the piano faculty of the University School of Music, was called from the audience to play the accompaniment, which was done without a rehearsal but in a most effective and satisfactory manner, showing the real musicianship possessed by both artists.

The entire program was as follows: Overture, "Le Nozze di Figaro," Mozart; aria, "Hai gia vinto la causa," from "Le Nozze di Figaro," Mozart, Theodore Harrison; symphony No. 8, in F, op. 93, Beethoven; legend from the "Kalevala," "The Swan of Tuonela," op. 22, Sibelius; "Valse Triste," Sibelius; tone poem, "Finlandia," op. 26. Sibelius; aria, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade," Massenet, Mr. Harrison; Hungarian rhapsody, No. 1, Liszt.

The next number on the Choral Union Series will be given by Ferruccio Busoni the latter part of January, while the Cincinnati Orchestra will appear in February.

A substitute is now being arranged for to take the place of Leo Slezak, originally scheduled for March 12, but who has been obliged to cancel his American tour.

UNIVERSITY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

On December 10, the University Symphony Orchestra of the School of Music, under the direction of Prof. S. P. Lockwood, will make its initial appearance for the season in Hill Auditorium. The orchestra, fifty strong, has made considerable progress since last year, and a concert of unusual attractiveness is anticipated.

MAY FESTIVAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

Professor Stanley is engaged in welding together the program for the twenty-third May Festival, to be given May 10 to 22. The Chicago Symphony Orchestra will, as usual, form the background, while the University Choral Union will appear in several programs. The choral works to be given are Bossi's "Paradise Lost," Wolf-Ferrari's "New Life," and the "Children's Crusade," by Pierné. A supplementary mixed chorus of children taken from the Ann Arbor public schools and trained by Florence Potter, supervisor of music, and a special boys' chorus, made up of the choruses of the First Congregational Church and the Episcopal Church of Ann Arbor, under the leadership of Prof. R. H. Kempf, will be combined with the Choral Union in the presentation of these works.

UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

Among the more prominent students enrolled at the University School of Music this season are Reese F. Veatch, director of music at Alma College; Leonora Allen, soprano; Albert Lindquist, tenor, and Carl Lindegrin, baritone, of Chicago, all of whom are doing special work under Theodore Harrison. Mr. Lindquist left directly after the concert last evening for Milwauke, where he will appear tonight as soloist for the Lyric Club. December 17, he sings with the Mendelssohn Club, of Chicago, under Harrison Wild, and later in the month, together with Miss Allen, Mr. Lindegrin and Mrs. Gannon, of Chicago, will appear in connection with the Flint Choral Society, under the direction of Earl V. Moore, also of Ann Arbor, in the presentation of Handel's "Messiah." C. A. SINK.

KANSAS CITY ORCHESTRA GIVES SECOND CONCERT OF SEASON.

Enjoyable Program Performed by Local Organization—Excellent Musical Affairs Fill an Active Week.

Kansas City, Mo., December 4, 1914.

The Kansas City Symphony Orchestra gave the second concert of its fourth season at the Shubert Theatre, last Tuesday afternoon. Goldmark's "Country Wedding" music was delightfully played. Massenet's overture to "Phedre" received a spirited and realistic interpretation, as did also the overture to Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The program included two tenor solos by Lambert Murphy, "Open Now to My Eyes" (Massenet) and "Celeste Aida." Mr. Lambert's singing was a triumph. Rarely has a symphony audience so insistently demanded an encore, but the rule, "no encores" was rigidly maintained. Carl Busch conducted the concert in his customary painstaking manner.

FORBES QUARTET CONCERT.

The Forbes String Quartet, which came into the concert field last year, gave the first of three concerts for this season last Monday evening in All Souls' Church. It is gratifying to note the improved ensemble of these players —Margaret Fowler-Forbes, violin; Gladys Baldwin, violin; Rudolph Weber, viola; Henry Matthiason, cello. It is also gratifying to note the increasing interest of the local public in this particular field of music. The program contained the Schubert E flat major and the Mozart B flat major quartets. Reginald Davidson sang delightfully five songs rarely heard here, viz., "Die Fei," Wilhelm Berger; "Hero's Song," Max Mayer; "Aime Moi," H. Bember; "I Heard a Soldier," Hubert Ray; "Gloriana," Mallison.

MISS CRAFT AND MRS. BEACH.

Marcella Craft, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, gave the third concert in the Myrtle Irene Mitchell series at the Shubert Theatre this afternoon. Of the singing of Miss Craft there is only praise for a beautiful voice and much culture, technically, musically and mentally.

The appearance here of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach was an event in the local social and musical life. She played in an individual, exquisite style all her own, her charming "Suite Francaise." She also played her "Valse Fantasie" for the first time in public here.

STATE MUSIC TEACHERS MEET.

The Kansas State Music Teachers' Association held its annual session in Wichita this week. An interesting feature of the three days' session was the Kansas composers' program on Thursday afternoon. It would seem that Kansas can produce other than wheat and sunflowers.

GENEVE LICHTENWALTER.

Germaine Schnitzer in Lowell, Mass.

It is long, indeed, since a pianist of such virtuosity has played here as Germaine Schnitzer, the young Viennese pianist who gave a recital before the Middlesex Women's Club yesterday afternoon.

With youth, temperament and vigor as assets, added to a fluent and impeccable technic that positively toyed with difficulties, she gave a most finished performance, now sparkling in its brilliancy and breathless in its speed and again tender, delicate and songful. At times she brought out a fine, sonorous, compelling body of tone, although she never forced the piano beyond its possibilities. At other moments she subordinated the accompaniment to a melody with the utmost refinement and the most delicate gradations of tone. A crescendo or diminuendo was managed with wonderful skill. Runs, whether simple or complex, were rippled off with limpid smoothness, inner voices of a theme were brought out with rare discernment and when need be there was a velvety quality of tone that was a delight to hear. . . .

Not often does one hear better Bach playing than hers. The fugue was given out distinctly and the various voices could be distinguished throughout the rapid development of the piece. And she made of it more than a mere intellectual achievement, adding beauty and even grace to what under many hands is simply a dry mechanical exercise.

The present writer has not heard the "Carnaval" better done since a memorable performance by Rosenthal. This series of musical scenes depicting incidents of a masquerade is full of the life and color that Schumann, who delighted in revels of the kind, knew so well how to give. Through it all runs the rhythm of the dance, and here Miss Schnitzer, Viennese as she is, was manifestly at home. Skillfully differentiated as was each little picture in mood or manner, one never for long lost the beat of the dance. Pierrot, Arlequin, Pantalon, Columbine, Coquette and the rest of the merry makers the composer wove into his scheme, each was graphically interpreted by the pianist. The movements of the dance, the reconnaissance, with its daintily repeated notes, the aveu, the promenade, all were indicated with subtle facility. The Papillons, a reminiscence of the piece of that name, fluttered swiftly by and the whole was brought to a sonorous and thrilling close with the fa[illegible] of the Davidsbündler." . . .

Miss Schnitzer proved equally successful with the [illegible] The familiar ballade was a revelation as she played it, [illegible] tiful quality of tone and an airy lightness of ornamentation, the number being worked up to an effective climax. The second of the three etudes was remarkable for the virtuosity with which the passages for the left hand were managed. Again the pianist amazed by the sheer speed with which she tossed off the toccata of Saint-Saëns. It was really wonderful playing.

The little salon piece by Straub, of course, was mere play for her, but the staccato melody was charmingly done and the rustling accompaniment went with fairylike grace.

From what had gone before it was to be expected that technically and temperamentally Miss Schnitzer would be found fully equal to the Liszt number at the close of the program. Nor was there any disappointment, for she gave it a sparkling and brilliant reading and yet through it all sounded clearly the simple melody with which the composer chose to adorn the whimsical play of his fancy. The pianist was enthusiastically recalled and added another number to the program.

The Middlesex Women's Club has certainly brought to Lowell no finer artist than Germaine Schnitzer.—S. R. F., Lowell (Mass.) Courier-Citizen, November 24, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Worcester Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Under the direction of Daniel Silvester, the Worcester Symphony Orchestra (Worcester, Mass.) gave a concert on Sunday evening, November 22. The assisting artists were Marie McConville Sullivan, Elizabeth Mack, Lydia White, Virginia Stickney, Stella Marek, Louise Cummings, Lillian Mill, Arthur Brooke, Dr. A. J. Harpin, Robert E. Gow, Harry Coley. The numbers played by the orchestra included: Overture to "Rosamunde" (Schubert), prelude to Act V, "King Manfred" (Reinecke), suite, "A Love Episode in Birdland" (Bendix), grand march from "Tannhäuser" (Wagner) and "America." The concert was well attended. The playing of the orchestra and the assisting artists received the applause which their excellent work merited.

Effie Nichols in the West.

Effie Nichols, the pianist and teacher, of Columbus, Ohio, formerly assistant to Alberto Jonás in Berlin, has been playing recently with considerable success in several Western States.

Kathleen Howard's Carmen Praised.

Kathleen Howard's portrayal of the gypsy girl in Bizet's opera, "Carmen," shines forth as one of the most individual interpretations yet displayed by that excellent organization, the Century Opera Company. Without making herself so prominent as to distort the expertly developed ensemble of the performance, she easily dominated all her scenes and made of Carmen a distinct individuality, no small achievement when the number of artists essaying the role in the past is remembered. . . . Miss Howard prefers to follow the line of the music. Her Carmen is a rollicking, good natured sort of a person, much more of a kitten than a hedge sparrow, and with it all a very fascinating young person. . . . She is one of the few Carmens who ever learned to dance. . . . At all times she maintains the appearance of naturalness. Most important of all, she sings the music as though it had been written for her. . . .—Chicago Journal, November 27, 1914.

Her conception of the role was so admirable in every way that it would seem she had made an elaborate study of all the most celebrated models in order to learn in practical fashion how it should not be played. Her Carmen was natural, therefore it was good. It was generous in that it played up to and did not attempt to blot out other roles.—Chicago Herald.

Kathleen Howard, the versatile mezzo-soprano of the Century Opera Company, . . . Her impersonation is feline in its dramatic conception and is subtle and designing in its enfoldment. She did not neglect to use her castagnets in the second act, and is altogether a lithe, graceful figure as the alluring gypsy girl.—Chicago Examiner.

KATHLEEN HOWARD AS CARMEN.

. . . Kathleen Howard found in the title part an opportunity to display a neatness of acting that is remarkable on the operatic stage. . . . She surmounted the great rational difficulty of the part, which is that the gypsy deviltry of Merimee's story must be modified by the actress to suit the mildness of the librettist's adaptation, without destroying the dramatic prominence of the protagonist. Her Carmen was a merely vulgar young person with no intelligence save that of sex. Her allurements were primitive and awkward, which is to say obvious. She was a cat not yet forgetting kittenhood. . . . Miss Howard's voice is capable of singing Carmen with excellent effect.—Chicago Daily News.

Miss Howard's Carmen was not the incarnation of the evil spirit of the eternal feminine, but a reckless maid playing mischievously with fire—with kittenish grace, yet with the courage not to cry out when she was burned. Her voice was full of color in the lower register, and she sang with appreciation. . . .—Chicago Evening Post.

The audience on this occasion seemed to have come in the hope of getting illusion and thrills and a vivid sense of the charm of the rather lurid Spanish lady, who did such dreadful things to poor José and his little Micaela. That is what they got, and from the quality of their applause it seemed they liked it.—Chicago Tribune.

Henriette Bach Engagements.

Recent New York engagements made by Henriette Bach, violinist, are with the Thursday Musical Club (Mrs. John McArthur, president), January 28, and with the Friends of Music Society, December 13. Miss Bach, as already announced in these columns, will play at the December 17 musicale of the Haarlem Philharmonic Society of New York.

Relief Society Concert.

The Relief Society of New York celebrated its seventieth anniversary on Monday evening, December 14, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. The receipts of this concert will be given to the widows and orphans of the war in Europe.

Marie Rappold, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, appeared on this occasion, also Nahan Franko and an orchestra of sixty men.

Eleanor Spencer with New York Philharmonic.

Miss Spencer is an artist of whom her compatriots may well be proud. . . . Her playing would receive recognition in any musical community of the civilized world.

It was characteristic of Miss Spencer to select as her contribution Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra, music that gives little opportunity for superficial display, and she carried out her task also in characteristic fashion; with a clean and crisp technic, with musicianly feeling, with fine taste, and absolutely without affectation.—Press, November 28, 1914.

She played with the same excellent tonal qualities that characterized her other appearances, and her interpretation was sympathetic and broad.—Herald, November 28, 1914.

Miss Spencer . . . is an artist of much ability and charm, and she played yesterday with inspiration and musicianship. Her tone was delightfully warm, her touch accurate, her technic brilliant.—American, November 28, 1914.

Miss Eleanor Spencer played Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations in a really artistic spirit, with sympathy and grace. Miss Spencer gave great pleasure to the audience in a work that is of incessant charm, filled with much of Franck's poetic spirit, of his powerful and vivifying harmonic feeling.—Times, November 28, 1914.

Her performance . . . was distinguished by a clear and fluent technic, well balanced nuance and much musical intelligence.—World, November 28, 1914.

Eleanor Spencer . . . played Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra with fine effect.—New York Tribune, November 28, 1914.

Eleanor Spencer played the piano part with good technic and artistic sincerity.—Sun, November 28, 1914.

Eleanor Spencer played the Franck work and acquitted herself excellently of her task, bringing out with beauty the fine points in Franck's composition.—Evening Post, November 28, 1914.

The soloist was Eleanor Spencer, pianist, who acquitted herself well in Cesar Franck's "Symphonic Variations," showing taste and skill.—Evening World, November 28, 1914.

Eleanor Spencer . . . disclosed her finely musical taste through the dignified though hardly bravura-like and grateful "Symphonic Variations," by Franck, and through her exquisitely fine and technically sure execution of it. With such works one cannot achieve noisy successes, but a serious artist can always lodge himself more securely in the appreciation of those who know.—Staats-Zeitung, November 28, 1914.

The admired piano virtuoso, Eleanor Spencer, . . . The young artist showed with this choice that she can go her way and that she can command modern music as well as the classics. All those meritorious qualities which have been recorded here hitherto showed themselves again in this splendid artist's performance. Mature understanding, a complete command of technic and an emotional style, Miss Spencer was given a richly deserved reception.—German Herold, November 28, 1914.

Helen Stanley in Beloit and Minneapolis.

Helen Stanley possesses a wonderful soprano. Art finds full expression in her singing. . . . She compels admiration by the very artistocratic manner of her interpretations. No note of falsity finds a place in her renditions. Purity and clarity of tone are hers, too, but above everything else there stands out those qualities that convince one that Miss Stanley appreciates the dignity of her work. Long years of preparation are revealed in what she does, even in a recital such as this, although she is better known on the operatic stage.—The Beloit Daily News, December 1, 1914.

Helen Stanley, the soprano soloist, proved a joy forever. Endowed with a lovely personality and possessing much charm, her voice is a soprano which seems to combine both lyric and dramatic qualities. Guided by artistic taste, faultless judgment and unaffected sincerity her singing is all that one can possibly wish singing to be. Her program numbers were Micaela's aria from Bizet's "Carmen" and Debussy's "Air of Lia," from "L'Enfant Prodigue." As encores she sang "Il est doux, il est bon," from Massenet's "Herodiade" and "Vissi D'Arte" from Puccini's "La Tosca."—Minneapolis Tribune, December 5, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Particular attention given to works of American composers and their products.

G. Schirmer, New York.

"THE DEBUTANTE," a musical comedy by Harry B. Smith and Robert B. Smith, with music by Victor Herbert.

There are 146 pages in the vocal score, which is embellished with a portrait of Hazel Dawn. The piano arrangement of the orchestral accompaniment is not unduly difficult, and the entire work is unusually well printed, as will at once be apparent to any one who compares this score with the usual musical comedy score. Eleven of the principal numbers are published separately. No doubt several of them will enjoy considerable popularity apart from the stage performance: "Love is a Battle," "All for the Sake of a Girl," "The Golden Age," "The Love of the Lorelei," "The Baker's Boy and the Chimney Sweep," "When I Played Carmen," "Fate," "Call Around Again," "Peggy's a Creature of Moods," "Professor Cupid," "The Will-o'-the-Wisp."

SONATA FOR VIOLIN, WITH ACCOMPANIMENT FOR PIANO, composed by Cecil Burleigh.

This new work, which is the composer's opus 22, is called "The Ascension," because the composer "was inspired to write the sonata by certain incidents in the life of Jesus, culminating in the ascension." Cecil Burleigh has written music expressive of his feelings and has not attempted to portray in sound any of the incidents that stimulated his imagination. The Biblical quotations, therefore, are interesting only in the sense that they were the source of the inspiration, and not subject matter of the movements. Musically, the work is very modern in spirit, melodic style, and harmony. Its counterpoint is of the freest possible variety and its discords extreme, entirely unconventional and without the least trace of vulgarity or mere display. The composer is terribly in earnest. Whatever success the work may eventually have will be due to the note of sincerity and the ring of honest conviction in it, and not to its sensuous beauty. The circular sent out by the publishers needs a critical revision. It is odd to see this sonata in three movements described as a four movement work, and it is equally disconcerting to find "Isaiah" classed as New Testament. Presumably the circular was written before the published copy of the sonata was available.

"SYLVAN SKETCHES." An album of five simple and unpretentious little pieces for piano. Composed by Heinrich Helm.

The names of these lyrical pieces are: "Nodding Ferns," "Where the Cool Moss Grows," "Songsters on the Boughs," "Under the Great Oak Tree," "Woodland Sprites." They will serve to while away a pleasant half hour, and they ought also to have a value as teaching pieces.

SUITE FOR VIOLIN, with piano accompaniment. Composed by L. T. Grünberg.

This very difficult, brilliant, and exceedingly well written work is dedicated to Carl Flesch. There is nothing in the violin part to daunt an artist like Carl Flesch, but there is much which will trouble the ordinary violinist, who will find the interpretation of many passages more of a problem than the performing of the notes. But when this rich, modern and wholly effective composition is played as the composer probably heard it played in his imagination it cannot fail to command the admiration of the hearer. Works like these are not written every day. They are purely labors of love, for there cannot possibly be any monetary reward commensurate with the art and patience required to construct them. The suite is in four movements, and the piano part fills thirty-four pages.

Boosey & Company, New York.

"WEEP YOU NO MORE." Song, with words from "Seven Elizabethan Lyrics," and music by Roger Quilter.

There is much character and unconventional freedom of treatment in this song, notwithstanding its simplicity and Old World atmosphere. It is very vocal and suitable alike for recital purposes or teaching.

"THE PROPOSAL." Song. Words by Henry G. Treasure. Music by Herbert Ralph Ward.

This is a typical English ballad, so far as the music is concerned, though there is no narrative in the love lyric. It is better than the so called popular song, and more conventional than the high class art song. It is the sort of song in which the amateur vocalist will feel most at ease.

"MOONLAND DREAMS." Song. Words by F. E. Weatherly. Music by Eric Coates.

This ballad of sentiment has considerable emotional warmth. Both the voice melody and the piano accompaniment allow the performers to reach a fine climax at the end. There is nothing new either in the melody or the harmony, but the song sounds spontaneous and is effective.

"MATING TIME." Song. Words by Arthur Hoeber. Music by Vernon Eville.

There is a freshness and a charm in this graceful and melodious song which will make it welcome everywhere. The accompaniment is one which will interest the pianist as much as the melody will attract the singer.

Haarlem Philharmonic Artists.

Henriette Bach, violinist, with George Falkenstein, accompanist, and Oscar Seagle, baritone, Frank Bibb, accompanist, will furnish the program for the Haarlem Philharmonic Morning Musicale, Waldorf-Astoria, New York, tomorrow, December 17.

LOS ANGELES ORCHESTRA ENTERS UPON ITS SEASON.

Organization Is Larger and Better Than Before—Ellis Club Concert—Woman's Orchestra Opens Its Season.

1110 W. Washington Street,
Los Angeles, Cal., November 28, 1914.

An unqualified success was the first symphony concert of the season under the direction of Adolf Tandler. The orchestra is larger and better than last year and the program went with a precision and fervor which aroused the big audience to responsive appreciation. The fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky was the piece de resistance and was given a broad and tender reading by Mr. Tandler. The numbers by Delius elicited interest. The balance of the program was made up of Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

FIRST ELLIS CLUB CONCERT.

The Ellis Club, a chorus of over one hundred men's voices, established many years ago, and for most of the last decade under the direction of J. B. Poulin, is said to rank with the best men's choruses of the country. Their concerts are by invitation only, and the house is always crowded. Tuesday night's program was most pleasurable. The club was assisted by Luise Rieger, soprano, with Brahm Van den Berg at the piano, and Harry Clifford Lott, baritone. Mme. Rieger possesses a light pleasing voice which she uses most artistically. Mr. Lott sang the solo in the "Farewell of Hiawatha" and, as always, excellently. Mary L. O'Donoghue is the capable accompanist of the club.

MARJORIE NICHOLS WITH WOMAN'S ORCHESTRA.

Again this year, Marjorie Nichols, the gifted young pianist, was chosen as soloist for the first concert of the Woman's Symphony Orchestra, given under the direction of Henry Schoenfeld at the Gamut Club, Friday evening, November 27. The orchestra was in unusually good form and especial credit is due Mr. Schoenfeld for the splendid manner in which his players accompanied Miss Nichols in the Grieg A minor concerto.

HELEN THORNER IN SONG RECITAL.

A newcomer to Los Angeles is Helen Thorner, who came from Indianapolis last year to make her home here, leaving a large following in that city. She made her initial appearance Friday evening at the Trinity Auditorium before a large audience under the direction of L. E. Behymer. Mme. Thorner is the possessor of a large velvety voice of unusual quality, and an impressive stage presence. She sings with authority and understanding and is a decided acquisition to Los Angeles.

A VIOLIN RECITAL.

Louis Berkowitz, violinist, gave a recital in the Gamut Club Auditorium, Tuesday evening, November 24. He is a Los Angeles product and a pupil of Arnold Krauss. He gave a splendid program and displayed a tone of unusual sonority and depth. He has also a most restful presence characterized by great reserve and an entire freedom from mannerisms.

ALICE BARNETT PRICE GUEST OF GERTRUDE ROSS.

Gertrude Ross had as a guest for a week Alice Barnett Price, of San Diego, a gifted young composer. Mrs. Ross and Mrs. Price were students in Berlin at the same time and lived in the same pension. They renewed their old student days and spent one entire morning with Rudolph Ganz, with whom Mrs. Price studied three years. November 19, Mrs. Ross and Grace Widney Mabee assisted Emma L. Simpson, pianist, in a program at the Virgil Intermediate School.

IGNAZ HARROLDI'S DEATH.

A great loss to Los Angeles was sustained in the passing of Ignaz Haroldi, the Polish violinist. He is sincerely and deeply mourned by every one who knew him. Not only was he a fine artist, but his was a refined, gentle and kindly soul open to all that was beautiful and sincere. His death was a great shock.

L. E. BEHYMER IS BUSY.

Manager L. E. Beyhmer returned from the north last week, where he was looking after his numerous bookings in other parts of the State. Evan Williams opens the matinee series here today. Arrigo Serato, the Italian violinist, comes here December 8. John McCormack is booked for January.

JANE CATHERWOOD.

Elman's Sister Is Studying with Thorner.

Mischa Elman's sister is preparing for a vocal career, and is now studying under the tuition of William Thorner, late of Paris, but now in New York. Mr. Thorner states that Miss Elman has a rare soprano voice. It was by the advice of Mischa Elman that his sister has placed herself under the care of Mr. Thorner.
